Mr. Bayley: Many things have changed since the legislation was placed on the statute book and since the publication of the carers strategy. I have visited a number of carers projects in different parts of the country, and they welcome the fact that, as part of the strategy, an additional £140 million has been made available, principally to provide breaks for carers.

ONE Service

14. Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): What reduction in incomplete or incorrect first-time benefit claims he estimates will result from the introduction of the ONE service. [88039]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Angela Eagle): The first pilot offices offering the ONE service opened for business on 28 June. One of the many advantages of the new service is that advisers will be able to help clients to complete their claim forms during the initial work-focused interview. We therefore anticipate that there will be fewer incomplete or incorrect first-time benefit claims.

Mr. Healey: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that one of the understated strengths of the concept of the ONE service is the opportunity to get claims complete and correct from day one? Will she therefore consider making that objective one of the yardsticks by which the pilots are judged?

Angela Eagle: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We believe that there are large administrative gains to be made from preventing the duplication of work and the chasing of incorrect forms, and from ensuring that people can get their benefit payments quickly. They can then concentrate more effectively on how to get off benefit and back into work. I can confirm that that is one of the things that we will be measuring in the monitoring and implementation process, and we will be expecting significant beneficial effects.

Public Service Delivery

15. Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood): What progress his Department is making with integrating the delivery of its services to the public with services offered by other parts of Government. [88040]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Angela Eagle): This Department is making substantial progress in planning the integration of its services to customers through a modern service programme which will deliver business change and enhance information technology support. Our primary focus at the moment is the ONE project pilots, which commenced on 28 June, in which we are ensuring the delivery of work-focused benefit services and promoting partnership, working with the Benefits Agency, the Employment Service and local authorities.

Mrs. Humble: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of how confusing and time consuming it is for many disabled people in particular to try to access different Government Departments and local authority departments. What plans does my hon. Friend have to ensure that areas such as Blackpool, which are not part of the pilot for the ONE service, have a single gateway to enable disabled people to access all the services that they need?

Angela Eagle: We are hoping to learn from the ONE pilots how we can offer the service throughout the country. We are doing other things to try to integrate interdepartmental working, and the work of local authorities and the agencies of Departments. That includes the presence in all 349 local authorities of remote access terminals which allow people to look at the information we have to ensure that they can process housing benefit correctly. I assure my hon. Friend that the benefits of integration will be coming to all areas of the country as soon as we can ensure that that can be done practically.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): As the Government are doing such a good job in integrating the services offered by different Departments, will the Minister have a word with the Secretary of State for Health and advise him that by focusing on the numbers on waiting lists, he is making waiting times longer, and thus adding tremendously to the social security bill?

Angela Eagle: The hon. Gentleman should know that both waiting times and waiting lists are falling.

Disabled People (New Deal)

16. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): What progress his Department has made in implementing the new deal for the disabled. [88041]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Hugh Bayley): Together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, we have introduced the new deal for disabled people. We are also piloting a personal adviser service under the new deal in 12 areas, including my hon. Friend's constituency. I know that he has visited the scheme and has taken a close interest in its work.

Dr. Iddon: Not only has the pilot scheme in Bolton employed four people previously on incapacity benefit but so far, in the first eight months, it has seen 565 people, half of whom have been assessed and 88 of whom have been put into an occupation. There are excellent partnerships running; with Bolton local authority, for example, with whom the scheme has won European structural fund money for 200 workplaces. Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Peter Jones and his staff on the excellent start that they have made?

Mr. Bayley: I do indeed congratulate Peter Jones and his staff. I have visited the project and I know that it is working extremely well. It shows the difference between our approach to welfare benefits and that of the Conservatives. We seek to get people off benefits and back into work.

Northern Ireland

Madam Speaker: The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) raised an important point of order at 2.30 pm today about the joint statement by the British and Irish Governments, which should have been available in the Vote Office at that time. I understand that it was available in Northern Ireland at 9 pm on Friday. There is no reason whatever why it should not have been in our Vote Office early this morning. I hope that those who are responsible for distribution will improve efficiency.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on last week's talks on Northern Ireland.

Last Friday, I proposed a way forward for Northern Ireland. The starting point was the Good Friday agreement, which set out an agreed basis for a peace settlement in Northern Ireland. It offered Unionists what they have sought for the past 70 years: the principle of consent—that is, no change to the status of Northern Ireland without the agreement of the majority of its population; changes to the Irish constitution, with Dublin dropping its legal claim to the North; and devolution of powers to Northern Ireland, with an elected Assembly, an Executive and other institutions.

For the nationalists and republicans, the Good Friday agreement offers equality, justice, and the normalisation of Northern Ireland society; for the first time since partition, the ability to share power and responsibility and not have their electoral mandate set at naught; a range of new institutions, including north-south bodies; and, over time, as the security situation improves, demilitarisation.

Above all, the Good Friday agreement offered all the people of Northern Ireland the prospects of permanent peace and an end to violence. I believe that it is still the only true way forward for Northern Ireland.

Of course, difficulties remain. There is still violence, much of it recently by loyalists opposed to the Good Friday agreement, and there is still conflict and bitterness, as we can see in Portadown, where I will continue to work for a settlement of the Drumcree issue; but life in Northern Ireland has improved immeasurably since the Good Friday agreement. Normality has returned to most parts of the Province.

Whatever their disagreements, the two sides now talk to one another regularly, but one vital issue is unresolved: how to secure the decommissioning of paramilitary weapons. The Good Friday agreement required all parties to use their best endeavours to secure decommissioning.

On 25 June, the Taoiseach and I secured the commitment of all the signatories to the Good Friday agreement to three principles on which the rest of our work was then based: that an inclusive Executive should be formed, exercising devolved powers; that all paramilitary arms should be decommissioned by May 2000; and that decommissioning should be carried out in a manner determined by the International Commission on Decommissioning under General John de Chastelain.

Both sides need certainty. Unionists want certainty that decommissioning will happen, and a guarantee that, if it does not, they will not be left in an Executive with those who refuse to make it happen. Republicans want the certainty that Unionists are serious about participating in a genuinely inclusive Government. Our agreement last Friday, in my view, provides both.

In more detail, the proposal is as follows. Northern Ireland Ministers would be nominated by the parties, using the d'Hondt procedure, on 15 July. The devolution order would be laid before Parliament on the following day, and powers transferred on 18 July.

The de Chastelain commission would require a start to the process of decommissioning. The general has already said that he expects this to be within "literally a couple of days".

That process of decommissioning begins when a paramilitary group

"makes an unambiguous commitment that decommissioning will be completed by 22 May 2000 and commences detailed discussions of actual modalities (amounts, types, location, timing) with the Commission through an authorised representative."

So there would have to be definitive statement of intent, certified by de Chastelain literally within days. If that does not happen, and de Chastelain certifies a breach of this process, at that point the Executive is unwound. So we shall know within days whether decommissioning is to happen or not.

The commission then sets a further time limit, within which there is to be a start to actual decommissioning of weapons. The general has said that he would expect that to be within a few weeks. Again, should the actual decommissioning not come as de Chastelain has laid down according to the Good Friday agreement, then the failsafe kicks in. De Chastelain is due to make reports on progress on actual decommissioning in September, October and December and in May 2000, by which time it is to be complete. That is all entirely in line with the Good Friday agreement. Under it, parties are expected to use their best efforts to secure decommissioning. Last Friday's agreement is effectively the basis for how that will be judged.

Should default occur, the institutions are suspended automatically while we find a way forward. We are then, in effect, back to where we are now, but with these two vital differences: the blame for default is clear, and the parties are then free to move on in an Executive without the defaulting party. I cannot make the other parties agree to a new Executive, or force anyone to sit in a Government with anyone else, but I can make sure that Sinn Fein does not continue in an Executive with the Ulster Unionists should there be a default of the de Chastelain process. All that will be set out in legislation.

In my judgment, it is a far better deal than was on offer at Hillsborough. That offered a token act of decommissioning, dependent on reciprocal steps by the British and Irish, with no clear framework for completing the decommissioning process by May 2000. This, by contrast, provides a guarantee of a complete process of decommissioning, plus a failsafe that fully protects the interests of Unionists. There is a challenge to all parties: to Unionists to agree to a power-sharing Executive; to republicans not just to give up violence but to decommission weapons in accordance with the undertakings set out in the Good Friday agreement; and to nationalist opinion to support parties implementing this agreement and not to support those who refuse to do so.

If last Friday's agreement is put through, we will know in days whether the paramilitaries are serious about decommissioning their weapons. After 30 years of bloodshed, grief-stricken families and terror-torn communities, is it not worth waiting 30 days to see whether the undertakings are fulfilled? If they are, peace—real peace—can come. If they are not, we will know that the challenge of true democracy was too much for those linked to paramilitary groups. Either way, we will know. So I say to people: discuss the detail, debate it and engage; but do not throw away the best chance for peace that we will have in this generation.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): We are grateful to the Prime Minister for his statement. The whole House will appreciate his efforts and those of many others to resolve those very difficult problems.

The Good Friday agreement continues to have the full and unequivocal support of the Opposition. It offers the prize of peace and an end to the horror and suffering of the past 30 years. We are committed to making it work and to seeing it implemented in full.

Does the Prime Minister agree that the decommissioning of all illegally held arms and explosives is an absolutely essential part of that process? It was supposed to begin almost immediately and to be completed by May 2000, but, so far, it has not happened. Will he make it clear that the obstacle to progress has been not the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and his party, who have done all that was required under the agreement, but the terrorists—republican and loyalist—and their political representatives, who have failed to get rid of their arms?

Does the Prime Minister agree that, against that background, the anxieties of the Unionists are wholly understandable? They are being asked to admit, as Government Ministers in a part of the United Kingdom, representatives of terrorist groups that remain fully armed and capable of carrying out violence on a massive scale. They are being asked to take on trust claims by Sinn Fein, which does not even profess to speak for the IRA, that, once it is in government, disarmament might take place.

In assessing these proposals, we have two major areas of concern that give rise to two sets of questions. First, it is clear that there is still no cast-iron guarantee that the IRA will commence decommissioning its weapons. One of its leaders was quoted as saying that there was no guarantee of decommissioning. Will the Prime Minister confirm that, in the emergency legislation—to which the House will give speedy passage—there will be a precise, transparent timetable for decommissioning?

Secondly, on the failsafe guarantee, Friday's document states that, without decommissioning, the Government

"will suspend the operation of the institutions set up by the Agreement."

Does the Prime Minister agree that that could punish democratic politicians for the failure of paramilitaries to decommission? Will he therefore expand on his comments on the radio this morning, when he said that, if the IRA failed to state its intention to decommission within days,

"it's open to us all to formulate a new way forward without Sinn Fein"?

Will the Prime Minister confirm that, in those circumstances, he would seek the suspension from the Assembly of Sinn Fein and any loyalist paramilitary groups? Will he further confirm that the Secretary of State would use the power given her in the Good Friday agreement to invite the Assembly to form a new Executive without Sinn Fein? That is not to say simply that it could do so, but that the Secretary of State would use her power to invite it to do so—that is the difference in what I am asking.

Will the Prime Minister confirm also that, in those circumstances, he would, without hesitation, put on hold any reform of the RUC and criminal justice system and stop the early release of terrorist prisoners?

We are now at a stage where the two Governments—British and Irish—and the democratic parties, nationalist and Unionist, have jumped every hurdle. Let us make no mistake: the stumbling block is the failure of paramilitaries, loyalist and republican, to decommission weapons. Does the Prime Minister agree that it is now up to those paramilitaries to make the process work, and, if they fail to do so, we should set the maximum penalties for them?

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his support. The bipartisan support in the whole process has been extremely important in taking it forward, and I hope that it continues, because it will be difficult to make progress without it.

The right hon. Gentleman said that decommissioning has not happened, but the Executive has not yet been established, and the decommissioning issue is precisely what held it up. People point out that we said that representatives could not sit in the Executive until we were sure that they had given up violence for good—that is what I said during the referendum campaign, and that is, of course, precisely why they are not sitting in the Executive. We need to deal with that issue, which is why we have tried to reach agreement in the way that we have.

I entirely agree—it is important to emphasise this point—that loyalist paramilitaries have to decommission too. There can be no question of saying that it is an imposition only on republican paramilitaries; it is in respect of all paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland.

The right hon. Gentleman said that there were understandable anxieties and that people would be expected to admit to an Executive people who are fully armed and to take their word on trust. It is important to make two points.

First, the benefit of the agreement that we have is that people would not be able to carry on sitting in an Executive fully armed. They would have to be agreeing to a process of decommissioning that got rid of all the weapons by the agreed date, which is May 2000. The problem with the Hillsborough declaration was that it asked for one token act of decommissioning, and no guaranteed process after that.

Secondly, people say that we must take Sinn Fein on trust. The whole agreement of last Friday is based on the simple principle that neither side will take the other on trust. We may as well face up to that; that trust does not exist, for perfectly understandable reasons. Therefore, the purpose of the agreement is to build in guarantees, certainty. So, there is the certainty for the republicans that the inclusive Executive will be set up, and the certainty for Unionists that they will not be expected to carry on sitting in the Executive with those who are not giving up their weapons. We have tried to build in certainty, not trust.

The right hon. Gentleman asked us to say that, if there were to be a default by Sinn Fein, we would invite the other parties to go forward without it. I say categorically that we would certainly be doing that—as long as people understand that I cannot force parties to form a Government together. I cannot force some of the parties now to get into government with the other parties, but I can certainly provide the basis for a way forward and say that the party that is in default in the agreement should be the one that is punished. There is no doubt about that; we can make that very clear.

The release of prisoners is governed by the legislation that is set out, and a range of factors are to be taken into account, including the issues about which we are talking. I make the following point about maximum penalties. At the present time, we simply do not know whether people will decommission. My point is, whatever they say, whatever they have said to us and whatever indications they have given, I understand perfectly well why people will not accept undertakings, words, statements or any of the rest of it. If we do not put this agreement to the test and find out literally within days whether decommissioning will happen, we will never know. The republicans will say, "We might have, if we had been given the chance," and the Unionists will be left without the knowledge of whether the republicans ever would have done so.

I believe one thing absolutely and sincerely: we will never get this Executive to work unless the obligation to decommission is accepted and carried through. In the legislation, we must build in proper failsafes and guarantees so that we give this thing a chance to work, but do not leave the Unionists or, indeed, any other democrats, in an Executive in which people keep a private army and intend to use it.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I congratulate the Prime Minister, the Taoiseach and all others involved on retrieving hope from what looked like pretty irretrievable despair at the end of last week. Does not the Good Friday agreement remain the only blueprint for peace in Ireland, and the Belfast agreement the only route to it? With that in mind, is it not important that all sides, perhaps especially the Unionists, consider this agreement in detail rather than peremptorily dismissing it, as that would damage not only peace in Northern Ireland but very possibly the Unionists' cause as well? Does the Prime Minister agree, however, that he has some work to do to reassure the Unionist community about it? Will he therefore provide a few more details on the following three areas?

First, will the Prime Minister give more details about the timetable for decommissioning and the role of General de Chastelain? Secondly, will he be a little more precise about how long the Unionists will be asked to sit in an Executive before the IRA gives dependable and concrete assurances by way of action on its commitment to decommission before 2000? Lastly, will he assure us that the failsafe will not bring down the whole devolutionary structure and that, if one party defaults—whether IRA or any other terrorists—the others will not only be able to go ahead but will do so with the Government's help, support and good wishes?

The Prime Minister: First, it is important again to point out that there will be no decommissioning if we do not find an agreement to move this issue forward. The alternative to last Friday's agreement is not faster, quicker decommissioning, but no decommissioning. Secondly, the timetable for decommissioning is laid down by General de Chastelain, but he has already given indications of the timetable that he would expect and when the reports are to be delivered—the first, as I said, in September and subsequently right up to May 2000. Incidentally, if he wishes, he can lay down an even quicker timetable for decommissioning. Anybody who has had anything to do with General de Chastelain realises that he is, rightly, respected by all sides, both as independent and as extremely concerned to ensure that decommissioning is actually delivered.

It is as well that the right hon. Gentleman raised the third point; it is not that Sinn Fein must provide a statement to the de Chastelain commission within days of the formation of the Executive, but that the paramilitary group itself—the IRA—must do so, as must the other, loyalist, groups. Most people would recognise that as a pretty significant event. We shall know that within days, and then, some weeks down the line, we shall know whether actual decommissioning is occurring. During that time—literally the next few weeks—we shall be able to see whether those undertakings are honoured.

Finally, in relation to the failsafe, yes it is extremely important to recognise that, in order to give the automatic guarantee, we have to suspend the institutions, but, of course, we shall then find a way forward that ensures that the punishment is visited on the defaulting party, whoever that defaulting party may be. That is obvious; it is right and just.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I echo the words of the Leader of the Opposition in thanking the Prime Minister and, indeed, Taoiseach Ahern for the amount of time that they have devoted to this issue, and for spending all of last week in Belfast. It is appreciated and, as the Prime Minister is aware, it is also appreciated by my Assembly colleagues—even if we differ slightly as to the outcome of matters.

The Prime Minister knows that my Assembly colleagues and I want to see devolution, and that we want to see actual decommissioning occur. However, he also knows that, in asking us to include Sinn Fein in an Executive in advance of decommissioning, he asks us to sacrifice the democratic principle to expediency. He is asking us to take a gamble with an ineffective and unfair safety net. That point has already been made. The question is: why close all the institutions? In effect, why give a veto to the paramilitaries? That would mean that, if the IRA does not like the results of, say, the Patten commission on policing, it could close things down, simply by delaying decommissioning. It also gives other paramilitaries a veto.

What will happen if the UDA, the UVF, the LVF or the INLA decide that they will stop decommissioning in order to destroy all the institutions of the agreements? That is not an effective remedy. The remedy should be directed towards the parties in default. With regard to the other paramilitaries, closing the Executive is no penalty; the only possible penalty has to do with prisoners. That has to be looked at again.

Finally, does the Prime Minister recall that, at the beginning of last week, he was seeking a series of declarations—especially one from Sinn Fein that the war was finished, over, done with and gone? He also wanted from Sinn Fein a declaration that it will succeed in persuading those with arms to decommission. He was also seeking from the IRA a statement that, in effect, accepted the Sinn Fein statement. What happened to those declarations?

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his kind words about the time that we spent in Belfast. I do not regret any of the time that I spend in Belfast—occasionally, I wish it were slightly more productive. I also thank him for the constructive way in which he has engaged in the negotiations. I entirely understand the anxieties that he rightly represents.

If the issue is the democratic principle that we cannot sit in government with people who have a private army in reserve, every democrat would agree with that. The reason why I believe this process to be superior to Hillsborough is that, in the Hillsborough declaration, we could have had a token act of decommissioning, but we could still have been sitting in an Executive with people who had a private army. After all, if they get rid of one load of weapons, that is not the same as getting rid of everything. It is, therefore, better to have a process of complete decommissioning; I think that the right hon. Gentleman would accept that. The issue is simply how it starts. I hope that I have provided some assurance as to that by saying that the process of decommissioning, which begins with the explicit statement on behalf of the paramilitary organisation, has to start within days, otherwise, we go back immediately and rewind the position.

The second point that the right hon. Gentleman makes is about the ineffective and unfair safety net. Surely that is precisely what we should try to discuss in the coming days, because there will have to be legislation, which will be properly scrutinised, and the points that he is making—perfectly fairly—need to be taken into account. For example, he asks why groups that have not decommissioned should have a veto over the process. In a sense, one could say that, by not decommissioning now, they have a veto over the process, but I think that our way of dealing with it prevents them from having a veto because the suspension is not the only thing that happens. We then go into a review, and then we can invite the parties to take a different way forward. So we do not—and should not—end up in a situation where the defaulting party manages to bring punishment upon everyone else and no punishment upon itself. I agree with that. Again, we are happy to look at a way that we can deal with that objection.

In respect also of the loyalists, I think that it is very important to realise that, although the loyalists will not be part of the Executive, none the less they have the obligation to decommission. The entire range of factors that must be taken into account are very clearly set out in the legislation on prisoners, and I would refer back to them in detail.

The right hon. Gentleman also asked whether it would be right to end up closing all the institutions. There was an implication there—this may be a misunderstanding—that all those institutions would come to an end and never be revived. That would not be my view as to the way forward. There must be a suspension—otherwise, the Unionists are left on the Executive with those who have refused to decommission or are in breach of their agreement—but then we must find a way forward that ensures that the institutions do work again, but work in a way that is consistent with the democratic mandate of the Ulster Unionist party and the other parties, ensuring that those parties in default pay the price for being in default.

Finally, in relation to the declarations by Sinn Fein and the IRA, I have set out where the IRA would have to make its statement, but I want to make this point very, very clear indeed. We could have decided to go with a process that depended on words. We have decided not to do that. This process depends on actual decommissioning happening—actions. If there are not actions, the failsafe kicks in immediately. So I am not asking us to be in a situation where we are expecting democrats to sit in the Executive with organisations linked to paramilitary groups, which then can simply sit there, keeping their weapons, no one being able to do anything about it. We are not saying that words are the protection. There has to be actual decommissioning. If there is not actual decommissioning, the failsafe kicks in, and then we can find a different, and better, way forward.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the Taoiseach on the tenacity of purpose that they showed over the past week and their determination to try to bring to an end more than 30 years of mayhem, death and destruction. I also pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who has been most unfairly pilloried during the past few days. She has the admiration and support of every Labour Member.

Can my right hon. Friend confirm that any Executive must have the support of both sides of the community; that on each side of the community more than one party must agree with what is going on; and that, therefore, it does not necessarily follow that there could be an Executive without Sinn Fein?

Secondly, can my right hon. Friend confirm that, for the first time, he has got from Sinn Fein an understanding that he has regarded as being one of the greatest movements of position in politics in Ireland for many, many years? That must be put to the test, and the way that he has suggested puts it to the test. Anyone who would seek to throw that away in a fit of pique or because they wanted every t crossed and every i dotted would, if they persisted in that, be subject to a great deal of deserved criticism from all the peoples in these islands.

The Prime Minister: First, I think that I know better than anyone else what my right hon. Friend has had to go through over the past two years in doing her job. I know of the difficulties that it has caused her from time to time. I can assure the House that I am second to none in my admiration for the way in which she has done her job.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) made a very correct point about both sides of the community. We should never forget that more parties than Sinn Fein and the Ulster Unionists are involved in these matters. There are other political parties with a mandate—most notably there is the SDLP, but there are others which also need to be taken account of.

Thirdly, as for Sinn Fein and the statements that it has made, I believe that it is prepared to make this historic shift. However, I do not believe that the Unionists should have to rely upon that. That is why I think that it is right to put it to the test. The detail obviously matters as well, and I hope that it is properly scrutinised. I only ask people to let us have a discussion about the detail to see whether the justifiable anxieties and concerns can be allayed.

Mr. John Major (Huntingdon): It is possible that we may be near the conclusion of a very long trail. I hope that everyone will look clearly at both the opportunities and the difficulties that lie immediately ahead of us.

The Prime Minister and the party leaders have done extraordinarily well to expose the questions that were always going to be there at the end of the day—will the IRA decommission and can the word of Sinn Fein bind the IRA and its future actions? If the answer to those questions is yes, I think that peace is at hand and that democracy has a triumph. If the answers are no, the Prime Minister is surely right to say that Sinn Fein cannot sit on the power-sharing Executive. In those circumstances, I would seek some clarification.

The Prime Minister said a moment ago that the Executive and perhaps the Assembly would be suspended. Will he confirm that that would happen very briefly? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Irish Government agree with that policy, and with the Executive and the Assembly then continuing without Sinn Fein? Will he tell the House also whether he has discussed or will discuss with all the political parties, including most importantly for this purpose the Catholic majority party, the SDLP, whether they would remain in an Executive and an Assembly were Sinn Fein to have been removed from it for not decommissioning its arms? That is a crucial point.

As the Prime Minister will know, the fear in Ulster is very straightforward. It is that Sinn Fein will enter the Executive, the IRA will not then disarm, Sinn Fein will assert that it is separate from the IRA, and that there will then be pressure for it to remain on the Executive for fear that its removal would be the trigger for a fresh bout of violence. That is the fear of many people in Ulster. Upon that, I found the Prime Minister's statement of a few moments ago to be encouraging. However, will he be absolutely clear that he would not permit that to happen and that the legislation that will come before the House will ensure by its provisions that that could not happen? If that were to be the position, I think that many of the fears in the House and beyond would be removed.

Finally, does the Prime Minister agree that political pressure from London and Dublin to try to ensure that we can finally produce a peace at the end of a long process is entirely justified, but that it should focus on the paramilitaries and not upon the democratic political parties?

The Prime Minister: First, I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his work; he really began this process. I know that there is a great deal of gratitude for all of the work that he did on this issue while Prime Minister. I think that I can confirm all of the points that he has raised. It is the position of both Governments that it is open to the parties to continue in an Executive without Sinn Fein. I simply repeat that I cannot force people to sit on the Executive together, but it is open to them to do so. The SDLP must make its position clear, but I understand that it is prepared to move forward without Sinn Fein should the circumstances be such that Sinn Fein is clearly the defaulting party. However, the SDLP must make its own statement on that.

I entirely understand the right hon. Gentleman's point about the fear in Ulster. He will know that people would not want the situation to be left in the hands of the two Governments. That is because they know that the two Governments will be subject to pressures. They would know and would fear—I think that this would be the fear of Unionists—that the two Governments would be under such pressure to keep the process going on any basis that even if Sinn Fein defaulted, some way would be found of ignoring the default. That is why I have suggested that the decommissioning process is in the hands of the independent commission. The commission will lay down the timetable for decommissioning and certify every step in the way. There will be an automatic kicking-in of the failsafe should the commission not certificate that progress is being made or should it certificate that progress is not being made. In other words, there is no possibility of the Unionists being made to sit in the Executive with Sinn Fein, if Sinn Fein is in breach of the undertakings that it gave.

The purpose of making sure that the initial statement, within days of devolution, is on behalf of the paramilitary organisation is to get rid of the notion, once and for all, that a statement by one of the political parties linked to those groups is enough. It is not. The statement must be from the paramilitary organisation, it must be, in the words that we have set out, "clear and unambiguous" in the intention to decommission, and it must be combined with the appointment of a representative to ensure that that happens. We are guarded against the very point that the right hon. Gentleman rightly says we should be guarded against.

It is worth quoting the conclusion of an editorial today in the Belfast Telegraph, which is ready to be pretty sceptical about most of the deals and agreements. It states:

"On balance therefore, we believe that the deal is worth a try, worth further examination and refinement but certainly should not be subject to rejection out of hand."

That is what the Belfast Telegraph has written today, and I ask all parties to try to ensure that that is the case.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), who started the peace process knows full well, during the 18 years that we were in opposition, we supported the then Government at every stage over Northern Ireland, and we did so because it was in the national interest. Will my right hon. Friend consider letting the Ulster Unionists know, when he next meets them, that the large silent majority in Britain has always supported the wish of most people in Northern Ireland to remain part of the United Kingdom, but that they undoubtedly support the Good Friday agreement?

If there is slightest doubt about the wishes of the vast majority of British people with regard to the Good Friday agreement, could there be an opportunity to allow people on the mainland to vote, as people voted in Northern Ireland and in the Irish Republic? If there were such a vote, it would be even larger than in those two places for an agreement that leads to the possibility of a permanent peace in Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his support. The Good Friday agreement was agreed in referendums north and south. I believe that with the certainty that we now provide about the link between the Executive and the decommissioning process, support for the agreement should be reinvigorated.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Is the Prime Minister aware that his comment that there is a total lack of trust between different sides can be readily endorsed? Does he recognise that, because of that lack of trust, it is difficult to have much confidence in decommissioning, certainly if one reads the comments of General de Chastelain? None the less, the House would accept that the Prime Minister may have sources of information and further knowledge that he cannot share with the House which give him confidence that there will be the seismic shift that he described, but which is not apparent in any of the documents currently available to us.

I still have one reservation. The Prime Minister speaks of the failsafe kicking-in, but it seems to me that there is no failsafe until 20 May, which is the moment at which it would become clear that decommissioning had not taken place. Unionists therefore face the prospect of sitting in an Executive during that period.

Against that background, the last words of the Belfast Telegraph editorial that the Prime Minister quoted, about the need for further consideration and refinement, not outright rejection—I strongly agree with that—and the reassurance for Unionists to which the leader of the Liberal party referred, are extremely significant.

Does the Prime Minister agree that it is sad that no member of the SDLP is to be seen in the House today? I saw the television broadcast which implied that there were only two political parties in Northern Ireland, in the shape of the Unionists and Sinn Fein, but I believe that the role of the SDLP as the majority non-violent nationalist party is very important.

The Prime Minister: I agree with the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes.

In relation to the detail, I should explain that the failsafe device kicks in at several stages up to May 2000. That is the benefit of the agreement that we have. Under the Good Friday agreement, there was no failsafe up until May 2000. Now we have agreed that, within a few days, the decommissioning process has to start with the statement of intent. After that, there will be the first report on actual decommissioning. Then there will be further reports all the way through to May 2000.

The Unionists will not be left in the Executive with Sinn Fein and the IRA doing nothing about weapons. The decommissioning process will get under way virtually straight away and has to be followed through all the way to May 2000. That is a far tighter timetable and agreement than we had before and they are in the hands of de Chastelain. As I said in answer to questions earlier, people would not accept it if they were in the hands of the two Governments, but most people who have talked to General de Chastelain know that he is deadly serious about decommissioning happening. If it does not happen, he will not certify it as happening.

The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) rightly said that General de Chastelain makes it clear in his report that he is not yet fully satisfied that decommissioning will happen. Correct. Never mind private assurances that are given—I do not take the private assurances that are given either. The only thing that will do for me is decommissioning actually happening. That is why we have set out this process, but if we do not test it out, we will never know whether decommissioning is to be delivered or not.

Perhaps I should make this point as well: people will say, "Why don't you get the decommissioning first and then the Executive?" Under the Good Friday agreement that is put the other way round. It is not a precondition to establishing the Executive that there should be decommissioning, but it is an obligation. We have to marry those two obligations, which is why we have attempted to do it in the way that I have described.

Let us be clear: we want republicans to succeed. If they can bring about decommissioning that will be a huge step forward for everyone. To be fair to them, they have always made it clear to me that they can achieve it if it is in line with the Good Friday agreement, but not if it is a departure from it. That is why they rejected Hillsborough, even though in many ways it offered an easier deal for them.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): As the last remaining Member of the House who was in the Cabinet 30 years ago when the troops were sent in—one of many unsuccessful attempts to impose peace in Northern Ireland by force from London—may I add my sincere congratulations to the Prime Minister on the time, effort, patience and imagination that he and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have shown and for which there is absolutely no precedent from any previous Prime Minister? Therefore criticism from the other side of the House should not concern him too much.

Will the Prime Minister consider the fact that, whatever the setbacks and difficulties, and there will be both, he should retain two principles at the forefront of his mind? I am sure that he will do so. First, peace and justice in Northern Ireland depend on the involvement of the two communities, and Sinn Fein has the democratic legitimacy of the ballot box. That is the basis of its entitlement to consideration. Secondly, will he cling, above all, to close relations with Dublin? For the first time since partition, London and Dublin jointly oversee the prospects of peace in Northern Ireland. That, along with a settlement of the difficulty that he has described, offers our best hope for a future in the next century quite different from the tragedy that has befallen Northern Ireland in our own lifetime.

The Prime Minister: I thank my right hon. Friend for his kind words.

This is a clear agreement—a deal. For the nationalist and republican communities, there has to be justice and equality. There has to be an end to discrimination. There has to be a genuine sense of sharing power and responsibility. In return, however, once that full ripening of democracy comes about, all people clearly have to give up the notion that violence can be run alongside the ballot box. From now on, people have to make a choice. The next few weeks are the moment of choice for Northern Ireland. People have to decide whether they are prepared, in return for justice and equality, to forswear the use of violence for ever. I hope that they make that choice.

Our relations with the Irish Government offer an opportunity to provide a way forward. The Irish Government and Prime Minister are entirely sincere in wanting to make sure that violence and the gun are taken out of the politics of Ireland for ever. We should work with them to ensure that that is so.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): If there is any delay in disarming and decommissioning by loyalist paramilitaries, who would not necessarily be adversely affected by that decision, would General de Chastelain have any latitude in the certificates that he gives to others whose behaviour might be affected?

The Prime Minister: No. The obligations stand alone for each group. Each of them has a responsibility to decommission, and for one to say that it would not decommission would give no excuse to others. Everyone has the same obligation, and the penalties can be exacted accordingly.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): I congratulate the Prime Minister on his determination and perseverance in the inevitably complex pursuit of peace in Northern Ireland. While the achievements of the Good Friday agreement necessarily focus on the saving of lives, does he agree that it is important to note openings for increased standards of living for the people of Northern Ireland that are emerging from the new east-west trade routes developed as a result of the agreement? In particular, the Irish Business and Employers Confederation, the Northern Ireland CBI and the north-west development agency are developing links at present.

In view of the overwhelming importance of saving life, increasing living standards and establishing normality of life for the people of Northern Ireland, does my right hon. Friend agree that the House should support his statement, and that—in and out of Parliament—we should support groups who have difficulties, rather than seeking to exacerbate the problems?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The potential for jobs, investment and improved living standards is immeasurably increased by a viable peace process. Northern Ireland has an enormous amount to offer inward investors and companies that wish to do business. People should be able to invest in Northern Ireland in the knowledge that a proper political process is under way.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): I, too, commend the Prime Minister on his diligent search for an agreement.

General de Chastelain indicated in his report that he asked the paramilitary groups and parties to respond to two questions—were they committed to disarmament within the terms of the Good Friday agreement, and when would the Government receive details of the modalities? Does the Prime Minister recall that General de Chastelain said that no response was received from either the IRA or the UDA by the 28 June deadline? Will the Prime Minister give us some insight into the discussions held since 28 June with the IRA, either by General de Chastelain or by Ministers, which have enabled him to give so much more encouraging a statement to the House today?

The Prime Minister: I think, again, that is vital to stress certain points. The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that de Chastelain made it clear that he could not say at present that there would be decommissioning. That is why the agreement that we have entered into is not dependent on anyone's saying that there will be decommissioning, but, in the first instance, on the paramilitaries—whether the IRA or the loyalists—giving a statement of intention to decommission, which will be followed by a declaration of satisfaction from the Independent Commission on Decommissioning that that is so.

Actions are what matter. People say that I have received great assurances from Sinn Fein or the IRA that they are about to move ahead, and I believe that the political leadership of Sinn Fein wants the process to work. But my belief is not enough, and assurances are not enough. We have constructed a process in which, unless assurances translate into deeds, people will not sit in the Executive alongside democrats. That is the important point to remember. All sorts of discussions were held last week, and all sorts of assurances given. However, we have learned often enough in Northern Ireland that we cannot pay attention simply to assurances. Unless the assurances are followed by deeds, there is no deal.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I should also like to congratulate the Prime Minister and all those involved in these strenuous negotiations. I should particularly like to congratulate the Official Unionists on what they have achieved in the past three years. If one had said three years ago that the Official Unionists had achieved the principle of consent, backed by the people of Ireland, north and south, in a referendum, it would have been difficult to believe. If one had said that there was to be a massive devolution of legislative powers to Northern Ireland, it would have been difficult to believe. Now all the IRA's armaments and other weapons may be decommissioned by next May. There are failsafes. Does the Prime Minister agree that, if the Official Unionists go along with this agreement, it will be the most miraculous negotiation that anyone has ever achieved?

The Prime Minister: It has not happened yet.

I thank my hon. Friend for the work that he did as Labour Opposition spokesman on Northern Ireland. If we do not put this to the test, we will never know whether decommissioning would have happened. That is why it would be foolish to throw away the chance of getting the decommissioning of all paramilitary weapons by May 2000. My hon. Friend is right to say that many of the issues are already resolved. The issues that have torn apart negotiations in Northern Ireland for years and years, such as the principle of consent, the idea of an Assembly, and the changes to the Irish constitution, are now resolved.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I, too, join in the tributes that have been paid to the Prime Minister for his persistence. Does not he accept that the complexities that he has painstakingly explained to the House, however well-intentioned they may be, would be wholly unnecessary if the men of violence were prepared to lay down their arms? What makes the Prime Minister suppose that, if they have genuinely given up violence but refuse to lay down their arms now, so that the Executive can commence, they will lay down their arms in days, weeks or months from now?

The Prime Minister: The simple answer to that question is, if they do not, they will not sit in the Executive with the Unionists. It is up to them what they do now. They have always said that they will decommission in the context of the implementation of the agreement and the establishment of the institution. Let us see it. If it does not happen, they will not sit in the Executive with the Unionists. If it does happen, we should all be grateful. We must put it to the test. We will never get out of this situation unless we finally throw down the challenge to them, put them to the test, and see whether the test is met.

[The Prime Minister]

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I, too, join in congratulating the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State on their patience and expertise in all these negotiations, and on the prize that that offers of peace in Northern Ireland and long-term peace for all the island of Ireland. I am sure that he recognises the enormous movements that have been made by the nationalist and Unionist communities in reaching this close position in which we may get long-term peace. I am sure that he, too, wants to see a non-military Northern Ireland in the future. Were there any discussions in the past week or will there be anything in the legislation that he proposes to introduce on limiting the private ownership of licensed arms and the large number of gun clubs in Northern Ireland? Having reached a point at which decommissioning is a real possibility, we surely would not want to see a growth of private arms, which could lead to the destabilisation of a peaceful Ireland in the future.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind words. The tricky issues that he raised in the latter part of his question should be resolved in the longer term. The immediate task is to establish a framework which spells out a guarantee for the parties. That guarantee will allow us to ensure that both devolution and decommissioning occur. That is the primary task.

Finance Bill [WAYS AND MEANS]

CAPITAL ALLOWANCES (FIRST YEAR ALLOWANCES)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in the Finance Bill restricting the expenditure on machinery and plant for use in Northern Ireland in respect of which 100 per cent. first year allowances may be made.—[Mrs. Roche.]

OIL TAXATION (ANTI-AVOIDANCE)

Resolved,

That provision may be included in the Finance Bill about—

(a) the receipts which are to be treated as tariff receipts or disposal receipts attributable to an oil field;

(b) the persons who are to be treated as participators in an oil field; and

(c) the time for payment of petroleum revenue tax.—[Mrs. Roche.]

FINANCE BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Finance Bill, it is expedient to authorise any increase in the sums payable out of or into the National Loans Fund attributable to any provision of that Act relating to borrowing from the General Account of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise or the General Account of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.—[Mrs. Roche.]

FINANCE BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

CHARGEABLE GAINS: ABSOLUTE ENTITLEMENT TO SETTLED PROPERTY

Resolved,

That provision may be made in the Finance Bill amending section 71 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992.—[Mrs. Roche.]

GOODS FOR SALE ON BOARD SHIPS OR AIRCRAFT

Motion made, and Question proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(b),

That provision may be made in the Finance Bill amending section 1 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 as respects stores.—[Mrs. Roche.]

4.26 pm

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Will the Financial Secretary tell us why she considers the motion to be necessary?

4.26 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I certainly will.

We shall have a number of debates today on the matters covered by the motions, and during those debates, we will explain exactly why we are dealing with them in this way. It is, of course, natural for representations to be made during the passage of a Finance Bill, not only by hon. Members on both sides of the House—

Mr. McLoughlin: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Mrs. Roche: Not at this stage. It will be my great pleasure to give way to the not-so-silent Whip when the time comes.

As I was saying, it is right for representations to be made not only by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but by industry. That has been the normal course of events during not only this Bill's passage, but the passage of Finance Bills under the Conservative Administration. Being a listening Government, we listen and take representations into consideration.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): In due course, we shall debate the substance of the new clauses that deal with goods for sale on board ships and aircraft, but this motion paves the way for that substantive discussion. I think that this an appropriate time for us to ask a number of pertinent questions relating to the amounts of the taxes and duties being raised, which are of some significance, and which we debated to an extent when similar matters dealt with in statutory instruments came before the Standing Committee last week.

Can the Paymaster General—or the Financial Secretary, on her behalf—tell us how much money will be raised by this and associated measures? Can she also say how she envisages the money being used? If, as seemed clear in Committee, it is to go directly into the Consolidated Fund—as we would expect—what projections have been made as part of the forward look, how far have the figures already been incorporated in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's projections, and will any revisions to those projections be required?

In Committee, the Paymaster General waxed eloquent about the Government's difficulty in forecasting the financial effects with any degree of accuracy. [Interruption.] As the Financial Secretary says, from a sedentary position, she explained that it would be difficult to forecast the total effect of the change relating to duty-free sales. I assume that this measure will form part of those arrangements. If there is a difficulty of forecasting, how can appropriate numbers have been figured into the Chancellor's calculations? However, if numbers have been figured into his calculations, how can there be the difficulty of calculation to which she alluded during the Committee's consideration of the measure?

The answers to those questions will be helpful when it comes to consideration of the subsequent matters that are associated with the motion, and which fall to be debated a little later.

4.30 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I have a couple of questions to which I would welcome an answer when we debate the substance later. Both relate to the amount of money that will be raised by the measures.

The first relates to something that the Minister said in the Eighth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation last week. One of the concessions that the Government said that they had obtained was that items that are dutiable, but consumed on board an aircraft or ship, would continue to be "free of tax"—I quote from the Hansard of the Committee. Before we start our debate later, may we be told whether it is free of tax—VAT—or free of VAT and duty? We need to have that point clarified, so that, when we debate the substance, we shall know exactly how much the concession is worth. If it concerns only VAT, it is hardly worth anything. If it concerns VAT and duty, it is a significant concession. That is something that we must debate, but we need the financial facts first.

On the other matter, I would be enormously grateful if, at the start of the debate on the substantive matters, the Government could let us have a list of those ports and airports that are geographically within the European Union, but to which the measures would not apply. What is the value of that concession, or exemption from the regulations that they seek to bring in? I should be grateful for answers to both those questions before we start the main debate.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): I, too, would like to express my concern that there has been insufficient analysis of the split between duty and VAT, which my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) has already mentioned. In particular, I wonder whether the resolutions would apply to airports and ports, or only the vessels and aircraft themselves. If they apply to airports, in the collection of VAT, how will a distinction be made between travel within the European Union and transportation that is undertaken by passengers outside the European Union—where, of course, the issue will be duty free?

The Minister will be aware that, for example, terminal 3 at London Heathrow has aircraft travelling to the European Union, to other parts of Europe that are not part of the EU and to the United States of America. Has she made any analysis of the burden on shops in trying to determine whether a boarding card is for the EU or outside the EU? Has she made any projections of how much extra revenue will be derived gross over the next five years from the collection of VAT and/or duties, compared with the actual disbursements by the state over the next five years as part of our contribution to membership of the EU?

Has the Minister estimated the costs that will be incurred by Government in ensuring that the new regime will be administered properly? Presumably, extra staff will be employed by Customs and Excise to ensure that the duties are maintained correctly. If that is so, what will be the marginal cost of employing extra staff for each of the next five years? For that period, what burden will the state—and, therefore, taxpayers—bear in implementing the measure?

4.35 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Will the Minister tell us the implications for our further debates of approving motion 5? Motion 1 states that provision may be made in the Bill

"including provision having retrospective effect".

However, in the paper submitted on 12 May, in Brussels, to the code of conduct group, the Minister said:

"This Scheme has been legislated but not yet activated."

If there has been some error, will it have an impact on our further debates, bearing in mind that there is provision for retrospectivity in something that has not yet been—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are debating motion 5, not motion 1. As far as I can see, there is nothing in motion 1 about a retrospective effect.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am not questioning that point. I am asking the Minister what relevance the motion will have to our future debates. I was simply citing the matter as an example of something that has already happened.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Has my hon. Friend the Paymaster General had an opportunity to look back over the papers from any previous Government who, 15 years ago, were aware of what would happen on the matter? Has she had access to the calculations that were made then? Will she also tell us whether she has had any access to the terms of reference of BAA plc on its responsibility being divided between the administration of airports and the creation of shopping malls?

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Motion 5 is important, as it could have a significant effect on not only the public, but on Ways and Means motions generally and on the Government's finances. It is a thoroughly unpopular measure, which is being foisted on the British people against their will. However, the matter has now been settled and we cannot argue about it.

The Government pray in aid the fact that the measure will have a significant impact on Government revenue, as those who are affected by it will have to pay duty. Nevertheless, today, I think that we have to hear a bit more from the Minister about the precise revenue implications of a thoroughly unpopular and draconian tax increase being imposed on those who are simply trying to buy something on board a ship or aeroplane.

In this short debate, the Government might also make clear the precise implications of the measure for the various tax regimes as—now that we are getting rid of duty free—even the shortest journey by sea or air might pass through different tax regimes. It is not clear how the measure will be implemented in practice, or how the tax will be levied.

Therefore, not only will the public be losing a highly valued privilege—which they have enjoyed for a very long time—and the Government, by underhand means, be receiving revenue that they had not previously expected, but the public will be put to various inconveniences.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend mentioned implementation of the measure and various tax regimes. Does he accept that there could be very real difficulty in collecting duty from travellers on a flight going to a European Union destination and then on to a non-European Union destination? How does he imagine that Customs and Excise will ensure that the correct duties are applied at the correct time?

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend made that point in his excellent earlier comments. It certainly has not been made clear, to the House or the public, how that problem will be resolved. Clearly, different rates will apply according to whether a flight or sea journey originates from a European Union destination or from a non-European Union destination. However, a part of some air or sea journeys originating in a non-European destination will be made in the European Union. What tax will people pay on those journeys? The public could be very confused. The situation is not acceptable.

We should also consider the potential for the Exchequer to lose revenue because people in Dover and the Heathrow area will lose their jobs as a result of the loss of duty-free concessions. We now hear that such has been the profit margin of many duty-free shops that they can apparently afford to ensure that the public buy their whisky or cigarettes for the same prices as before. That may be the case, but the Government cannot rely on it. They must come clean and explain the revenue implications.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my hon. Friend share my concerns and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) about the confusion in the collection of duties between EU and non-EU areas, and the considerable doubt about the sums that will be collected, depending on whether the duties concerned are VAT duties or excise duties in the normal sense of the word? Does he agree that it will be interesting to hear whether the Paymaster General is able to answer my questions about the differentiation between the collection of excise and VAT duties?

Mr. Leigh: The differentiation between excise and VAT duties is very interesting. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) also referred to it. I hope that the Paymaster General will be able to enlighten us. I have certainly received no enlightenment so far.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend's remarks bring to mind a further oddity. Does he agree that the clause to which this motion refers would reduce the revenue accruing to the Exchequer? Is it not odd to have such a Ways and Means motion?

Mr. Leigh: I am not sure whether it is very usual. I do not understand why the Government are apparently reducing the revenue coming to the Exchequer. I cannot believe that that is their intention. I am sure that there is some misunderstanding.

What will be the effect of the revenue from duty free not being available for reinvestment in terminals and the transport network? That useful source of revenue will now be lost—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must counsel the hon. Gentleman that he is going far too far.

Mr. Leigh: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. All those points have implications for the Ways and Means motion. If that revenue is no longer available, the Government must make up the shortfall somehow. The motion is incredibly important and we should have a proper debate on it. It should not just go through on the nod as yet another Ways and Means motion. The implications for the Exchequer are enormous. The public are being made to suffer. The Government are introducing an underhand tax rise which the public did not ask for. It is incumbent on the Minister to explain the implications for Ways and Means.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend is right to say that the issue should not go through on the nod. Was it not the Speaker's decision that up to 45 minutes should be allowed for debate on each of the Ways and Means motions? Would it not be an insult to the House if we merely nodded them through?

Mr. Leigh: We saw earlier that the Minister was trying to nod things through at the rate of an express train, moving motions formally. That is not acceptable. The British people demand explanations from the Government and we intend to get them in this short debate of a mere 45 minutes. The public are angry and want an answer. It is incumbent on the Minister to give an answer from the Dispatch Box. If she does not, we should vote against the motion.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The new provisions, which the motion provides the way for, would bring into United Kingdom legislation directive 92/12 EEC, which allowed only until 30 June 1999 the continuation of duty free for passengers to take away at the end of an intra-Community flight or sea crossing. I am sure that at the heart of all the points that have been made is a concern for passengers. I am delighted to be able to tell the House that shopping at Gatwick was easier than ever this morning. Gone are the complicated restrictions for Community travellers, who can now purchase as much as they like, duty paid. The tax-free shops have risen to the challenge and created a marketing opportunity, as we knew they would.

All travellers pay the same price for non-dutiable goods. Almost all prices have been held, emphasising what a good deal this is for the consumer. There is plenty of advice on hand, and travellers and retailers alike have adapted quickly to the new rules. BAA, for example, announced last week that it was holding at least 90 per cent. of all prices at exactly the same level.

Mr. Fabricant: I am not sure whether the right hon. Lady's remarks are strictly on Ways and Means. However, will she clarify how those concerned at terminal 3 at Heathrow, or at the Gatwick terminals—where travellers go within and outside the EU—know what VAT or duties to charge or not to charge? How do they know the passenger's ultimate destination?

Dawn Primarolo: It is up to the duty-free shop to ascertain whether the person is travelling within the EU or outside the EU. All travellers must produce their ticket to purchase at a duty-free shop, and the new technology in shops has been altered to cope with the arrangements.

Mr. Wilshire: I want to ask the hon. Lady about the figures for Gatwick, which are clearly important, as the sales post-duty free will determine the amount of revenue that the Government get. What proportion of the sales was to people travelling from Gatwick to the EU, and what proportion was sold to those travelling from Gatwick to destinations outside the EU? That will tell us how much is duty paid and duty free, and will enable this House to determine what income the Government will receive. The other thing that we need to know—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman can make a brief intervention, but not a second speech.

Mr. Wilshire: I understand your point entirely, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What quantity of goods within those figures is being bought by individuals, so we know how much extra is being taken on aircraft?

Dawn Primarolo: I intended to assure Opposition Members that airports and ports—I gave Gatwick as an example—were coping admirably with the new arrangements. Alas, I do not have responsibility for the commercial success or the figures of those shops, or for the flow of business through them. I was addressing whether things were running smoothly at our airports.

Conservative Members asked me about the expected increase in revenue, and VAT in particular, following the change in arrangements. Last week, we discussed a statutory instrument that also amended our legislation, and I made it clear to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) and others that it is difficult to give a precise estimate, as the increase will depend entirely on the decisions of shoppers and those who provide the facilities for them.

It is estimated—it is only an estimate—that there could be an increase of £120 million a year, but that depends entirely on how the companies providing the services seize on the new commercial opportunities that are now open to them. That is certainly outside the Government's control. I made it clear in Committee that we would monitor closely how the arrangements work and assess whether they continue to provide the best opportunities that we can secure after the abolition of duty free.

The hon. Member for Spelthorne asked two specific questions, and I hope that it will be in order for me to answer them now. First, I can confirm that consumption on board, once the journey has started, will be free of both VAT and excise duty. Secondly, the territories involved outside the EC fiscal area are Andorra; the Åland Islands; the Channel Islands; Gibraltar; the Republic of San Marino; the Canary Islands; the overseas departments of France; and Mount Athos. I am sure that that will help the hon. Gentleman enormously when he takes part in the relevant debate later.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) asked about regulations, especially with regard to airports. I have not seen any. She asked about the preparation undertaken by the previous Government. There was no preparation, to my knowledge, and that made the task all the more difficult for the Government and the traders as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sought a deferment of the abolition of duty free, to enable us to get a good successor regime in place. We had very little time. There has been great co-operation between the traders, airport authorities, ferry companies and Customs and Excise to try to get the best result for everyone.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Oliver Letwin.

Mr. Letwin: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was going to try to intervene on the Minister, but she finished before I could. I want to ask—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologise. I had not realised that the hon. Gentleman had already spoken. I called the Minister on the understanding that she was winding up the debate, so we must now put the Question.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That provision may be made in the Finance Bill amending section 1 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 as respects stores.

WORKS OF ART, ANTIQUES, ETC.

Motion made, and Question proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No.52 (1) (b),

That provision may be made in the Finance Bill amending section 21 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

4.54 pm

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): It is unusual for the House to discuss so many Ways and Means motions. That says a lot about the Treasury's lack of organisation. In the case of this particular motion, it has been known for a long time that certain provisions would have to be made in respect of the art market if the Government failed in their attempt to negotiate a better deal with our European partners. The fact that the motion has been tabled now raises the question of why it was not tabled earlier in the Bill's passage, so that we could have had a proper and detailed debate in Committee on the terms of the new clause that the motion is intended to support.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a real difficulty under the terms of the Ways and Means motion in calculating the additional revenues that will accrue to the Government? Does he also agree that, far from raising funds, the measure would diminish the funds raised by the state by causing a deterioration of the art market in the United Kingdom, in which case, one has to ask why a Ways and Means motion has been tabled?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing me to my next point, which is to question whether a Ways and Means motion is required. It is known that, when VAT at 2.5 per cent. was introduced on works of art, the volume of international sales conducted in London fell by 40 per cent. If that volume were to fall by a further 40 per cent. when the duty doubles to 5 per cent., which is the effect of the measure that we shall debate later this evening, the amount of revenue raised would go down, not up. Indeed, it has been intimated by those who know a great deal about that market that the level of sales will collapse to almost nothing, so there will be a serious shortfall in the amount that the Government expect to raise. Therefore, a pertinent question for the Paymaster General is, will she confirm how much money is being raised now from the current provision, and how much more or less is expected to be raised once the new provision has been implemented?

I raised the issue of the future of the art market and the tax threat with the Prime Minister in the House a few months ago. I was told that his Government would use all the means at their disposal to ensure the right outcome. I was given to understand that the Government were prepared to use the Luxembourg compromise to force our partners in Europe to think more clearly about an issue wherein they have nothing to gain and we have everything to lose. Why have the Government failed to allow the House a debate on that subject until now? Why have they not been prepared to invoke the Luxembourg compromise in this respect?

In the papers the other day, we read the spin about the Government having saved the art market from a new tax: we were told that the Government's negotiations had averted a tax called droit de suite, which would certainly have been another nail in the coffin of international art sales in London. Why did the Government claim to have saved the art market from a new tax only a few days before introducing a measure to double an existing tax on the art market in this country?

We need to know why there are spurious definitions in the new clause, and what effect any relaxation of those definitions would have on the revenue to be collected under the Ways and Means measure. Why are limited editions acceptable, provided there are no more than eight—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now straying into the territory of the new clause. If, when we come to debate the new clause, he is fortunate enough to catch my eye, he might be able to explore such points at that time, but I would suggest that he does not do so now.

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand from my hon. Friend's arguments and the views expressed by others that the art market is to be diminished, so tax revenue will be reduced. Therefore, is it in order for us to debate a Ways and Means motion, which is primarily used to increase revenues?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is nothing out of order about a Ways and Means motion in such circumstances. However, hon. Members will help the Chair if they try to maintain a strict distinction between the debate on the Ways and Means motion and the debate that they will have later on the new clause in the Bill to which it refers.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, I understood that during a debate on a Ways and Means resolution, we could ask Treasury Ministers exactly what sums they expect to raise. I ask them what is their estimate of the revenue to be raised in respect of limited editions under the various categories listed. Have they given any thought to how much revenue they might lose if the definitions were rather more relaxed? They seem absurdly tight at the moment.

Of all the definitions and restrictions, perhaps the most significant is that which relates to works of art imported into the EU or the UK and then exported outside the EU within 12 months. What is the impact of that provision on the revenue to be raised? What would be the impact if that period were extended to 24 or 36 months? Surely works of art of the kind that we are considering in this debate are typically held by collectors for long periods.

If the intention of the measure is to exempt certain categories to help the international art market in London, surely it would be reasonable for the exemption to last for a period longer than 12 months that would take into account the very long time that it sometimes takes to negotiate the sale of a work of art. Such works of art could then still come through London; otherwise, sales will be lost to centres outside the European Union, such as Geneva and New York.

The estimate that I gave the Prime Minister, with which he agreed, was that 5,000 jobs in our economy—mostly in London, but throughout the UK—are at risk because of this measure. Why, at this late stage, are the Government trying to spring on the House a proposal that will probably cost this country 5,000 jobs without giving us a proper chance to consider it and without sticking to the assurances that were given in the House only a few months ago?

Mr. Fabricant: When the Prime Minister revealingly agreed with my hon. Friend that there could be a loss of 5,000 jobs in the industry, did he give an estimate of the money that will be lost to the UK in trade and revenue, which is relevant to the Ways and Means resolution? If he did not, will my hon. Friend do so?

Mr. St. Aubyn: That is a matter best left to the experts. I have seen estimates, but I have learned during the proceedings on the Finance Bill that it is safer for us to ask the Government for their officials' professional estimates than to come up with our own. My hon. Friend asks a pertinent question, and I expect the Paymaster General to have the answer. However, there can be no doubt that a loss of 5,000 jobs is very serious for our economy, particularly as some of those jobs are very well paid and extend beyond the art market to the tourist industry. Many people who come to London to buy international works of art also visit places of historic interest, stay in London hotels and fructify the city's economy. All that will be jeopardised by the proposal.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): I listened with care to the answer that the Prime Minister gave my hon. Friend during Prime Minister's questions, and the right hon. Gentleman gave the House a clear impression that he would use all his personal authority to prevent this increase in VAT. Does not my hon. Friend think that the Prime Minister's authority in negotiating in Europe has been severely dented by the necessity to bring this Ways and Means resolution before the House?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We have heard time and again how the Government, by engaging in what they regard as a more positive way with our European partners, would somehow deliver great concessions and achieve what we were unable to achieve when we were in government. Surely, this is a test case for that so-called new approach to dealing with the European Union, and the tabling of this Ways and Means resolution is an admission by the Government that their policy towards Europe has failed. No one in the European Union will gain from this increase in taxation, and our market will lose. Everyone agrees with that.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Has it occurred to my hon. Friend that it is of little consequence to the Treasury should this largely transatlantic business be damaged and disappear on the ground that that will result in a level of convergence with the European continent that would not otherwise be achieved, which is the object of the Government's policy?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I know that I should not be tempted off the issue, but there can be no doubt that the concerns expressed on the Opposition Benches are very much about an important, thriving London market.

When I raised the matter with the Prime Minister, his Back Benchers—it is recorded in Hansard—thought it a laughing matter. They thought that the loss of jobs was a matter of hilarity, much to the Prime Minister's embarrassment. Indeed, Government Back Benchers are laughing at the moment. It is much to the Prime Minister's embarrassment again that this resolution should be before us. What will be the cost to our economy of the loss of those 5,000 jobs? When will the Prime Minister come to the House to explain why he was not prepared, as he indicated only a few months ago he would be, to invoke the Luxembourg compromise in order to protect a vital national interest?

5.6 pm

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): Will the Paymaster General confirm that it should always be a principle of Ways and Means resolutions that tax increases are to increase revenue? In the resolution before us, tax is being doubled. Does she agree, however, that there is no possibility of the revenue doubling? I suggest to her that the proposals could, as my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) has said, reduce revenue. Will she give a firm estimate of what proportion of the art market she thinks will leave this country for New York or Switzerland? Will she also give an estimate of the cost of the resolution not only in loss of jobs, but in corporation tax on profits of a very much reduced art business?

Does this not show that European tax harmonisation is not a good thing and will very often hit individual countries? If the Conservative party is proved right and the art market substantially contracts, causing an important loss of jobs, will this not be a very good example of how this House of Commons will not be in a position to take remedial action to restore the position and to bring back the art market? London, as an international art centre, might be destroyed for ever. If this is being at the centre of Europe, it is a disaster for Britain.

5.8 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I declare an unremunerated interest as president of the British Art Market Federation, which derives from my presidency of the British Antique Dealers Association—which I declare in the Register of Members' Interests, along with its agreeable but uncovenanted excellent Christmas present, on which I declare tax.

Between 1985 and 1987, when I was Paymaster General, I was responsible for answering for Customs and Excise in this House and understudying my noble Friend Lord Lawson, as he now is, in ECOFIN, the latter of which I continued to do until 1989. Having wrestled with exactly the same issues that are in front of us, I have sympathy with the Treasury. I remember the difficulty that they caused us then.

The difficulty, as my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) has said—I think that it is familiar to everybody who is participating in this debate—is that the introduction of this tax on works of art entering the European Union will result in a significant amount of trade not ending up in London. It will be sold in New York or Geneva instead—indeed, in due course perhaps, in Tokyo as well.

In 1994, when the legislation which we are revising came in, a reasonable question was how we were obliged to take it through if EU tax changes had to be conducted unanimously. The answer was that the Commission had threatened to take us to court under different legislation, on the ground that a nil rate of VAT represented a potential distortion of trade. I had a leper's squint at that issue in my capacity as the then Secretary of State for National Heritage, as, prior to the creation of the British Art Market Federation, which was stimulated by the previous Government, I used regularly to meet representatives of the art market trade, although VAT remained a matter for Treasury Ministers. My right hon. Friends at the Treasury made it clear that they would give way on VAT, on that subject, only provided that the art trade agreed. However, both sides realised that there was a genuine possibility that the British Government would lose in the European Court against the potential threat. Had they done so, they would have found themselves with a 17.5 per cent. tax rate.

I realise the difficulty with which the present Government have had to wrestle. I am disappointed in the quality and, indeed, the timing of publication, of the European Commission report examining the effects of VAT on the art market. I hope that the Paymaster General will say a word or two about that when she replies. I realise that the Government had to concede. However, I am grateful for the decision contained in the new clause, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford did not refer—probably quite properly, given the rules of order: that there will be a poultice and a palliative in that VAT on works of art created after 1973 will now be taxed at 5 per cent. rather than at 17.5 per cent. I understand that the money resolution is needed to introduce the relevant new clause.

You would rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I were to dilate at any length on the subject of droit de suite. However, it did come up in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford. I congratulate the Government on the robust manner in which they are fighting this issue at present, but I should be grateful if the Paymaster General will repeat that the Government's robustness will continue—although I realise that we are discussing a Department of Trade and Industry matter. It is no good merely to delay the matter; we must win. To lower the temperature of the debate, I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford that the 5,000 jobs relate to droit de suite as well as to VAT; they are not merely a VAT casualty.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): I agree with everything that was said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke). I am relatively new to the House, but I am surprised by all these Ways and Means motions on the Order Paper. I do not understand why they are there. Will the Paymaster General give me the precedent for producing an Order Paper laden with such motions at the Report stage of the Bill?

I shall confine myself to the revenue aspects of the matter. Everyone agrees that the increase in VAT will be damaging to the UK art market—that is not in dispute. We do not need to look into the crystal ball; we can read the book. The increase from 0 to 2.5 per cent. had a deleterious effect on the existing art market. Labour Members seem to find that a matter for levity—as they do whenever we debate the subject; I find that deeply regrettable. In the light of the imposition of an increase in VAT from 2.5 to 5 per cent., how much will revenues fall? We are debating a Ways and Means motion. What estimate have the Government made of the fall in their revenues that is likely to result from that imposition? If there is no fall, how much will the increase be? My guess is that it will be extremely small.

I reinforce the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster as to the European Commission's report. We were promised a thorough study of the matter, but we have not received one. If the report has been published, it must have come out quietly, because I have not seen it. If it has been published, what does it say and what is the Government's reaction? Is there any succour in it for the UK art market?

Finally, did the Government argue forcefully for an extension of the derogation, or did they capitulate? Did the Government seek to find any allies for the approach that they took?

5.15 pm

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am glad to catch your eye in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is the first chance that the House has had to address this issue since we had the news that the Government had been obliged to concede on the increase in VAT from 2.5 to 5 per cent. on certain works of art.

The way in which the Government have introduced the Ways and Means resolution is a disgrace, for two reasons. First, the Government must be in a certain amount of chaos or they would not have had to produce so many Ways and Means resolutions tonight. Why on earth had they not thought of all this during the Bill's many weeks in Committee? The Government should have been able to think about some of these matters. The subject of the resolution that we are now debating may have caught them unawares, but they should have been able to set many of the others before the House earlier.

Secondly, it is an utter disgrace that, only a few weeks ago, the Government were telling us that they had saved the art industry from the need to introduce this Ways and Means resolution. That was typical spin by the Government. Time and again, when something dreadful is about to occur, they say, "Do not worry; we have prevented it"—and at the end of the day, when everyone has taken their eyes off the ball, lo and behold: they come to the House with a Ways and Means resolution. You would rule me out of order if I went into any more detail, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it bodes very ill for a much more serious matter—the withholding tax.

I cannot understand why the Luxembourg compromise was not invoked, given that the harmonisation of VAT across Europe is so much against the interests of the whole European Community, not just of this country. If it had been invoked, the Ways and Means resolution would not have been before the House tonight. It is essential that, when the Paymaster General replies, she tells us in some detail what negotiations took place with the Commission, and through the Council, that caused the resolution to be before us tonight.

I have some questions for the Paymaster General; I should be grateful if she would answer them. The very helpful notes on clauses tell us that this measure applies not only to works of art—to which we have confined our debate this evening—but to antiques and collectors' pieces. It would be useful for the House and the trade to know—obviously, the Government would not introduce the resolution if they had not made the calculations—how much extra tax the Paymaster General expects the increase to net the Government, first from art and, secondly, from antiques and collectors' pieces. It would be interesting to know what projections the United Kingdom Government have done on this matter—whether they really think that they will net an increase in VAT as a result of passing the Ways and Means resolution. Like my hon. Friends, I have a strong suspicion that there will be a net loss of VAT, but let us hear the Government's predictions.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) mentioned the amendment to section 21 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 to decrease the rate of VAT for those works of art created after 1 April 1973 from 17.5 to 5 per cent. It would be interesting to know how much VAT that will lose the Government. What figures have they calculated in that respect?

It has been calculated that the changes will lose the UK 5,000 jobs. In introducing a Ways and Means resolution to the House, the Government should be able to tell us—it would help the trade—how many jobs are likely to be lost as a direct result of this measure and how many are likely to be lost as a result of the combination of this measure and the introduction of droit de suite.

It would be useful to know how many jobs the Government reckon will be exported from the European Community; after all, it is the European Community that is forcing us to introduce the measure. Are all those jobs to be lost to the UK and the European Union, or will some of them be redistributed around the European Union? Will there be an increase in the art market elsewhere in the European Union? If that were the case, it would make some sense for the Commission to insist that the UK introduced the measure. If none of those jobs is to be reclaimed in the European Union, it seems daft.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I shall give way to my hon. Friend and then to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bercow: Is my hon. Friend aware, in the context of the motion, that the habitual refrain of Ministers is that they eschew the cause of tax harmonisation within the European Union despite appearances to the contrary? Does my hon. Friend agree that it is of the utmost importance that, in responding to the debate, the Paymaster General should explain to us how she distinguishes the words "to harmonise" and "to co-ordinate", given that page 898 of the "New Shorter Oxford English Dictionary" defines "to co-ordinate" as to "place or class in the same order, rank or division"? What is the difference?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. However, I am sure that, if I strayed too far down that path, you would rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We on the Opposition Benches believe in tax competition, not tax harmonisation. On this matter, the Government are entirely inconsistent. When I raised at some length the question of tobacco taxes, the Government were all for having a tobacco tax at a different rate from that of the rest of the EU and losing a huge amount of revenue thereby. However, when it comes to the issue that is before us, which will result in the loss of many jobs, the Government seem to want harmonisation. I do not understand why the Government cannot be more consistent on this matter. If they were, at least everyone would know where he stood.

Mr. Leslie: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why, in 1994, the Conservative Government gave a legal undertaking to increase the value added tax on imported works of art to 5 per cent?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: If the hon. Gentleman had been present—I am not sure whether he was—to listen to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster, he would have heard that, if we did not agree to an increase from 2.5 to 5 per cent., albeit that we had a derogation for 20 years, we would be subject to a threat to take us to the European Court, and the European Union could have imposed a 17.5 per cent. rate of tax. That would have been far more damaging.

I am saying that the Government are dealing with the circumstances as they arise, and they are that the derogation is to end in June or July. The Government have to deal with that. It is their stewardship that we are under, whether we like it or not. They appear to be intent on decimating our art market because it seems that they cannot put an appropriate argument to our European partners that the increase in tax is disastrous for us and for them as well. It is daft. If the increase would benefit the EU as a whole, there would be some sense in it, but that is plainly not the position. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster has said, business will be driven away. It will go not to Paris, Berlin or anywhere else in the EU, but outside it. It will go, for example, to Geneva, New York or Tokyo. The EU will lose jobs, balances of payments will be adversely affected and tax revenues will be lost.

The Prime Minister put his personal authority on the line when he said that he would do something about this tax increase. He said, in effect, that he would convince our European partners that it did not make sense. At the end of the day, he failed in that respect. If that has happened, how many more times will he fail in Europe, and how many more times will the United Kingdom be disadvantaged thereby?

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Like a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I do not think that the motion should be nodded through, notwithstanding that we can debate the substance of new clause 14 at a later stage this evening. We need to know from the Minister now what the anticipated yield will be from doubling valued added tax on imported art.

We are talking about a most important industry. Labour Ministers seem somewhat dismissive of the art industry as a whole and they should be reminded that it is not based only in London. There is an extensive network of dealers and galleries throughout the United Kingdom and there are many ancillary industries such as framing, conservation, insurance and shipping, all of which feed off the international market, which is based in London.

The motion would double the rate of VAT on imports. We know that it derives from a directive passed in 1995, from which the United Kingdom had a limited derogation. As so often happens with the European Union, the boomerangs return. The Government may remind us this evening that they have postponed the separate threat represented by droit de suite, the levy on the resale of contemporary art. It would be useful to know on what terms that has been postponed, and whether it may turn out to be a boomerang as well.

In the 1995 agreement, it was agreed that, by 1999, when the British derogation ended, there should have been a study into whether VAT on imported art was damaging the European art market. That report has been produced. It was late—it should have been produced last year, but it was made available only a few months ago. It is interesting that, although the report was commissioned by the European Commission, and to that extent is not wholly impartial, it nevertheless paints a good picture of the damage already caused by VAT, even at present levels.

As regards the impact on the United Kingdom, the report states:

"Between 1994 and 1997"—

during that period, VAT at 2.5 per cent. was imposed—

"the United Kingdom went from being a net importer . . . to being a net exporter" of art, so VAT even at that lower rate clearly caused damage. The report also records—this is dangerous—the views of the New York dealers, whom it states

"are all very excited at the prospect of import VAT rates being increased in the UK (which they see as their main competitor)."

The report concludes that

"high value buyers and sellers are increasingly choosing New York over London as their preferred venue because of the 2.5 per cent. differential."

That happens even at the present VAT level, which we are about to double.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will the hon. Gentleman forgive me? I want to give the Minister an opportunity to respond.

The Commission's own study shows conclusively that damage has been caused, so it was—I choose my words carefully—mendacious of the Commission to assert in its press release that the report had provided no evidence of damage to the European art market. That was flatly untrue.

The Minister will probably remind us in a moment that the Commission has agreed to reduce the 17.5 per cent. VAT rate that at present applies to contemporary art painted or created since 1973. That is a welcome development, but it does not offset the damage that will be caused by the doubling of the 2.5 per cent. rate.

The Commission, which after all has a duty to promote the economic interests of Europe as a whole, even if it is dismissive of the UK's interest, should not have ignored the evidence of its own study, which showed damage not simply to the UK, but to the entire European art market. The only people who will be pleased by the motion are competitors outside Europe, in Switzerland, the United States, Japan and elsewhere. It will simply transfer business—

Mr. Leslie: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I shall give way very quickly to the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie); I apologise to the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies).

Mr. Leslie: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Can he confirm whether, when he has Paymaster General in 1994, he was in any way involved in the discussions or negotiations about the move from 2.5 to 5 per cent?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I was not Paymaster General in 1994, so I had nothing to do with the negotiations.

I conclude with a request to the Paymaster General. If the motion goes through—it looks as though it will—and if the Commission's own study turns out to be correct and damage will be caused, will she ask it to produce a further study in due course so that it can return to this matter and reduce the minimum mandatory rate?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the people responsible for the measure are officials sitting in highly paid jobs in the Commission who do not care about job losses even though 17.5 million people are already unemployed in the European Union?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. The measure is a bureaucrats' charter and the people in the Commission who introduced it will not lose their jobs. Our constituents who rely on the vitality and success of the trade will lose their jobs—not the people in the big auction houses, which will simply transfer their auctions to New York. The little people—the porters, the packers, the office staff, the experts, the framers—will lose their jobs. They have been abandoned by the Labour party, but they have not been abandoned by us, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) says.

I understand the constraints under which the Paymaster General has been negotiating, but, even at this late date, I ask her at least to ask the Commission to study this matter and return with other proposals if the damage, as reported, occurs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Fabricant.

Mr. Fabricant rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologise to the House; I was distracted for a moment. Has the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) given way or has he concluded his remarks?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have concluded.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, I should call the Paymaster General to reply to the debate in the remaining time.

Dawn Primarolo: I shall try to deal with all the points that have been raised within the short time that remains. If I cannot, I shall certainly deal with them in the later debate.

I remind the House of the context of this matter. The previous Government—I understand that the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) was Paymaster General from 1994 to 1996—committed us to an absolute legal obligation to raise VAT on works of art from 2.5 to 5 per cent. The then Government asked the Commission to undertake an independent study, but they unfortunately did not have that written into a directive. The agreement was political and therefore not enforceable in law.

The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke), who is very well informed and follows these issues closely, referred to the delayed report. He is quite right: the independent report should have been available at the end of December, but it was not available until March. The Commission made its response as late as 28 April and the Government's view is that it ignored the recommendations. In our opinion, the Commission's recommendations did not properly recognise elements of the independent report, which we then pursued vigorously with the Commission and other member states.

The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) asked about the Commission's report. I can tell him that it and an explanatory memorandum were put before the House along with the Government's view. Although the report was lodged with us, the Commission unfortunately did not make it generally available and, under the agreement undertaken by the previous Government, we could not require it to do so. However, we at least obtained a copy for ourselves and were able to scrutinise the details.

The Government were faced with the Commission's insistence on the implementation of the absolute legal requirement. As hon. Members know, the consequence for the Government of not complying with our legal obligations would have been infraction proceedings and things could have been considerably worse. None the less, we continued to pursue the Commission to seek either an extension of our derogation or the setting of 2.5 per cent. as the rate for the rest of Europe. Only one other EU country—Denmark—applies the 5 per cent. levy, and the others apply higher rates.

The Government faced an absolute legal agreement and had no room for manoeuvre because the independent report had not been written into the directive. The Commission refused to move, and other member states did not agree to reopen the matter. At present, income to the Government is around £10 million, and the increase in VAT to 5 per cent. on goods currently taxed at 2.5 per cent. will yield around a further £10 million in a full year. The offset resulting from widening the scope of the new 5 per cent. rate to include imported works of art previously taxed at 17.5 per cent. will, however, leave the overall package effectively revenue neutral.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Minister give way?

Dawn Primarolo: Forgive me, but I have been left little time to reply to the debate. I shall be happy to return to the point in later debates.

The Government have continued to work closely with the art market, recognising its valuable contribution to a global art market centred on New York and London. The European Union should see London as a European centre of excellence, but we have not been able to win that argument at this stage. In a press release, the British Art Market Federation welcomed the Government's decision to provide for the reduction on imports of contemporary art, saying that that decision and

"the Government's equally robust opposition to the Artists' Resale Rights Directive,"

—not relevant to this debate, and not part of my responsibilities—

"will we believe, enable us to maintain the UK's competitive position in the international art market."

The federation recognises what we have done, and recognises that we were bound by legal obligations because of the previous Government's commitments. It has congratulated the Government on vigorously pursuing the best interests of the art market. Despite what some Opposition Members say, the Government are committed to ensuring that the British art market gets a fair deal.

Mr. Leigh: I am sorry that the Minister was unable to give way during the debate. Clearly, she had time to do so. What can she say about new subsection 6(a), which sets out items accepted for definition—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the Minister will not have an opportunity to answer that question.

It being three quarters of an hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(b) (Money resolutions and Ways and Means resolutions in connection with Bills).

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That provision may be made in the Finance Bill amending section 21 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994.

VALUE ADDED TAX (PREPARATIONS ETC OF MEAT, YEAST OR EGG)

Motion made, and Question proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(b),

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in the Finance Bill amending the provisions of Schedule 8 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994 by virtue of which supplies of preparations and extracts of meat, yeast or egg are zero-rated.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

5.39 pm

Mr. Letwin: I am not clear about the meaning of the motion. Nor am I entirely clear about the guidance on Member's interests, so, for the avoidance of any impropriety, I declare a possible interest in that a pet shop may have been a client of the bank of which I am a director.

The motion is the most vexed of those before us this afternoon. I have a few straightforward questions that Ministers may wish to answer now so that we do not have to deal with them when we reach the considerable number of substantive questions to be debated later. I am not clear—the notes on clauses do not make it clear—whether the situation is as I envisage it, which is that up till the time when the lacuna that gave rise to the substantive change was spotted, pet shops were paying VAT.

Dawn Primarolo indicated assent.

Mr. Letwin: I am glad to see that I am right in that. In that case, this Ways and Means motion cannot possibly have the effect of changing the revenue that was extracted or would now fall to be extracted from those who were previously operating under the mistaken assumption that the law was correctly constructed and that Customs and Excise had the right to levy the VAT that it was levying.

The motion must therefore relate to the future and to the question of how much can be raised in the future. Will the Paymaster General give us an estimate of the effects on the Revenue of that change in the future? What will be the immediate effect—the first-round effect? What additional VAT revenue will be raised assuming no demand elasticity? What will be the second-round effect—the long-term effect—assuming that things change and people use less pet food as the price rises?

I take it that the Treasury has done an analysis of both those effects. For reasons which I do not want to dwell on now—it would intrude into the substantive debate—I do not want to go into detail about why I think that this is an important question to answer. However, I hope that the Paymaster General can clear up the factual point and give us an idea of those [illegible] projections, which I presume the Treasury has made.

Will the Paymaster General give us some guidance? Has it been normal practice in the past to have a Ways and Means motion when an uncovenanted error has been discovered ex post? That would be instructive for the future ordering of parliamentary business.

5.42 pm

Mr. Fabricant: I am a little surprised that the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) is not present. The headquarters of Bovril and Marmite are located in Burton, which is close to Lichfield. The House will know that Bovril and Marmite make use of beef extract and yeast, which are the substances referred to in this Ways and Means motion. My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who leads from the Front Bench so expertly [illegible] fluently, asked about pet foods. Will VAT be applied only to products used in alcoholic beverages, such as yeast and egg—which I suppose is used in egg nog or advocaat—or will it be applied to Marmite and Bovril?

We need an assurance that VAT will not be applied to Bovril. [Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset says, we must make a plea for Bovril and Marmite to ensure that they remain exempt. If VAT were applied to those products, employment in Burton would be affected, and it is conceivable that people in Lichfield work in that factory, which is only a few miles down the A38. More importantly and more directly related to this Ways and Means motion, we need an assurance that this small measure does not mean that VAT will be put on human food. Will the Paymaster General give a clear and unequivocal assurance that VAT will not be applied to Bovril or Marmite as a precursor to VAT on foods generally?

It would be utterly hypocritical if the hon. Lady could not give that assurance. Many of us remember the scares that the Government caused before the last general election when they were in opposition. They asked for such guarantees, even without the Ways and Means motion which spurs me to ask this practical question.

If Bovril and Marmite are not to be exempted, will other products also not be exempted? If so, will the Paymaster General list those products? It is not just the hon. Member for Bovril—or the hon. Member for Burton—who ought to be present; others should be here, given that food industries in their constituencies may now have to pay VAT and other duties on food under the present Government, for the very first time.

I dare say that the Paymaster General will say that this is just another example of tax co-ordination with Europe, where VAT on food is the norm; but what will be the annual value of transactions affected by the change? How much of the tax will be on food, how much on pet food and how much on alcoholic beverages, particularly advocaat?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is this not yet another example of the Government's hitting the poor with regressive taxation? Are they not taxing basic foods in the worst possible manner?

Mr. Fabricant: I take exception to that. I always like Marmite on my toast, and, while there is nothing wrong with being poor, I would be mendacious if I said that I was.

What consultation has the Treasury had with food and drink manufacturers? I am not talking just about Bovril, and I am not talking just about beer manufacturers, which are also based in Burton. What consultation has taken place about the amount that would be raised? What evidence exists to suggest that the current tax regime unduly benefits this part of the food and drink industry, to the detriment of other parts? Why has the measure been introduced? The House needs to know. What are the ulterior motives?

The Paymaster General looks at me in surprise and horror.

Dawn Primarolo rose—

Mr. Fabricant: I give way to the Paymaster General. Perhaps we shall hear an answer as well as a question.

Dawn Primarolo: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that we are talking about pet food?

Mr. Fabricant: The Paymaster General says that we are talking about pet food, but that is not at all clear from the motion. If we are, can she give us a firm undertaking that VAT will be imposed on neither Marmite nor Bovril, and that a Labour Government will never—I repeat, never—impose VAT on human food? If she will not give that undertaking, will she withdraw the disgraceful remarks that she made when her party was in opposition, and when she posed similar questions to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer?

If the change—I refer to the amendment provided for in the motion—be deemed always to have had effect, what will be the "retrospective effect"? How far back does the Paymaster General mean to go—three years, six years, nine years? What will be the clawback? If it applies only to pet foods, what will be the implications for major manufacturers and major employers such as Pedigree? The Paymaster General laughs, but Pedigree is the largest pet-food manufacturer in Europe. Based in the east midlands, it employs hundreds of people, who could lose their jobs as a direct consequence of this measure.

I do not need to tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I have raised the issue on the Adjournment, and in questions—that the last tax harmonisation introduced by the Labour Government of which I was conscious involved the introduction of water regulations. The regulations seemed innocent enough in themselves, but, as a result, Armitage Shanks in my constituency was taken over by a United States company, and jobs were lost—simply because the Government thought that co-ordination in Europe would put us at the heart of Europe, notwithstanding that loss of jobs. That, of course, has nothing to do with the motion that is under discussion.

We need assurances today. We are not just talking about Marmite and Bovril, but about the entire food industry. The Paymaster General may proudly say, "It affects only pet foods" but what are the job implications for firms such as Pedigree and others? How many years back will the retrospective action go?

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): As I listened to the apocalyptic comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant), I wondered whether Nostradamus had in mind the motion when he prophesied all kinds of things for this period in July; somehow, I suspect not.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), I have racked my mind to think of an interest to declare. I cannot think of one, except that, having heard my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield speak, I should declare that my son is a prodigious eater of Marmite and that my dog eats large quantities of Bonio dog food.

As Chairman of the Select Committee on Agriculture, I thought that it was an issue on which I should perhaps detain the House for a few moments. The motion seems to be one of the more regrettable of those on the Order Paper, principally because it is retrospective. The Minister may argue that it corrects an error by the previous Government and is therefore not retrospective, but it has not been law for the past five years and the Government intend to make it so, first by the motion and then by the new clause, which we will debate later. That is of some concern.

It is not a great matter of party controversy. If it was an error—the notes on clauses tell us that it was, and who are we to disagree?—by the previous Government, it should be corrected, but I cannot help reflecting on the fact that, in my experience, if errors relating to VAT on pet food are committed by ordinary citizens, their correction is rigorously enforced. However, according to the motion and the subsequent new clause, Customs and Excise will be given the benefit of the doubt if it is found to be responsible for the fault and is likely to lose revenue.

A year or so ago, I had a case in my constituency of a pet shop owner who decided to sell his products by breaking bulk purchases and splitting packets. There was a huge dispute as to the VAT liability that flowed from that decision, which could have put that pet shop out of business. Fortunately, after an unsympathetic Customs and Excise inspector, a more sympathetic one came along and the matter was put right, but, often, disputes over VAT on pet food can have important consequences for small businesses. Therefore, the Paymaster General owes us a clear explanation of exactly what is going on in the new clause, bearing in mind how strongly retrospective errors by Customs and Excise are enforced.

I am concerned about the details of the new clause that are provided in the notes, which say:

"The practical effect of the amendment will be to restore taxation to certain foodstuffs, principally pet food, and to restrict the zero-rating to non-alcoholic beverages made from extracts of meat, yeast or egg."

I recognise weasel words when I see them.

Mr. Fabricant: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. He was here when the Paymaster General pointed out rather pompously that the measure applied only to pet food. He has pointed out that it applies principally to pet food. In any event, that is what is said in the explanatory notes, not the measure itself. As Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, does he agree that the motion might, either on purpose or inadvertently, apply to foods? Therefore, it would be nice to hear a reassurance that the Government will never introduce VAT on any human foodstuffs.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend makes a good point. It is clear from the explanatory notes that the Government understand that the measure involves the extension of VAT to human foodstuffs. The notes refer to "certain foodstuffs, principally pet food".

The Paymaster General shakes her head. If the measure does not refer to human foodstuffs, why do the notes on new clauses say that it does? We need a clear explanation of precisely which foodstuffs are affected and which are not.

Why the urgency? The error has gone uncorrected for five years. When was the error spotted by the Paymaster General's officials? It must logically have been spotted some time in the past week; otherwise the measure would surely have been dealt with earlier in the proceedings on the Finance Bill.

What brought the error to the Paymaster General's attention? What is the problem that has caused her the great concern? Why has it not been left for next year's Finance Bill? Why is there a great ragbag of motions before the House today?

My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield made great play—understandably, in view of the possible effects on Marmite and Bovril—of the absence of the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean), but I say in her defence that the precipitant way in which the Government have brought the motion to the House today may have meant that she was not aware of the possible implications. If she were, I am sure that she would wish to explore them with the Paymaster General. That leads to the more important question: what consultation have the Government had with the sectors of the pet food and other food industries that are likely to be affected by the motion and the substantive new clause?

Specifically, what pet foods will be affected by the motion? We do not know what the measure's practical effect on ordinary pet owners will be. It is important that, before the motion is nodded through, we hear what practical effect it will have on pet owners.

We know that some pet owners are among the poorest members of our society—those who the Government claim they wish to help. An extension of VAT on pet foods is not an inconsequential matter, but of great moment for some of those people.

Mr. Fabricant: Is my hon. Friend aware of the therapeutic value of pets, and that pensioners, old people and people with psychiatric problems all benefit from owning pets? Will they be able to afford to keep them if there is VAT on pet foods, or even more tax on pet foods, which will put prices up?

Mr. Luff: Looking at you carefully, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I judge that I should probably not get too sidetracked down that alley, but I agree with my hon. Friend.

We need to know the precise effects of the measure on pet foods. What will happen to retail prices as a result of it? What will happen to the Government's revenues? What sums of money are actually involved? What sums of money have been lost as a result of the mistake in 1994? What sums of money will be recouped in future years as a result of its correction?

I know from bitter experience in the House that the simplest and most apparently innocent measure often is the source of the greatest concern to the House, or should be. Anything that begins casually with the words puts me immediately on my mettle. The Paymaster General has said in an almost jocund tone, "It refers only to pet foods." It is potentially a serious measure for the House to consider. She needs to treat the matter with some seriousness, not levity, in her winding-up speech.

"This new clause corrects an error in the consolidation of existing law"

5.58 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): My eye is taken by the terms of the motion. The first point on which I seek clarification was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff)—the provision having retrospective effect. That also worries me. Retrospection in any tax measure is something of which Treasury Ministers always fight shy. I am intrigued to know why the law must go back to what it would have been had it been correct in September 1994. I should be grateful if the Minister could spell out more clearly than the notes on clauses what the measure means for companies. I am unclear as to the financial impact of retrospective VAT legislation on those enterprises.

What I am clear about is constituency cases where VAT problems of immense complexity drag on for some time, where it is sometimes difficult or, indeed, costly to unravel the consequences of what to the citizen is retrospective activity. However, here we are talking more seriously about a change in the law.

How was it that that particular error in transcribing a cross-reference from the Value Added Tax Act 1983 came to occur? Some people may think that the motion is part of a wider exercise by officials, admittedly and understandably, combing VAT legislation to close loopholes and protect the Government from perceived revenue loss. However, is the motion being proposed for other reasons? Hon. Members should be told why the error—which has lain dormant since 1983—has suddenly been resurrected, just as the century ends. How did that occur?

The motion, intriguingly, deals with "preparations". I am not sure which definition of preparation is being used in the motion. I appreciate that VAT legislation has long ensured that the manufacture of foods—the bringing together and further processing of certain ingredients, adding value—such as biscuits and sweets has always attracted VAT. I should also tell my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) that those foods are for human consumption. Nevertheless, I do not fully understand how the word "preparations" is being used in the motion. Does it entail the bringing together of raw ingredients without further processing, or bringing together some of the ingredients that would be affected by the proposal after they have been further manufactured, cooked or processed in some other way?

Ministers should give the House some clear and detailed explanation of what they are inviting us to agree. The motion, taken at face value, does not assist us in our voyage of exploration, but its import may be greater than it seems.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the Minister answer one brief question? Is there any way at all that the Government could mark on the Order Paper matters about which the House has no power to do anything? Perhaps I should first declare an interest: I have a dog of my own, called Corrie. When I get back from the House, he likes me to take him for a walk. Sometimes, however, I am detained in the Chamber, not because hon. Members talk too much, but because we spend our time talking about things about which we can do nothing.

I know that you will be well aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker—because of the great interest that you take in public affairs—that the House has recently spent hours and hours debating matters that we can do nothing about. We have had a great deal of discussion, for example, about genetically modified foods, about which people get very excited and agitated. However, because of European law, we can do absolutely nothing about GM food. We also had a long debate—for a whole day—on the age of homosexual consent, although Parliament could do nothing at all about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is a very experienced hon. Member. One example by reference perhaps; but he must not go on, ad infinitum, on matters that are nothing to do with motion 7.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker; but it is everything to do with the motion. I simply want to ask Ministers whether, in light of Article 28(2)(a) of the EU sixth directive they have any power to do anything about the substance of the motion?

We may all think that retrospective taxation is ridiculous, and agree that the Government should withdraw a motion that would unfairly apply taxation—and carry the can for it. However, my understanding of the situation—you may not think that this is relevant, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it is—is that, even if all 635 hon. Members said, "Let's agree that we will not backdate tax on dog food", and voted accordingly, it would have no impact at all. The Government would have to levy the tax, simply because of the sixth directive.

I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and other people do not like me talking about these things, but it is time that Parliament woke up to the fact that we spend hours and hours talking about things about which we can do absolutely nothing. I simply wish that Parliament would wake up to the fact that a democracy is dying every single day, and that—on this issue, as on so many others—we are wasting our time talking about something about which we can do nothing.

Will the Minister say if, by any remote chance, I am right about that point? If, by any remote chance, I am talking a load of rubbish, as the Deputy Speaker seems to think, will the Minister say—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made a disgraceful suggestion. I am here merely to try to keep the House in order, and believe that the hon. Gentleman was straying into generalities too far beyond the scope of motion 7. I hope that he will consider very carefully what he said.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am sorry—it is simply something that I feel very strongly about.

I was asking a simple question. I hope that the Minister will tell us—to avoid my having a dispute with the occupant of the Chair, which I have never had in my 35 years in the House of Commons; and to help the House of Commons—whether the Government might consider having on the Order Paper a little map, circle, scroll, arrow, or something that would not be too controversial or cause a dispute in the House, to indicate those matters about which we can do nothing. That would save a great deal of the House's time, and give me more time to go back and take my dog out for a walk.

Mr. Leigh: The Minister, in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant)—she obviously thought that it was a devastating intervention—asked whether he was aware that the motion applied to pet food. What she did not confirm was that the motion applies only to pet food. The Minister should realise that our suspicions and concerns have been fuelled by that intervention—although I think that the argument could be resolved very easily.

The motion's implications for the Revenue are enormous: the political and revenue implications of launching any attack on the principle of zero-rating food are staggeringly important. I should really like the Minister, on behalf of the Government, to commit herself to the principle that we are not starting to renege on the pledge, which was given in the general election by her and the Government, that we shall not move away from zero-rating on food.

Mr. Swayne: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Order Paper does not mention pet food at all, but talks about "meat, yeast, or egg"? As a consequence of the measure, and to avoid the taxation increase, we may well have to eat unleavened bread.

Mr. Leigh: I am not sure about the need for unleavened bread. However, I am sure that, so far, we have not received a commitment from the Minister.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) was right to say that Back Benchers can go only by what they are told in the explanatory notes—which should be helpful. The notes that we have been given today are not at all helpful—except, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) has made clear, in fuelling our suspicions. If we were supposed to be reassured that the motion would apply only to pet foods, why does paragraph 2 of the explanatory notes state—as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire said—that the measure will apply "principally" to pet food? Why do the notes not say that it will apply only to pet food? The House deserves a reassurance on that matter.

It would be the utmost hypocrisy for the Government—under the guise of a seemingly innocuous measure concerned only with pet food—to increase their revenues by extending VAT to ordinary foodstuffs. We want a commitment that they are not attempting to do that. We also want to know precisely which grocery items will be affected by the measure. What are the measure's revenue implications? What will be the annual value of transactions affected by the change? What will be the net effect on Treasury revenues? What consultations have the Government had with food and drink manufacturers and with retailers?

We want to be reassured that, as a consequence of the negotiations, the principle of zero-rating food will not be abrogated. We also want to know what evidence there is to suggest that the current tax regime is unduly benefiting that part of the food and drink industry to the detriment of others. Unless we get all those reassurances, we are perfectly entitled to be suspicious of what is going on this afternoon.

Dawn Primarolo: I hope that I shall be able to reassure the House on this modest and sensible measure. There is no extension to foodstuffs that are currently zero-rated. The hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) can have his Marmite soldiers and drink his Bovril this evening in the sure knowledge that there is no challenge.

While legal issues arising from an appeal to the VAT and duties tribunal earlier this year—but after the Budget—were being examined, it was discovered that a transcription error had been made in the Value Added Tax Act 1994. Throughout the relevant time, VAT has been raised on those products. No new VAT is being imposed and there is no extension. The manufacturers, the Government of the day and their officials believed that VAT on pet foods could be charged and collected, as it had been since 1973. We collected the tax because that was the position before the transcription error was made in 1994. We now have to correct the law.

Mr. Luff: Is the hon. Lady saying that the Government have collected tax revenues illegally and are now seeking retrospective sanction for having done so?

Dawn Primarolo: No. The items had never been zero-rated. The previous Government supervised the changing of the 1994 Act, when the transcription error occurred. They were fulfilling their legal obligations under the requirements to impose VAT. We are committed to maintaining zero rates on food. They are not affected in any way.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I should like to make this point first. The explanatory notes make it clear that the zero-rating of foodstuffs is not affected.

The grouping covers pet foods primarily, but there are certain other preparations—

Mr. Letwin rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I should just like to deal with this point. The other preparations are extracts of meat, yeast or egg, such as advocaat and yeast products intended for use in home brewing. That was the law as we had all understood it.

I have also been asked whether there is a precedent.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I should like to deal with this point and get all the facts on the table before hon. Members work themselves up into a lather again about the problems.

I was asked whether there had been errors before. Unfortunately, there have. The previous Government had to make a correction to the Finance Bill in 1995, because the starting date for earlier changes to bad debt relief was omitted when the provisions for consolidation into the Value Added Tax Act 1994 were made. The measures are not retrospective because—

Mr. Letwin rose—

Hon. Members: Give way!

Dawn Primarolo: I will give way in a minute. Hon. Members should be patient. It will help to have the facts.

This is not retrospective taxation because the legal liability to tax has not been changed contrary to the expectation of the taxpayer. The taxpayer had been paying the tax.

If the House voted against the motion, it would cause chaos. Manufacturers and the Government believed that the law gave cover. I am sure that a test court case would show the intention of the legislation before 1994, but it is better to correct legislation when an error is found.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way. That is the point on which I have been trying to intervene, without being in any kind of lather. The hon. Lady said a moment ago that it had not been illegal to levy VAT during the intervening period when the mistake was in force. Is that not because my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is right and the sixth VAT directive is in force, meaning that in law VAT could be levied on the products? Is this not merely a tidying operation with no effect on the outcome of cases?

Dawn Primarolo: That is my point. There is no change. If we did not make the alteration, the Government could be left open to a loss of revenue, which would be unwise. Any prudent Government would act.

This is a simple proposition. An error was made; taxpayers and the Government have behaved in good faith. The law will now be corrected. There will be no refunds, no additional charge and no increase in food prices for pet lovers. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) feels that his time may have been wasted. There is no extension on foods; those are the simple facts.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in the Finance Bill amending the provisions of Schedule 8 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994 by virtue of which supplies of preparations and extracts of meat, yeast or egg are zero-rated.

DISCOUNTED SECURITIES ETC.

Motion made, and Question proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(b),

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in the Finance Bill amending paragraphs 10 and 13 of Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1996 and section 92 of that Act.—[Mrs. Roche.]

6.17 pm

Mr. St. Aubyn: I rise to point out that, yet again, we have a motion with retrospective effect. In Standing Committee, we raised several objections to the phrasing of clause 61 and others. There was a great deal of consternation among Ministers, and they had to go away and think again. The Government new clauses on Report propose significant changes to the way in which they hope to address the highly technical problem of tax leakage resulting from the current legislation. I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm that.

Before we pass the measure, will the Minister confirm that the retrospective effect will not mean that companies that have honestly, but ingeniously found a way to minimise their tax liability will see an increase in their tax bill? I have no truck with tax evasion, but it is right that businesses should be able to plan their tax affairs with some certainty. Clauses should not be sprung into Finance Bills, retrospectively changing the law, to deny companies exemptions or advantages in the tax system that they legitimately believed that they could make use of. If we breached that principle, we would undermine the rule of law on which the whole tax system is based. If taxpayers feel that the Government will introduce retrospective legislation every time that they find a legal way to use the tax system to their advantage, they will eventually feel that they are unable to challenge the Government through the court of law on the tax system. The costs of doing so may be great, but we could lose an important constitutional test and a brake on the power of the Executive to raise tax at their whim. That is what is at stake.

Will the Minister confirm that the problems that we highlighted with the original phrasing of the clause, in terms of the ordinary call provisions for securities, and the possible effect of the introduction of a withholding tax are dealt with by the new phrasing of the clause? I look forward to her response.

Mrs. Roche: I am surprised by the remarks of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), who gave his version of what happened in Committee. It was an interesting version, and there are always many different historical interpretations of what has happened.

In Committee, I said that when we had consulted on this complex proposal, we received representations from the financial sector. It appeared that the way in which the clause had been drawn went too wide and was taking in some matters that we did not wish to be included. Therefore, in consultation with the industry, we made some new proposals and we have had a favourable reception. That is another example of how this Government listen—unlike the previous Government.

I remind the hon. Member for Guildford that the Tory Government tried to introduce this measure, and that this Government, once again, have had to deal with some unfinished business that the Conservative Government were unable to get through.

The hon. Gentleman asked why the resolution was retrospective. Clause 61 was founded on retrospective resolutions, and operates from 15 February 1999, when it was announced—a few weeks before the Budget. In that sense, it is technically retrospective. The Conservative Government did this on many occasions to stop tax avoidance, which was the right thing to do.

If the hon. Member for Guildford wants to honour the pledge of the shadow Chancellor on public spending, making sure that proper tax avoidance measures are in place is the right thing to do. I had hoped that he would give us some credit because we propose to make the clause—which takes effect from 15 February—less wide ranging. As to the other matters that he raised—yes, I can assure him on both those points.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Not amended in the Committee, and as amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 7

FIRST-YEAR ALLOWANCES FOR INVESTMENT IN NORTHERN IRELAND

'.—(1) In section 22 of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 ("the 1990 Act") (first-year allowances), in subsection (3CC) (which restricts the expenditure on machinery and plant for use in Northern Ireland which is eligible for 100 per cent. allowances), after paragraph (b) there shall be inserted "; or

(c) expenditure on the provision of a goods vehicle for the purposes of a trade which consists primarily of the conveyance of goods; or

(d) unauthorised expenditure on the provision of machinery or plant for use primarily in—

(i) agriculture, fishing or fish farming, or

(ii) any relevant activity carried out in relation to agricultural produce, fish or any fish product for the purpose of bringing it to market."

(2) After subsection (3CC) of that section there shall be inserted—

"(3CD) For the purposes of subsection (3CC) above—

(a) expenditure is unauthorised expenditure unless it is authorised, for the purposes of subsection (3CA) above, by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland; and

(b) 'relevant activity' means transportation, storage, preparation, processing or packaging.

(3CE) An authorisation given, for the purpose of subsection (3CA) above, by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland—

(a) may be given either specially (that is to say, so as to apply only to a specified item of expenditure or a specified person) or generally (that is to say, so as not only so to apply);

(b) may, if given generally, be modified by that Department; and

(c) may in any case be absolute or conditional."

(3) In subsection (10) of that section, after "section" there shall be inserted—

"'agriculture' and 'agricultural produce' have the same meanings as in section 6 of the European Communities Act 1972;

'fish' includes shellfish;

'fish farming' means the intensive rearing, on a commercial basis, of fish intended for human consumption;

'fishing' means a trade, or part of a trade, which consists of the catching or taking of fish;

'goods vehicle' has the same meaning as in the Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 1995;".

(4) In section 22B of the 1990 Act (withdrawal of first-year allowance on change of use)—

(a) in subsection (2)(a), for "the period of two years beginning with the date of the incurring of that expenditure" there shall be substituted "the relevant period"; and

(b) after subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(2A) In subsection (2) above 'the relevant period' means—

(a) where the expenditure concerned exceeds £3.5 million, the period of five years beginning with the date of the incurring of that expenditure, and

(b) in any other case, the period of two years beginning with that date."

(5) After section 22B of the 1990 Act there shall be inserted—

"Disclosure of information in connection with first-year allowances

22C.—(1) No obligation as to secrecy or other restriction on the disclosure of information imposed by statute or otherwise shall prevent—

(a) the Board or an authorised officer of the Board from disclosing to the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland ('the Department') or an authorised officer of the Department, or

(b) the Department or an authorised officer of the Department from disclosing to the Board or an authorised officer of the Board, information for the purpose of assisting the Board in the carrying out of their functions with respect to claims for capital allowances made under section 22 by virtue of subsection (3CA) of that section or, as the case may be, the Department in the carrying out of its functions under that section.

(2) Information obtained by virtue of a disclosure authorised by this section shall not be disclosed except—

(a) to the Board or the Department or to an authorised officer of the Board or of the Department; or

(b) for the purposes of any proceedings connected with a matter in relation to which the Board or the Department carry out the functions mentioned in subsection (1) above."

(6) The preceding provisions of this section have effect in relation to every chargeable period ending on or after 12th May 1998.'.—[Mrs. Roche.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In last year's Finance Act, we introduced a measure to give 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances for small and medium-sized businesses investing between 12 May 1998 and 11 May 2002 in machinery or plant for use in Northern Ireland. The legislation does not come into effect until a day to be appointed by the Treasury. This was necessary to allow time to make sure that the measure would not be anti-competitive.

It is now apparent that some modifications are needed to the scope of the measure to bring it into line with competition law. New clause 7 will make the necessary changes. Once made, we expect to receive confirmation from the European Commission that the measure is not anti-competitive. This will allow us to appoint the day and to bring the legislation into effect. Once that is done, the 100 per cent. first-year allowances may be claimed on any expenditure in the qualifying period.

It may be helpful, and for the convenience of the House, if I outline briefly the areas of change. On transport, the 100 per cent. first-year allowances were never intended to apply to expenditure on machinery and plant for leasing or letting, hire cars, long-life assets, sea-going ships, railway assets or aircraft. New clause 7 will expand the exclusion to cover transport assets, such as lorries or containers used in the freight haulage business. It will not affect the entitlement to allowances on transport assets in other types of business, such as delivery vans of retail businesses, mobile shops or tourist buses.

As for the agriculture and fisheries sectors, the new clause will mean that 100 per cent. first-year allowances will be available only on investments authorised by the Department of Agriculture in Northern Ireland, as compatible with competition law in the Department.

As for large investments, under the normal rules, the 100 per cent. allowance will be clawed back if the asset begins to be used primarily outside Northern Ireland within two years of the expenditure being incurred. For exceptionally large investments, the new clause will extend that claw-back period to five years. The changes are required to ensure that the measure comes within competition rules while retaining the maximum benefit for Northern Ireland businesses.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Will the Minister expand on the conflict with competition law, which she used as a generic term? Which competition law is causing the problem?

Mrs. Roche: I am talking about state aids, as the right hon. Gentleman will be aware. Rightly, and understandably, the Commission has an interest in this matter. It has always been the policy of this Government—and, to be fair, of the previous Government—to be vigilant on state aids so that protectionism is not let in by the back door. We must make sure that the measures are compatible.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): It is significant that we have been debating for more than two hours before getting to the Government new clauses. That is because of the wholly unprecedented number of money resolutions that the Government have tabled at this late stage. By definition, money resolutions are tax raising. To have eight tabled at the start of the Report stage shows not only that we have a tax-raising Government and that we have had a series of tax-raising Budgets, but that we now have tax-raising Report stages.

Rightly, we have examined some of the money resolutions, and we can now approach the stage where we can look at the new clauses. I am interested in this one, as it restricts the ability of businesses in Northern Ireland to reduce their tax burden through the use of 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances for small and medium-sized enterprises.

The measure was announced last year by the Government, and was passed in last year's Finance Bill. It has been approved by the House, but we now learn that it was not brought into effect because of possible problems with competition law.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), in an acute intervention, asked exactly what that meant. He got a reply, but I am not sure that the Financial Secretary was entirely accurate. I ask the question rather than make the allegation. It is possible that she was a little disingenuous.

6.30 pm

We know that the 100 per cent. first-year allowance conflicts not with United Kingdom competition law, but with the requirements of the European Union business taxation group, chaired by the Paymaster General, who confirmed in a parliamentary answer that the subject of first-year allowances for businesses in Northern Ireland is being investigated by the group.

If the group concludes that the allowances conflict with the requirements of fairness and tax competition, they could be withdrawn, which is a serious matter. It is time that the Government came clean about the EU group, because the allowances are not the only measure in the Budget that could be hit. For example, the 40 per cent. first-year allowances for small and medium-sized enterprises in the rest of the United Kingdom were debated in Committee upstairs without Ministers mentioning the fact that they, too, are under investigation by the business taxation group.

More recently, I asked how many British tax measures were under review by the group. It took the Treasury nearly a month to come up with the answer, which is surprising, as the Paymaster General chairs the group. Eventually, she confirmed that eight measures were under investigation, including measures relating to the film industry, which, again, we debated in Committee without knowing the full facts; enterprise zones, which should be of interest to Labour Members who believe in industrial regeneration; and the 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances for small and medium-sized enterprises in Northern Ireland.

The House, extraordinarily, is being asked to pass certain tax measures while at the same time a European Union tax committee, chaired by a Treasury Minister, is sitting in secret—the agenda and minutes are not published—and may require those measures to be repealed or withdrawn. This is an important constitutional issue and the House must have an explanation. The Government have agreed in advance to abide by the tax committee's decisions, so it is not an advisory group.

We know that because the matter was debated in 1997 and the Government published an explanatory memorandum. In its report on the matter, the Scrutiny Committee said that "the Government would agree to the code only 'if it intended to honour it'."

The Government have agreed to the code on business taxation, so they must have agreed to honour it. Will the Financial Secretary confirm that it follows that, if the business taxation group rules against the capital allowances for businesses in Northern Ireland, the Government will withdraw them?

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Can my right hon. Friend think of any possible reason why the Government should not publish the reports of the code of conduct committee, given that the latest one, published in May, contains a series of additional measures? Is not it an insult to democracy and to all that we are meant to stand for that the Government are agreeing to measures on so-called tax loopholes without the House of Commons or the people being told? Will he invite the Government to publish the most recent report, which I happen to have in my hand because I got it by devious means?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I entirely agree. The House deserves to know what tax measures are being discussed elsewhere, as it practically came into existence to take the means of taxation away from the Crown or the Executive and put it in the hands of those who are answerable to the electorate. My hon. Friend is seeking to assert an ancient right.

The Government have made much of their commitment to openness and "Your Right to Know". I think that they even plan to introduce a Bill to allow the people to know what is being done in their name. It would be a good start if the Government could tell us what tax measures are under review.

The parliamentary answer to which I referred made it clear that the measures that it lists are drawn only from the group's initial list. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) said, there are other lists. I believe that some energetic web surfer discovered a list of more than 200 European—not all British—tax measures that are under review by the secret committee chaired by the Paymaster General. Will the Financial Secretary publish a comprehensive list of the British measures?

Will the Financial Secretary confirm that the restrictions in the new clause, which would cut back the scope of the allowances as agreed last year, were introduced in response to fears about the EU committee, so that bringing our measures into line with the requirements of European competition law really means bringing them into line with the requirements of that committee? Why else have the restrictions been introduced? The allowances were announced last year to a great fanfare and passed by the House.

The allowances are being restricted in areas in which the situation in Northern Ireland has got worse, such as haulage. The Government's tax measures on road fuel have made the haulage industry uncompetitive, and the problem is especially acute in Northern Ireland, which has a land border with another member state, so the industry can easily be undermined by lorries using cheaper fuel from the Republic We know that a great deal of fuel smuggling goes on there; the Government will not even give us an estimate of how much, but we know that the problem is serious and worsening.

The same applies to agriculture and fisheries. Northern Ireland faces the same problems as the rest of the United Kingdom, so the case for restricting allowances there has not been made. We strongly suspect that the restrictions are designed to bring us more in line with the requirements of the EU tax committee.

I have another question for the Minister. The terms of the new clause indicate that the capital allowances for agriculture are to be restricted in a way that is devolved to the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland. That is somewhat remarkable, as it means that the power, not only to authorise specific items of expenditure on agriculture, but to specify persons, is to be at the discretion of that department. Officials in that department will be able to decide that one person gets the capital allowance, but that another person does not. That is a remarkable provision for the House to approve: instead of setting out tax liabilities in rules and regulations, we are now devolving that power to the say-so of officials at the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland. Perhaps the Minister can tell us why the rules cannot appear on the face of the new clause.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

My real point is that we are beginning to see the results of the Government's weakness in respect of European Union tax harmonisation. In 1997, they agreed to a code and they said that they would abide by it. Now, although the Government proudly announced certain tax measures last year and now want to introduce them, those measures are under review by that tax committee. In effect, the judgment of the House on matters of taxation has become subservient to a European Union committee over which we have no control. Those are the facts and we require an explanation.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I apologise for not having been in the Chamber for the first minute of the Minister's speech introducing the new clause.

I agree with some of the points made by the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), especially those relating to the secrecy surrounding the group that meets in Europe, because I believe that all the committees that meet in Europe should be far more open than they have been. It is possible that, when the right hon. Gentleman was a Treasury Minister and attended meetings of ECOFIN in Brussels, he pushed for greater openness about the proceedings of that committee, but I doubt that he did so. If I am wrong, I should be more than happy to take an intervention from him. The Conservative Government did not have a good record on pushing for greater openness in Europe, and I hope that the current Government will do a better job in that respect.

I disagree when the right hon. Gentleman questions the purpose of the tax committee, because there is a need to examine how state aid is allocated and whether specific forms of state aid meet the requirements of competition law. Competition law is a bulwark of the single market. It is astonishing that, in the Chamber and in Committee, the right hon. Gentleman has argued continuously against bodies such as the tax committee, given that he is—I assume—in favour of the single market. It is astonishing for the Conservatives to be in favour of free trade and of the single market, but against those mechanisms of the European Union that are designed to make the single market work more effectively, including by abolishing state aid. The Conservatives are supposed to oppose most forms of state aid, so it is astonishing that the right hon. Gentleman does not support the EU in trying to get rid of state aid which has, historically, been used by other EU member states in ways that are to the detriment of British jobs and industry. I should have thought that the ideological position adopted by the Conservatives would lead them to be in favour of the sort of approach embodied in that European committee.

That does not mean that we should not voice concerns about specific measures laid before the House, and new clause 7 did cause me some concern when I read it and the explanatory notes, especially because, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it removes first-year allowances for investment in the road haulage industry. As we heard in earlier debates on the Finance Bill, the road haulage industry in Northern Ireland is in great trouble, because of the differential vehicle excise duties and fuel excise duties charged in Northern Ireland and in the neighbouring country across the land border, the Republic of Ireland. Now seems an especially inappropriate time to remove allowances, and my questions to the Minister focus on that issue.

Can the Government think of no other way—for example, through capital allowances or direct grants—to support the road haulage industry in Northern Ireland as it attempts to tackle the problems that are specific to it, rather than generally affecting the mainland road haulage industry? Does the subsection to which the right hon. Member for Wells referred, which would give the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland powers to make specific grants, offer a means of enabling the Government and civil servants to provide help to the Northern Ireland road haulage industry? Obviously, it would be limited to that section of the industry that is related to agricultural transportation, but it might offer a means of helping at least one part of the industry.

I accept that rules for the application of tax law should appear in legislation, rather than administrative laxity or freedoms allowing civil servants in departments to hand out allowances for specific expenditures. That is not the best way to proceed. However, in the present circumstances of the Northern Ireland road haulage industry encountering great difficulties, that power—if it can be used in the way I suggest and remain in accordance with competition law—might offer Ministers a means of helping that industry, for example, by helping it to convert to fuel-efficient lorries.

I hope that the Minister will answer my points when she winds up the debate. She should not listen to the protestations of the right hon. Member for Wells in respect of the wider issues.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): At this historic time, as we look toward a peace settlement in Northern Ireland, I am sure that the whole House would welcome any extension of preferential treatment in terms of capital allowances that focused on small and medium-sized enterprises in Northern Ireland. The new clause strikes a balance between acting in accordance with competition law and doing too much and risking accusations of providing state aid that distorts competition. The result is that we can promote industrial prosperity in Northern Ireland while abiding by competition law.

The Conservatives' view seems somewhat schizophrenic. On the one hand, they say that we should have nothing to do with the Europeans and their competition law; on the other hand, they are the first to accuse other European countries of giving unfair subsidies that make our industry uncompetitive. Perhaps we should be accustomed to the Conservatives holding such a contradictory position. We all want fair competition and we all want to support peace in Northern Ireland. Offering preferential treatment to SMEs in Northern Ireland offers a way ahead that fits in with European competition policy, which is much to be applauded. I welcome the new clause.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The House should realise what it is about tonight. On 12 May 1998, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced his intention to introduce 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances for spending by small and medium-sized businesses on machinery and plant for use in Northern Ireland. That was carefully thought out—the Government did not simply shove the measure on the table and then phone up their friends in Brussels to ask them whether it was fair and reasonable.

As I hope that the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies)—whose speech was so fascinating—appreciates, although the scheme was carefully thought out before being announced by the Government, it has not yet been activated—it has not happened yet. I am sure that he is having a jolly discussion with the hon. Lady sitting behind him, but I hope that he has heard that simple point. Despite that, and although there has been consultation, the Government are now saying that they got it wrong and will have to change it substantially.

The Government are removing the 100 per cent. first-year allowances for transport assets. Why would they do that? Has the road haulage industry had a wonderful time? Is it subject to special preference? We all know that the road haulage industry has had massive new taxes imposed on it, so why are the Government discriminating against it in this measure?

On agriculture and fisheries, the 100 per cent. first-year allowances will be available only for investments authorised with the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland as being compatible. The 100 per cent. first-year allowances will be withdrawn if the asset begins to be used outside Northern Ireland within two years of the expenditure being incurred. How on earth will that be implemented? Will the Government introduce passports for machinery, so that, if machinery is moved from Northern Ireland to, for example, Scotland, they can make a note of that and ensure that the allowance is withdrawn?

Those are extraordinary measures, and we should ask ourselves why there is panic and why legislative changes are being made to bash road haulage and to introduce a passport for machinery to ensure that it is not transferred, even for a few days, from Northern Ireland to Scotland. Frankly, that is nutty.

As hon. Members are well aware, I have never been a great fan of grants and allowances in any form. However, the Government are changing a sensible scheme that was carefully thought out and approved by the House. The scheme is very detailed. It says that, to qualify as small and medium-sized enterprises, businesses have to meet two of the following three tests: they have to have an annual turnover of not more than £11 million; they have to have assets of not more than £5.6 million, and they have to have not more than 250 employees. The miracle men of the Treasury had worked out a reasonable, sensible scheme, and the Government are now introducing these rather strange changes before the scheme has even started. I hope that Members will ask themselves, "Why are the Government doing that?"

The Government are not introducing the changes because they are stupid or nasty, although all Governments can, to some extent, be stupid or nasty. Something has happened or someone has said that they must change the scheme. It is pretty obvious that the Government have been involved in discussions in Europe in secret committees, and that they have not been publishing the resulting papers. A report of the code of conduct group was mentioned in the Treasury Sub-Committee only last week. I said that I had heard that there was a great plan to tell us about unfair tax discrimination and that there was a report on that. I asked whether it was possible to get hold of that report and I was told "No. Such reports are secret and they are not available."

I have a great friend, a brigadier in Gloucestershire, who can always get secret reports if I particularly want them, so I got that report. I have it in my hand. It is not available to the public. It says that there have been two reports of the code of the conduct committee, which is chaired by the Paymaster General.

One report classified items of tax competition that the committee felt were unfair, unreasonable and wrong. Four proposals were made. The first related to the film industry. The poor old film industry had better watch out, because it is going to get clobbered. The second related to tax relief on shipping, and I warn that industry that it, too, will be clobbered. The third related to enterprise zones and the fourth to first-year capital allowances in Northern Ireland. Those were identified by that secret EU committee as one of the flaws in the tax arrangements.

I am sure that you will rule me out of order if necessary, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but what worries me is the contents of the second report of that committee, which are alarming and terrible. When they become public, people will be upset.

As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I had rows with the previous Government just as I do with this Government. Why the blazes will they not tell the people the truth about what is happening in Brussels? Why the blazes will they not publish the reports as they emerge? I am sure that the Government will say that the reports do not require them to take action. We all know what is happening with tax harmonisation and we all know what is being forced on us. We all know what is coming in by the back door, and it is time that people told the truth. I am sure that the Government are exactly the same as the previous Government, and they should tell people what is happening. I ask the Minister why those reports cannot be published. Why cannot the report for which I asked, which emerged in May, be published? Why cannot the Treasury Sub-Committee get hold of it?

I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I am getting bad-tempered in my old age, but what is happening in the House of Commons is appalling. People are not being told what is happening. The Government are making announcements and we are debating measures about which we can do nothing. Although there may be a case for throwing away our democracy, we should be consulted.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a parallel between this case and the publishing of the minutes of the Bank of England Monetary Policy Committee? If those minutes can be published, why cannot the minutes of the committees to which he refers also be published?

Sir Teddy Taylor: It is interesting to read the minutes of the Monetary Policy Committee, and I agree with my hon. Friend that the more we publish, the better. We do not want secret information but, if the Government are saying that there are tax mistakes or unfair forms of taxation, Parliament and the people should be told.

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

Part of the latest report concerns the Channel Islands, and, frankly, I should not like to have any money invested in the Channel Islands now—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman considerable leeway. He is, of course, entitled to make his point about the new clause, but he is not entitled to debate the generality of his argument about secrecy and openness. The new clause concerns first-year allowances for investment in Northern Ireland, and his remarks must relate to that.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I mention discussions in Europe only because the report specifically says that our grants to Northern Ireland industry are considered wrong and unfair by the code of conduct committee. If we cannot mention that, I do not know why we are in the House of Commons at all. It may be said that the reports are not public and that people cannot get hold of them, but they exist and they arise from meetings that have taken place.

I am very sorry that, for the first time since I came here in 1964—which was a long time ago—I have had a dispute with the person in the Chair. It is not my practice to fall out with those who are in the Chair. However, something very nasty and wrong is happening, and I find it appalling that the Minister can say that the Government have suddenly decided, for no apparent reason, that the allowances that they agreed only last year and that have not yet been introduced must all be changed.

The Government will no doubt say that they are not legally obliged to implement the conclusions of the code of conduct committee, but that committee regards four specific items as contrary to tax harmonisation, and we do not know about many of its other conclusions, so, although I shall achieve nothing in relation to the new clause and I shall probably fall out with more people than ever before, I urge the Government, at the very least, to start publishing the committee's reports. They know that those reports will, in any event, become public. I have the latest report, which has not yet been published, and I am sure that someone else will get hold of the next one.

Why cannot Parliament be told what the Government are discussing? Why cannot we be told what agreements are being made on taxation? Having spent 35 years in the House and discussed many matters, I find it sad that people are not being told about such agreements and that we spend a great deal of time discussing things that we can do nothing about. We are—inadvertently, I am sure—being misled about the origin of the changes introduced in the new clause. I hope that other hon. Members will ask themselves why the Government suddenly want to change a detailed scheme that was introduced in 1998, before it has even been implemented. There is something wrong in that, and I hope that my colleagues will pick up on that.

Mr. Jack: This is an intriguing new clause. I hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to shine a little light into what, from the speeches so far, seem to be increasingly murky waters.

One of the things that worries me in overall terms is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) said, something was introduced after careful thought in order to confer a tax advantage on one part of the United Kingdom, yet, for the reason that the Minister described in response to my intervention—it offends competition law—it is being changed. She also prayed in aid state aids. I am now less clear about the matter than I was before she replied. If the Financial Secretary will do me the courtesy of listening, I should like to ask her why, for example, 100 per cent. scientific research allowances that are available in Northern Ireland are not affected by the proposals.

In general, two important tax principles are raised by the new clause. One is whether giving any 100 per cent. allowances contravenes the currently unspecified competition laws. The second is whether a sovereign member of the European Union choosing to grant a tax advantage to one area within its own boundaries runs foul of our position in the EU.

I have always understood that one of the principles that one operates in tax in this area is that of fiscal competition. My understanding is that, up to now, a country wishing to confer certain capital allowances for certain purposes on certain tax regimes has never been challenged; we may have whatever allowances we like. It is difficult to answer why we appear to be corrupting that advantageous position by the new clause. The Financial Secretary must spell out very clearly how competition law interacts with the sovereign right of the UK to levy its own tax rates.

We are facing harmonisation by the back door. The Financial Secretary winces, but she will know that, when I was in the Treasury, all our EU partners—certainly the major players who valued independence of their tax-determining regimes—would have fought tooth and nail the case of Hoechst v. the European Union on a matter connected with corporation tax because they did not want somebody else determining their tax law.

If, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East says—he and I have not always agreed on matters European—there has been a change of Government policy, let us have it out in the open. It is no use the Financial Secretary shaking her head. One of the values of these debates is that we may tease out any new interaction between competition law and tax law, with which the new clause deals.

I should like a specific answer to the question how, for example, Northern Ireland can benefit from a 100 per cent. scientific research allowance but cannot benefit from the original proposal. Will the Financial Secretary spell out the competition laws that are corrupted by the proposed state aid?

We know that one country may confer a benefit through the tax system, but another may do so by another mechanism. It is certainly of interest to those in the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland to know of the disquiet among Northern Ireland pig producers over the moneys that were passed to French pig producers in connection with difficulties faced in the French industry. The £150 million that the French Government passed to their pig producers was supposedly to deal with restructuring their industry. The French Government may have decided to deal with that matter via a tax allowance. Similarly, we may have responded by giving our pig industry a tax allowance for various matters such as welfare.

Has there been any attempt in framing the new clause to ensure that there is equivalence of help across the EU, given that we may choose to help an industry via tax allowances, but another member state may deal with such a situation by another method? I am now more confused than ever in understanding how there can be parity of competition. The example that I quoted is not hypothetical; it a real issue that affects pig producers not just in Northern Ireland but in the United Kingdom generally.

It might have been helpful if the Financial Secretary in her opening remarks had compared and contrasted capital allowances north and south of the border. By and large, the use of assets, particularly agricultural assets, is the point of comparison. I would have liked to have known that we were not disadvantaging ourselves in Northern Ireland by the proposed measure.

I turn to an aspect on which my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) touched in his pertinent and perceptive comments. In tax terms, this is a highly unusual measure. DANI is to make statements on what qualifies for tax allowances. Can the Financial Secretary tell me whether those judgments are challengeable via the commissioners of the Inland Revenue? It strikes me that we have a one-way street. DANI will be able to make judgments—there is no definitive list in the new clause—but there appears to be no mechanism for challenging them. The only way in which taxpayers may normally deal with such circumstances is to challenge an Inland Revenue ruling through the commissioners. I am not clear whether that mechanism will be open to people in this matter.

The proposed subsection (3CE) is even more mysterious. It says that DANI authorisations

"may, if given generally, be modified by that Department",

and

"may in any case be absolute or conditional."

Does that mean that DANI, or someone else giving an interpretation of the new clause, will be allowed a second bite at a ruling? It sounds to me as if some conditional ruling could be given, hinting that an allowance might be included, but subsequently modified or omitted. That is a recipe for, to say the least, a lack of clarity and certainly a lack of precision in operation. I, for one, would like some clarification.

I do not understand how a fiscal activity puts us in contravention with competition laws when we already have an ability to set sovereign rates of tax as we choose. I underscore the importance that I attach to being given clear explanations of why we thought that the legislation as originally drafted was all right, but we are now told that it must be modified by new clause 7.

Mrs. Roche: This has been an interesting debate. If one had heard the opening remarks of the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), one would have thought that the Conservative party was in favour of first-year capital allowances. However, the right hon. Gentleman neglected to point out that, in 1984, Lord Lawson, then Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer, phased out 100 per cent. first-year allowances.

Of course I understand the speech made by the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor); I assure him that I have a great regard for him and have no intention of falling out with him. However, I want to make it clear to all right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken that, although the Northern Ireland measures were notified to the code of conduct group that is chaired by my hon. Friend the Paymaster General, we do not believe that they represent harmful tax competition. We are considering not that group, but state aids. I point out to the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack)—in the gentlest possible terms—that I sometimes wonder whether we inhabit parallel Treasuries. The state aid rules were in place when we joined the EU. Any aid, including fiscal aid, can be found to be a state aid. That has always been the case; it was certainly the case when the right hon. Gentleman held the position of Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As the hon. Lady has suggested that the Government may not have reported this matter to the code of conduct committee, will she ask her officials to read page 63 of the committee's report, published on 25 May, reference 8231/99? The report gives the clear impression that the matter was one of a small number of alleged, harmful tax competition measures presented to the committee by the UK Government. I realise that Ministers sometimes do not see such reports, but it is there in black and white.

Mrs. Roche: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, but perhaps he did not hear me correctly. I said that the matter had been notified to the committee. However, we are dealing not with that group, but with the normal rules on state aids, and I shall deal with that during my remarks.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The issue is not whether the matter was notified to the committee, but whether the committee is investigating it as potentially harmful to tax competition. We submit that it is the latter; the matter is under review and hence may be withdrawn by the Government, under the assurance that they have already given that they would abide by the outcome of the committee.

Mrs. Roche: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong; the premise of his speech was wrong. It is not the code of conduct group that is at issue, but state aids. I realise that the right hon. Gentleman views that group as a vast conspiracy. Let me allay his fears. I am afraid that he goes home at night wondering whether the code of conduct group is following him. With my long experience as a constituency Member of Parliament, I have regularly had to reassure my constituents as to such fears. I am anxious to reassure him that it is not a problem.

When we introduced the measure, we said in our press release that it would need to be cleared with the European Commission as a potential state aid. Could we have been more open than that? It was clear from the start. State aid rules arise within the framework of Community competition policy and have a legal basis in the provisions of the treaty of Rome. The provisions make illegal any non-approved aid given by a member state in any form that distorts, or threatens to distort, competition by favouring certain businesses or regions, or the production of certain goods—that has always been in the treaty. The EC enforces state aid rules and approves certain state aids that are compatible with the common market.

[Mrs. Roche]

In my introductory remarks, I pointed out that the Government support a tough stance on state aid. We have consistently supported initiatives both to tighten the state aid rules and to improve their implementation, with the overall aim of reducing distortions in the single market and of improving competitiveness in Europe. I think that the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East acknowledged that in his remarks. We introduced the 100 per cent. first-year allowances and the enabling legislation last year, to give a clear signal of our support for new investment in Northern Ireland. That is what it was all about. As we made clear in the press release, we knew that we should need to clear the measure with the Commission before it could be brought into effect.

I want to spell out that there would have been no point in restricting the scope beforehand. As the House is aware, the state rules are complex, and subject to negotiation. We bid high, knowing that we might have to compromise and settle for less at the end of the day. However, we rightly wanted to get the best possible deal for small businesses in Northern Ireland—as any Government would want to do. Given recent events, I am sure that the House is united in wanting prosperity for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I have listened carefully to the Financial Secretary's remarks. She pointed out that the state aid rules are extremely complicated. Indeed, the European Court does not operate on the basis of precedent like our own courts; it can overrule its previous decisions. It seems, therefore, that DANI will have an impossible job in trying to judge, at the margins, whether those decisions come under the state aid rules. It will surely always have to rule against the decisions coming under those provisions. Will the hon. Lady explain how DANI will be able to make decisions?

Mrs. Roche: When one is dealing with matters that are the subject of debate within the EU, such as agriculture, of course one needs tight rules. However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Department is expert in such matters. When the rules are applicable, we want businesses to take advantage of them.

The road haulage sector was mentioned. There will be limited impact on hauliers, because most road haulage in Northern Ireland is cross-border or international, and hence would not have met the condition in the provisional measure that assets must be used primarily in Northern Ireland. The new clause excludes only vehicles and containers from the scope of first-year allowances; the road haulage sector will still be able to claim 100 per cent. first-year allowances on other assets. I know that that will be of interest to the industry.

Under the treaty of Rome, there are strict rules on state aids for agriculture; that is why the provisions relating to DANI are included. However, there will be a right to go before the Commissioners.

The new clause is extremely sensible; we have tried to achieve the best possible deal for businesses in Northern Ireland. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 15

OIL TAXATION: QUALIFYING ASSETS

'.—(1) Subsection (2) below applies where—

(a) an asset which is not a mobile asset is a qualifying asset for the purposes of the Oil Taxation Act 1983 in relation to a person ("the taxpayer") who is a participator in an oil field ("the field");

(b) tariff receipts or disposal receipts of the taxpayer which are referable to the asset are attributable to the field for a chargeable period ("the earlier period");

(c) receipts of the taxpayer which are referable to the asset for a subsequent chargeable period ("the later period") would not, apart from this section, be tariff receipts or disposal receipts attributable to the field for that period as a result of—

(i) the taxpayer's ceasing to be a participator in the field; or

(ii) his becoming a participator in another oil field; and

(d) not more than two chargeable periods intervene between the earlier period and the later period.

(2) The Oil Taxation Acts shall have effect, in relation to the later period and any subsequent chargeable period, as if—

(a) receipts of the taxpayer which are referable to the asset for the period concerned were tariff receipts or disposal receipts attributable to the field for that period; and

(b) in a case falling within subsection (1)(c)(i) above, the taxpayer continued to be a participator in the field.

(3) Subsection (4) below applies where—

(a) an asset which is not a mobile asset is a qualifying asset for the purposes of the Oil Taxation Act 1983 in relation to a person ("the taxpayer") who is a participator in an oil field ("the field");

(b) tariff receipts or disposal receipts of the taxpayer which are referable to the asset are attributable to the field for a chargeable period ("the earlier period");

(c) in a subsequent chargeable period ("the later period") the taxpayer disposes of—

(i) the asset; or

(ii) an interest in the asset,

to another person ("the transferee") in circumstances such that section 7 of the Oil Taxation Act 1983 does not apply to the disposal; and

(d) not more than two chargeable periods intervene between the earlier period and the later period.

(4) The Oil Taxation Acts shall have effect, in relation to the later period and any subsequent chargeable period, as if—

(a) receipts of the transferee which are referable to the asset for the period concerned were tariff receipts or disposal receipts attributable to the field for that period; and

(b) the transferee were a participator in the field.

(5) Subject to subsection (6) below, any reference in this section to receipts of any person which are referable to the asset for a period is a reference to any sums which—

(a) are received or receivable by that person in that period in respect of the use of the asset, or the provision of services or other business facilities of whatever kind in connection with its use; or

(b) are received or receivable by that person in respect of the disposal in that period of the asset, or an interest in the asset.

(6) In a case falling within subsection (3)(c)(ii) above—

(a) any sums which are received or receivable by the transferee otherwise than by virtue of his acquisition of the interest shall not be regarded for the purposes of subsection (4) above as receipts of his which are referable to the asset for any period; and

(b) for the purposes of paragraph (a) above, such apportionment shall be made as may be just and reasonable.

(7) This section shall be construed as one with Part I of the Oil Taxation Act 1975; and in this section "the Oil Taxation Acts" means—

(a) the enactments relating to petroleum revenue tax (including this section);

(b) Chapter V of Part XII of the Taxes Act 1988 (petroleum extraction activities); and

(c) sections 62 to 65 of the Finance Act 1991 (oil industry).

(8) Nothing in this section shall be taken to affect the meaning of "participator" in paragraph 4 of Schedule 2 to the principal Act.

(9) Subject to subsection (11) below, subsection (1) above applies where—

(a) the disposal by virtue of which the taxpayer ceased to be a participator in the field; or

(b) the acquisition by virtue of which he became a participator in the other oil field, was made on or after 1st July 1999.

(10) Subject to subsection (11) below, subsection (3) above applies where the asset, or the interest in the asset, was disposed of on or after that date.

(11) Neither subsection (1) nor subsection (3) above applies where the disposal or acquisition concerned was made pursuant to an agreement which was made before 1st July 1999 and either—

(a) the agreement was not conditional; or

(b) the agreement was conditional and the condition was satisfied before that date.'.—[Mrs. Roche.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Roche: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clause 16—Petroleum revenue tax: instalments.

Government new clause 17—Business assets: roll-over relief.

New clause 19—Offshore oil and gas: roll-over relief—

'.—(1) Section 193 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 is hereby repealed with effect from 6th April 1999.

(2) In section 155 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 (classes of assets for the purposes of roll-over relief) after Class 8 there shall be inserted—

"CLASS 9

A licence under Part I of the Petroleum Act 1998 or the Petroleum (Production) Act (Northern Ireland) 1964.

This section applies to all licences (or interests in them) disposed of on or after the 6th April 1999.".'.

Government amendment No. 35.

Mrs. Roche: The new clauses and the amendment relate to the taxation of North sea oil and gas activities. New clause 15 prevents the avoidance of petroleum revenue tax—PRT—that could occur if tariff income, which was attributable to a PRT-paying field, were shifted to a non-PRT-paying field.

New clause 16 will maintain the monthly flow of PRT receipts from companies which, mainly as a result of new clause 15, will be participators in a PRT-paying field, although they will have no interest in the oil and gas produced by that field.

New clause 17 and the related amendment No. 35 extend capital gains roll-over to UK oil licences. That change will make it easier for the oil industry to rationalise its holdings of North sea oil licences. This will allow more scope for cost cutting and more aggressive development of new prospects.

There is evidence that some oil companies are considering restructuring their interests in North sea oil and gas fields. Due to the existing rules for charging PRT on tariffs received for the use of pipelines and other North sea oil assets, a restructuring of assets can lead to tariffs being shifted, for PRT purposes, from the current chargeable field to a different field.

Where the tariffs are currently attributable to a field that pays PRT, there will be an effective PRT charge on the tariffs. That PRT would be lost if the tariffs were shifted to a field that did not pay PRT. There is no justification for that loss of PRT, particularly as it would create a mismatch between the effective PRT relief already given in the PRT-paying field on expenditure on building the assets and the lack of an effective PRT charge on future tariff income.

New clause 15 prevents that PRT loss by ensuring that, where a restructuring would lead to a change in the field to which tariffs are attributed for PRT purposes, the tariffs will continue to be attributable to the current field. In addition, if the owner of the tariff-generating assets would not, following restructuring, be a participator in the field to which tariffs remain attributable for PRT purposes, he will be deemed to be a participator in that field. That will ensure that PRT can be charged in that field on the tariffs that are attributable to it.

New clause 15 is aimed at retaining the current PRT charge on tariffs which could be lost due to the restructuring of companies' interests in North sea oil and gas fields, but it should not prevent restructuring of these interests. Where there are good commercial reasons for the restructuring, new clause 15 should not prevent the companies from going ahead with it.

The total tax potentially at risk from companies being able to shift tariffs from PRT-paying fields to non-PRT-paying fields is about £100 million per year. New clause 15 will protect those tax receipts.

New clause 15 has been introduced at this stage due to the evidence that has very recently come to light about some companies considering the restructuring of their interests in North sea oil and gas fields in a way that would have led to a loss of PRT on tariff income. To protect that tax, we have had to act very quickly.

One effect of new clause 15 is that there will be more companies that are participators in a North sea oilfield but that do not own an interest in the oil produced.

PRT, as the House knows, is paid by monthly instalment. The amount of the instalment is based on the PRT liability for the previous period, and an adjusting payment or repayment is made, two months after the end of each chargeable period, to take account of any underpayment or overpayment of PRT for the current period. Where a participator in a field has not delivered or appropriated any oil in any month, he can withhold the PRT instalment that is due in the following month. That is because an oil company that has received no cash flow from the field in the previous month may not have sufficient cash to pay its PRT instalment.

[Mrs. Roche]

Companies that are deemed to be participators by new clause 15 will be able to use that rule to withhold all PRT instalments, given that, as they have no interest in the oil produced by the field, they will never have received oil in a previous month. But there is no justification for allowing a company to withhold instalments if the company has received tariff income in the previous month. New clause 16 therefore ensures that a PRT instalment for a month cannot be withheld if the participator has any tariff receipts that are received or receivable in the previous month. New clauses 15 and 16 therefore aim to protect the Exchequer from the loss of tax that would arise from tax avoidance.

New clause 17, on the other hand, extends a relief—roll-over relief—to gains that oil companies make on the disposal of UK oil licences. Roll-over relief allows a business to sell one business asset and acquire another without facing an immediate capital gains tax charge. By deferring the tax charge, the relief helps reduce the effect of tax on companies' investment decisions.

UK oil licences were removed from the scope of roll-over relief in 1987. As a result, if a company sold its interest in a UK oil licence, it was liable to an immediate tax charge on any chargeable gain that arose. That charge was levied even if the proceeds of the sale were reinvested in another UK oil licence.

Our recent discussions with oil companies have revealed that the North sea oil industry has changed significantly since 1987. There is now far more emphasis on developing mature fields, maximising the use of existing infrastructure and managing projects efficiently. In that context, the absence of roll-over relief is causing problems for companies as they seek to rationalise and consolidate their North sea interests. It is now no longer appropriate to deny roll-over relief on UK oil licences.

New clause 17 therefore repeals the 1987 legislation that excluded UK oil licences from the scope of roll-over relief. The House will be pleased to know that UK oil licences will now be put on a similar footing to most other business assets and qualify for roll-over relief. Amendment No. 35 is consequential: it includes the repeal within the list of provisions in the repeals schedule of the Finance Bill.

I hope that this news will be greeted very warmly by both sides of the House; it certainly will be by the industry. I commend the Government new clauses and the amendment to the House.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): The hon. Lady intoned her brief like an orthodox priest intoning a liturgy in Church Slavonic which he did not understand and did not expect his audience to. She does much less than justice to the two measures that the Government are proposing. They are quite different from one another.

Mrs. Roche: As a member of the United Synagogue, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will rephrase that; I would hate him to get me into any trouble.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady is proposing five new measures. They are, in fact, about two quite different subjects. The first two—new clauses 15 and 16—deal with a PRT issue, and the subsequent three measures deal with a capital gains tax issue. It would be sensible to separate the two.

On the first group—new clauses 15 and 16—we have no problem in principle with a measure that is obviously designed to prevent avoidance of PRT. Let us say that a company has an asset that has benefited from PRT relief in its purchase or construction. It then gives up its interests in the production of a field, but maintains that tariff-generating asset to service the field. Under present rules, that tariff-generating asset could be allocated to a non-PRT field and so, whereas the asset had benefited from PRT reliefs in the past, the revenues generated by it would not be subject to PRT. In so far as new clause 15 restores symmetry in that respect and prevents the loss to the Exchequer of avoidable—I believe unjustly avoidable—PRT, we are very happy with it.

New clause 16 deals with the consequential case: if a company has given up its interests in the production of a field, by definition it has no production so, under the rule that says that if it has no production for two quarters it does not pay PRT, it would be relieved of paying PRT for ever. I take it that the hon. Lady, in conceiving these two new clauses, had in mind something like a gas or oil pipeline that services a number of fields and could, by this method, without new clause 16, be switched from a PRT field to a non-PRT field.

Mrs. Roche indicated assent.

Mr. Davies: I see that the hon. Lady endorses my interpretation. However, I would like to ask her, because it is an important point, exactly what type of assets would be involved. I take the pipeline to be a clear case in point. I see that the second line of new clause 15 excludes mobile assets. Clearly, something like a mobile drilling rig would be a mobile asset. However, what would be the position of a floating production platform? Could such a platform have benefited from PRT relief when it was installed in a PRT field? If it is shifted to another field, will it generate revenues free of PRT? I do not know whether the Financial Secretary is listening to my question but it is an important one. The House deserves an answer to it and we look forward to that.

I ask the hon. Lady to be precise with the definition of assets. She was not precise in her speech, and nor were the Government in their explanatory notes. I have suggested pipelines but we want to know beyond that what types of asset would be affected. That having been established, I think that in principle the Opposition would be happy to accede to the new clause.

When I read new clause 17, I naturally thought, "Hurrah!" What is the new clause? Of course, the Government would not tell us. The Financial Secretary has not mentioned it. New clause 17 represents the Government bringing forward a provision to deliver exactly the effect for which we have been lobbying. Our new clause 19 is designed to produce exactly the same effect. It is probable that the Government heard from the industry—we consulted it on these matters last week—that we were bringing forward a new clause. No doubt the Government thought, "Right, we shall trump the Conservatives. After all, we will do the right thing ourselves."

The Financial Secretary is clearly embarrassed about this. If not, she would have mentioned the Opposition's new clause in her introductory remarks. She managed to skate over the fact that there are two new clauses on the amendment paper that would have the same effect. Both would achieve by different means exactly the same effect.

Mrs. Roche rose—

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady has been rumbled and I give way.

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman has been in the House rather longer than me. However, I did not think—no doubt I shall be corrected—that it was my job when I opened the debate to speak to the Opposition's new clauses and amendments. I might be wrong, but I thought that I would leave that to the hon. Gentleman and others.

Despite all the bluster that we have heard from the hon. Gentleman, I said that the Conservative Government had removed the relief in 1987. I am extremely glad that the hon. Gentleman has come around to our point of view, but it is rather late.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady's attitude is astonishing. First, she is found guilty of plagiarism, and tries to hide the fact. Secondly, she introduces the Government's new clause while trying to hide from the House the fact that there is an alternative on the amendment paper which addresses the same issue but suggests a different response. My greatest suspicions are aroused by the hon. Lady's behaviour. Obviously she did not feel confident enough of her solution to the problem to want to refer to the Opposition's solution. If she thought that her solution was better and ours was weaker or less adequate than her own, she would have been delighted to speak to our new clause to explain why the Government's new clause was better. However, she did not do that.

Tonight, the House has a three-way choice. First, it can decide to do nothing and leave the present regime in place. Secondly, it can accept the Government's proposal to grant roll-over relief to North sea licences. Thirdly, it can accept the Opposition's proposal to grant North sea roll-over relief to North sea licences. The two proposals are very different.

Mr. Edward Davey: If the Government are being as opportunistic as the hon. Gentleman seems to be alleging, surely they would have done this before the Scottish parliamentary elections.

Mr. Davies: I do not think that the Government have been particularly clever in their handling of the Scottish parliamentary elections, which is why other parties did so well, to the Government's great surprise. I am not surprised that they got their tactics wrong for that one as well, as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

We have had this situation before, and it has done great damage to the country. The Conservative party has come up with a solid proposal. It is a well-thought-through, viable and sensible proposal that is very much in the national interest. The Labour party, not to be outdone, and out of sheer machismo or pique, has decided to destroy what the Conservative party put in place when we were in government, or to pretend or attempt to neglect, as we have seen this afternoon, the proposals that we are putting forward in opposition, in favour of their own.

There was a striking example of that over the past few months with the destruction of personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts, which were great successes. The Government could not bear the fact that those scheme were great successes and that people were saving more money.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. He must learn patience.

The Government could not bear the idea that these schemes were great successes and that household saving was increasing so well through PEPs and TESSAs. Against that background, they had to introduce their own scheme. The independent savings account is full of holes, full of shortcomings and badly thought through. Of course, it went quite wrong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that he is straying way beyond the terms of the new clause. Perhaps he will return to the matter in hand.

Mr. Davies: Of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will not say any more about PEPs and TESSAs versus ISAs. However, I think that the analogy is a fair one. We have a choice between a Conservative proposal and a Labour proposal. What is more, we have the Labour Government trying to pretend that the Conservative proposal does not exist. The Labour Government are running away from the opportunity to explain the merits of the two proposals and to defend their own. It appears that they are not capable of criticising our proposal.

Mr. Blizzard: The hon. Gentleman is trying to claim credit for a Conservative proposal. However, when I argued the point during Treasury questions, no Conservative Member rose to continue to press it. When I asked my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry during Trade and Industry questions to take up the point, again no Opposition Member intervened in support. During the meetings of the all-party group, of which I am the chairman, no Conservative Members have pressed the case. How can the hon. Gentleman square reality with what he is saying now?

Mr. Davies: If the hon. Gentleman is dissatisfied with an answer that he receives during parliamentary questions, he must take up the matter with the Ministers concerned. It is Labour Ministers who are in a position to give answers. The hon. Gentleman has scored something of an own goal or has aimed a shot at his own side.

The difference between the two approaches is quite significant. However, we both appear to have the same stated aims, just as with savings schemes, which I must not mention—but we both apparently want to increase savings. The Conservative scheme or schemes delivered that and Labour's did not. Indeed, the Labour scheme delivered a great reduction in savings. In this instance, we again have the same aims. We both agree that it would be desirable to remove any tax obstacles to greater trading of North sea assets.

It is quite natural that at the beginning of the exploitation of a new field, such as the North sea, the risks are high. When licences are being bid for, those risks will be syndicated extensively so that there will be many participations. As fields become more mature, it is natural that there should be trading of those assets, shares and licences, and that there should be fewer holders. In many instances such restructuring can lead to economies of scale, which are extremely desirable.

Apparently we are all at one on the objective. That is certainly the Opposition's position. We believe that roll-over relief should be provided for North sea assets, as it is for many other business assets in this country. The question is how best to get there. We decided to get there in the most direct and straightforward fashion, and that was by saying, "We already have eight classes of business assets which qualify for roll-over relief, so we shall create a ninth." The eight classes have proved to be quite robust. There has been no difficulty at all in obtaining roll-over relief. There has been no ambiguity—and, to my knowledge, no court cases—about businesses in those eight established classes getting roll-over relief.

The sensible step would be to add a ninth class as we have done in new clause 19. What is wrong with that approach? The Financial Secretary did not attempt to argue that there was anything wrong with that approach, and I draw some comfort from her silence. That approach was evidently so unexceptionable that the hon. Lady, who is pretty combative in her way when she wants to be, gave up at the thought of trying to take exception to it. We can take comfort from the proposal that we conceived and tabled.

The hon. Lady's proposal, new clause 17, takes a different approach—a more complicated and less certain approach, which is much less sensible. It knocks out the provisions of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 that explicitly excluded North sea assets from benefiting from roll-over relief. The Government's new clause would restore the status quo ante—the status quo before 1992. The hon. Lady either has not done her homework, or she is being less than frank with the House by not mentioning that. She tried to skate over a material aspect of her new clause. The problem with re-establishing the status quo that existed before the 1992 Act is that that state of affairs was uncertain and unsatisfactory.

It was possible to argue then, and it had been argued before 1987, that North sea licences amounted to a claim on the continental shelf. The continental shelf is land—indeed, it was defined by the 1958 Geneva convention on the continental shelf, and confirmed by the 1982 law of the sea convention, as the extension of the land of a coastal state under the waves, so to speak.

The claim was made before 1987, not unreasonably but by no means with unambiguous certainty, that a licence was a claim on land, and that roll-over relief should therefore be provided, because land that was being exploited by the business that held the licence should qualify for roll-over relief under class 1, whereby land occupied for a commercial purpose benefits from roll-over relief.

The trouble was that that was not unambiguous. So uncertain was it that the Revenue challenged that interpretation, which gave rise to the famous case of RTZ v. Ellis in 1987, in which the Revenue argued that an area was not land and RTZ claimed that it was. As I recall, the matter was referred to the special commissioners, who decided in favour of RTZ. The Government of the day decided to legislate before the matter reached the High Court.

In other words, the jurisprudence was never established before the statute of 1987, which was replaced by the 1992 statute that the Government want to repeal. By definition, a return to the status quo ante would be a return to a state of ambiguity that was never resolved, and which was the basis for extremely expensive investigation and much doubt on the part of investors, businesses and all those involved in the oil industry.

That would be a foolish way of trying to resolve the problem. I want to hear from the hon. Lady why she decided to resolve it in that way, and why, as she has taken up our initiative to grant roll-over relief to North sea assets, if it was for reasons other than machismo or pique on her part, she did not accept our way of doing that. The House deserves and will require such an explanation.

If the hon. Lady does not want to withdraw new clause 17 and accept new clause 19, which would be the best way of resolving the problem, I suggest that she makes a clear statement to the House now that the Government interpret the law prior to 1992 to mean that the continental shelf counts as land for the purposes of class 1 roll-over relief. If she says that, it may have some force in the courts if the matter is subsequently litigated.

However, I regard that as second best. It would be far better for the Government to accept our proposal and to go down that much surer and safer avenue. If the hon. Lady wants to carry the Opposition with her, she must go down one of those routes. So that the matter is absolutely plain, I repeat that she should accept new clause 19—in any event the House deserves an explanation of why she does not consider that a better route—or she should make sure that, if she goes back to the status quo before 1992 or the first legislation on the subject in 1987, the ambiguity that then prevailed is not restored. The only way in which she can do that is by making that declaration now from the Treasury Bench.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central): I welcome the measure presented by the Government and the speed with which it has been introduced. Before I develop that point, I shall comment on the speech that we have just heard from the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies).

It is always endearing to hear a Front-Bench spokesman for the Conservative party pretending that the Conservative party still matters. The gist of the speech of the hon. Gentleman seemed to be that the Government were ignoring the new clauses tabled by the official Opposition. If that contribution was an example of the Conservative Front-Bench team at its best, it is not difficult to see why the contribution was ignored.

The hon. Gentleman left one indelible impression on my mind—the idea of our three women Treasury Ministers strutting their machismo round the Chamber.

I hope that they will carry on strutting their machismo for the rest of our discussion of the Bill, because it is important that they hold the line.

The importance of the oil industry in the United Kingdom is often understated. Not only can we produce our own oil, but the industry still pays substantial sums to the Treasury—about £4 billion a year, down from the boom years when about £12 billion a year was paid in royalties and tax to the Treasury. It is a mature industry and is now in decline. We know that the decline will be long and slow. In my constituency in Aberdeen, we are still looking to at least another 20 or 30 years of the oil industry.

The fact that the industry is not in its prime must be taken into account, so I am pleased that the Government have introduced the measure. One of the biggest problems that the industry faces is the ownership structure. In the early years, many small and large companies bought shares in the various oilfields that were developed, some of them speculatively, and some of the shares have paid off handsomely.

However, rationalisation of investment is necessary to reduce costs in the North sea. We are still an expensive province, and we all compete for the same share of oil investment. It is a global industry and a global market. There is one pot of money in each company, and we compete with provinces around the world for that investment, for example, we compete with Kazakhstan, western Australia, Asia and the middle east.

Most of the middle eastern Governments are exploring the possibility of western investment coming in. All those countries can produce their oil and their gas much more cheaply than we can in the United Kingdom, so it is important that the Government take every opportunity to support the industry. The measure is a small but important one, particularly for the long-term future of the industry.

There are about 380,000 jobs in the oil industry throughout the UK. A recent survey by the Offshore Contractors Association, which is based in my constituency of Aberdeen, determined that 220 Members of the House had constituencies with more than 500 oil-related jobs. That is a significant figure. There is an impression that the industry operates only in Aberdeen, Lowestoft, Great Yarmouth, Teesside and Merseyside, but it penetrates virtually all the country. Even here in the south-east and central London, significant numbers of jobs in planning, computers and software are related to the oil industry.

Measures that help the industry and the jobs in my constituency help jobs throughout the country. They will also help to sustain the industry throughout the country for the next 20 or 30 years and I congratulate the Government on their introduction.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): I follow the hon. Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) in emphasising the pervasiveness of the oil industry. It has not only a direct, obvious presence, but has tentacles—such as subcontracting and the supply industry, which depend on it—that reach throughout the United Kingdom economy. It is important not only to Members of Parliament who represent constituencies with a direct oil interest, but to every hon. Member that the oil industry thrives and prospers long into the future.

As the joint vice-chair of the all-party offshore oil and gas industry group, I recognise the industry's importance and welcome anything that will help it to grow and prosper. Although it is especially important to my constituency in the north-east of Scotland—it is obvious and on the doorstep—from time to time we lose sight of the extent to which it pervades our local economy and how dependent on it we have become. Therefore we do not always realise that we look to the future by supporting and developing it.

We must look to the future by making sure that the industry's morale survives this period of low oil prices and by recognising that the industry is a mature province. Although we still have infrastructure in the original main fields, new technologies can exploit far smaller reserves that were ignored first time round. Those technologies are viable and economic because they can bolt on to the original technology at the heart of the mother fields, but if they go out of production we will lose that essential infrastructure and not achieve further onward developments.

Such developments would be a great benefit because the technology being developed in the North sea is exportable. If we have a good home market and a good home base for the industry, we can build the export industry and confidence in it. This country missed opportunities because it did not develop the export potential of an industry on our own doorstep as much as we might have liked. However, many small innovative contractors have the confidence to export, but they need the security of the home market. That is why anything that the Government can do to avoid disrupting the market and to encourage it is to be welcomed.

When the Government were elected, they did not fully understand the sensitivity of the market and embarked on a clumsy review of oil taxation, which worried people and threatened investment. I hope that the measure is a sign that we can draw a line in the sand on that and that the Government are beginning to learn their lessons and work constructively with the industry. I have welcomed the establishment of the task force. I hope that the measure is a symptom of what can come out of its work—not only bringing the industry and various Departments together to understand how complex and interconnected the industry is, but bringing various sectors of the industry together so that they can co-operate. Taking a constructive approach to the industry will benefit the individual players within it.

We need to drive forward the industry's export potential. In particular, I welcome paragraph 10 of the Treasury briefing on new clause 17, which states:

> "The cost of this measure is therefore expected to be negligible. The loss of tax on gains on oil licence disposals under current legislation is expected to be offset by increases in tax yield resulting from the benefits of more rationalisation of UK oil licence holdings."

That underpins the whole argument that those of us who support a long-term viable future for the industry have been putting to the Government. We want them to say now that they want to make money from the long-term future of the industry and want it to survive. That would send an important signal to people in boardrooms around the country who are deciding where to invest. If the country bought into the idea of achieving long-term returns, the industry may benefit if it also invested to achieve long-term returns.

[Sir Robert Smith]

If we can send out such a signal and build on the optimism, the industry may emerge from the price shock of the past year with more potential than would have been the case if we had not been brought to our senses by it. In particular, it helped to bring the Government round from their initial approach of immediately taking more money out of the industry, which was an easy way for the Treasury to benefit. They are beginning to realise that the Treasury will benefit if the industry survives well into the future.

Every year oil companies hold briefings on the industry's future and every year the graphs look set to dip. Oil is a finite resource, but we have pushed the envelope of that graph well into the future and the industry is viable. People ask me, "What will we do in the north-east when the oil runs out?" We should make sure that we exploit what oil there is and maximise for our community the benefits of having a good industry on our doorstep.

The industry pervades our economy and we should maximise the benefits of that for the United Kingdom and maximise its great export potential. I urge the House to support the measure and send a signal of optimism to those who have to make the vital decision to invest for the long term in an industry that is so important to the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Blizzard: I, too, support new clause 17 and wholeheartedly welcome the restoration of the capital gains tax roll-over relief for the oil and gas industry. I am the chairman of the all-party offshore oil and gas industry group and I represent a constituency that relies heavily on the industry, which is a major source of employment.

The industry has been operating for about 30 years and has achieved huge benefits for this country, such as the sheer scale of its input into our economy. Often, people think only of the 30,000 jobs offshore, but 10 times that number are spread around the country onshore through the 5,000 contractors whose work relates to the industry. Annual investment from the industry accounts for about 16 per cent. of total British industrial investment.

Hon. Members should consider for a moment the sums that I am talking about. Shell, which is based in my constituency, invests about £2.5 billion a year in the North sea operation. We should compare that with the capital investment that is made when a new Japanese electronics company sets up. We rightly get excited about investments of £200 million, £300 million or £400 million, but one oil company is investing annually eight times that sum in the North sea. That is substantial investment.

In my constituency, as in many others, the industry provides the employment that was lost from shipbuilding and fishing. The employment comes not only from large companies such as Shell and large fabricators such as Odebrecht, but from home-grown companies such as KYE and Boston Putford and scores more, some of which are little businesses with fewer than 10 employees. They all form part of the supply chain for the industry.

The industry has also provided a huge source of revenue to the public purse down the years—the debate concerns how that can continue—and relatively clean North sea gas, which has been of great benefit to the environment. When that fuel is used to generate electricity, it produces only half the CO_2 emissions of coal burn. This country is on course to meet the Kyoto targets because of the contribution made by North sea gas.

As other hon. Members have said, the industry has been going through a difficult time, and it is still doing so. The situation was critical when the international oil price fell to $10 a barrel. Although the price has recovered to about $16, the outlook is for a price somewhere between those figures rather than an increase to the bigger prices of the past. To understand what is going on in the North sea, we have to look beyond the oil price, because the industry is not the same as it was 30 or even 15 years ago. In fact, people then thought that the industry would not still be with us today. It is remarkable that it still is, even if field sizes are not the same as years ago.

It would not be economic to exploit today's fields if the industry still operated as it did 20 years ago. The industry has undertaken dramatic cost reduction measures, efficiencies and the development of new technology in a hostile environment, all of which has made the North sea a world leader. It is good for our business that we can export technology and expertise around the world.

The industry has changed, and, in its maturity, it needs a new tax structure, different from those of the past. We want the industry to continue for another 30 years—we need the jobs. We want the exports to continue, and we want continued investment that must be won in a global economy in which oil companies can choose to come here or go elsewhere. We want continued tax revenue from a huge industry. As long as the infrastructure exists in the North sea, it makes environmental sense to extract as much oil and gas as possible rather than leaving it behind.

Capital gains tax roll-over relief will help. It is well targeted and effective, and it will enable assets to be consolidated or traded, ownership to be rationalised and partners to be aligned. It will therefore reduce costs. Various projects and deals that would not otherwise have gone ahead can go ahead because of the change. Existing infrastructure can be used to develop satellite fields, and the relief will encourage investment, extending the life of the industry. It is a win for both the industry and the Treasury. By extending the life of the industry, the Treasury will receive more revenue in the end.

The measure proves that we have a listening Government. The industry has put its case, and the Government have listened. The Government want to work with the industry, and their method of doing so provides a model for such working. The task force has been formed, and the Government have sat down to see what can be done. Rather than having a lot of empty bluster after everything has been sorted out, a task force—into which both the industry and the Government put much time and effort—has brought about results.

The Government have signalled their commitment to the oil and gas industry, and they understand that field size—and not just oil price—is important. The changes are welcome in my constituency and in the scores of others around the country that support the industry. One comes to the House to press many issues and ask many questions. It is good sometimes to see a case on which one has worked coming to fruition.

Mrs. Roche: This has been an interesting debate. I shall deal first with new clauses 15 and 16, which deal with the definition of an asset. The definition—not new, but in existing legislation—is plant and machinery used in the field.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Does that include a floating production platform?

Mrs. Roche: Floating production platforms are unlikely to be affected by new clause 15.

Mr. Davies: That is a very vague response. In what circumstances would a floating production platform be affected, and in what circumstances would it not be affected? It is important to be precise.

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that one must be careful in the language that one uses when dealing with taxation. I have been as precise as I can under the circumstances. Assets affected would include terminals and pipelines. The position regarding floating production platforms would depend on whether they were considered to be a mobile asset, a dedicated mobile asset or a fixed asset. The hon. Gentleman was perfectly right to ask his question. I mean no disrespect to him when I say that it was one of the most coherent parts of his speech.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): The Financial Secretary has read the note handed along the Bench to her, and has indicated that the situation would depend on three different things. However, she did not say in what way it would depend on them.

Mrs. Roche: The right hon. Gentleman will realise that the situation will depend on individual circumstances. A definition of assets is included in the Oil Taxation Act 1983. There are also matters of interpretation, and, as a former Treasury Minister, the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the situation depends on circumstances. I have been as helpful to the House as I can. The position would also depend on what had been agreed at the time—the right hon. Gentleman knows how the Inland Revenue works, and what negotiations take place; he has a good memory, and all that will come flooding back to him.

The principal subject of our debate is capital gains tax roll-over relief. We heard an excellent speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran), who takes a close interest in the industry and who has great expertise. We heard a further excellent speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), who chairs the all-party offshore oil and gas industry group. We have had many interesting discussions on the subject, and I know of his great efforts in this regard. The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith) also holds a position in that group.

It is difficult to know how to characterise the speech made by the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), except to say that I heard every word, even though he delivered it without a foghorn. My hon. Friends and I were accused of machismo and of strutting our stuff, and we shall be pleased to carry on as we are. I should have taken the hon. Gentleman's bluster and protestations more seriously if the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale)—now off to be Parliamentary Private Secretary to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague)—had not congratulated us during the Committee Stage. At no time in Committee did he raise CGT roll-over relief. Even in the all-party group, no Opposition Member has ever raised the matter.

New clause 19 is an Opposition U-turn, reversing the position that they took in 1987. The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford can protest all he likes, but they had all their years in Government to put it right. I shall outline the differences between our new clauses and the Opposition's new clause.

The Opposition want to allow roll-over relief on oil licences, with effect from 6 April 1999. Our new clause extends roll-over relief to oil licences from 1 July 1999, the date on which we tabled the new clause. Our aim is to encourage future transfers of oil licence interests. Applying roll-over relief to transfers that have already taken place would not help to achieve that objective. I see no case for making the new clause retrospective, as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

There are some technical differences between our new clauses. The hon. Gentleman would wish his new clause to be right, but it contains some technical problems. The Opposition want to add a new class of assets for oil licences under section 155 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992. That is an unnecessary complication, and the precise effect of new clause 19 is not clear as it refers to legislation that has already been repealed. The relevant provisions of the Petroleum (Production) Act 1934 were superseded with effect from 15 February 1999 by the Petroleum Act 1998. So the new clause that the hon. Gentleman invites me to prefer to the Government's new clause is defective. It is not precisely clear how the commencement rule would apply, as there is no indication of which acquisitions are to be covered by the clause.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady makes footling points. It makes no difference to the substance whether the provisions come into effect from April or July, and she must know that. There is no reference in our new clause to the 1934 Act, and I do not know where she got that from. Will she address the main point that I raised? Her proposed new clause takes us back to the uncertainties of the pre-1987 regime, whereas our new clause creates an explicit new class of assets which will qualify for CGT roll-over relief. The essential difference between our new clauses is the unambiguity and greater certainty of the one, and the ambiguity and lesser certainty of the other. I hope that the hon. Lady will not run away from this important issue.

Mrs. Roche: I regret that the hon. Gentleman has taken the same approach as he has taken throughout the debate, in contrast with other hon. Members who have contributed to a positive discussion about the state of the industry. I do not regard technical deficiencies in a new clause as a footling matter. I shall deal with his points if he will allow me to proceed.

When drafting our new clause, we carefully considered whether we needed to introduce a new class of assets for United Kingdom oil licences into the list of classes of assets already eligible for roll-over relief. We concluded that a new class of assets was not necessary, and that the only change required to ensure that companies can claim roll-over relief on oil licences was to repeal section 193 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992.

[Mrs. Roche]

Since 1987, the Inland Revenue has accepted—the hon. Gentleman will know this if he has done his homework—that UK oil licences are an interest in land as defined in class 1A of section 155 of the 1992 Act. It has recently obtained advice from its solicitors confirming that. Its acceptance of that point is made clear in its published manual on the corporation tax rules that apply to North sea oil companies. As a result, when section 193 is repealed by new clause 17, the only barrier to oil companies claiming roll-over relief on UK oil licences will be removed. I assure the House that, as UK oil licences are interests in land, new clause 17 will allow companies to claim roll-over relief on the disposal of UK oil licences.

This has been a good debate. I should like to congratulate all hon. Members who took part. I also want to thank my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry, who chairs the task force on this issue, and the industry for all the constructive discussions we have had. I commend the Government's new clauses, and urge the House to reject the Opposition's new clause.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause 16

PETROLEUM REVENUE TAX: INSTALMENTS

'.—(1) In paragraph 3 of Schedule 19 to the Finance Act 1982 (months in which instalments may be withheld)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1), at the beginning there shall be inserted "Subject to sub-paragraph (1A) below," and after "month" there shall be inserted "(the relevant month)"; and

(b) after that sub-paragraph there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraph—

"(1A) Sub-paragraph (1) above does not apply if the relevant month is a month in which any consideration (whether in the nature of income or capital) is received or receivable by the participator in respect of any such matter as is mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of section 6(2) of the Oil Taxation Act 1983 (chargeable tariff receipts)."

(2) Subsection (1) above applies for the purpose of determining whether instalments are payable in respect of chargeable periods ending on or after 31st December 1999.'.—[Mrs. Roche.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 17

BUSINESS ASSETS: ROLL-OVER RELIEF

'.—(1) Section 193 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 (roll-over relief not available for gains on oil licences) shall cease to have effect.

(2) This section has effect in relation to—

(a) a disposal of a licence or an interest in a licence which occurs on or after 1st July 1999;

(b) an acquisition of a licence or an interest in a licence which occurs on or after 1st July 1999.'.—[Mrs. Roche.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 8

LENDING BY REVENUE ACCOUNTS TO NATIONAL LOANS FUND

'.—(1) Where, at the close of business on any day, a sum stands to the credit of—

(a) the General Account of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, or

(b) the General Account of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that sum may be lent to the National Loans Fund on that day.

(2) Subsection (1) above does not apply to any sum to the extent that it is required to be paid, on the day in question, in accordance with section 10 of the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act 1866.

(3) A loan made by virtue of subsection (1) above shall be repaid before the close of business on the day after the loan is made or, where that day is not a business day, before the close of business on the next business day.

(4) Subject to subsection (3) above, a loan made by virtue of subsection (1) above shall be made in such circumstances, and on such terms and conditions, as the Treasury may from time to time direct.

(5) In this section "business day" means any day other than—

(a) a Saturday or Sunday;

(b) Good Friday or Christmas Day;

(c) a day which, in England and Wales, is a bank holiday under the Banking and Financial Dealings Act 1971;

(d) a day specified in an order under section 2(1) of that Act (days on which financial dealings are suspended) and declared by that order to be a non-business day for the purposes of this paragraph; or

(e) a day appointed by Royal proclamation as a public fast or thanksgiving day.'.—[Ms Hewitt.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 8 allows any cash balances held at the close of business in the bank accounts of the two Revenue departments at the Bank of England to be lent overnight to the National Loans Fund, which will repay what it borrows by close of business on the following business day. That will help the Debt Management Office to manage the Government's cash requirements efficiently when it takes on that role. The DMO will be able to rely on these Revenue department balances being available to help to balance the daily cash flows into and out of the National Loans Fund. That will decrease uncertainty for the DMO, and will, most importantly, prevent it from having to pay to raise cash in the market when there is already cash available within Government.

At the same time, the money will still be available during the business day to cover the possibility that tax repayments due exceed tax receipts on that day. The change will benefit Government, but will not have any effect on the Revenue departments' dealings with taxpayers. New clause 8 is a sensible piece of housekeeping by the Government, and I commend it to the House.

8.15 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): This certainly sounds like a sensible piece of corporate management: the corporate treasurer approach making the National Loans Fund the cash flow management vehicle for Government. The rate of interest and terms will be decided as the Treasury sees fit. It would be interesting to know whether the Treasury will see fit to pay market rates or some other specific rate.

It would be valuable to know the balances that go through Customs and Excise during the year, whether its overall budgeting has hitherto taken account of interest earned and whether that level will change.

The new clause implies that the sums may be lent at the volition of the commissioners of Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. Surely the intention is that it will be at the direction of the Treasury, whether the commissioners want it to happen or not.

I ask myself why, at this stage of the Bill, the Government have suddenly had a conversion to corporate efficiency. Why was this measure not introduced long ago? It has been slipped in quietly at the end of the Bill. Surely this is what the Bank of England, as the Government's banker, has done, in that the different organs of Government have had positive and negative balances. The Government own the Bank of England, so why do they need to step back from the Bank and allow the National Loans Fund to manage cash flows? Does it, by any chance, have anything to do with European Union obligations, and the fact that the Government will not be able to borrow from the Bank of England? It would be undesirable for one Government account and the National Loans Fund to be overdrawn at the Bank of England as a result of a temporary cash flow problem. Perhaps the pooling of these cash flows into the National Loans Fund is designed to avoid that.

It is surprising that the Government have slipped this measure in at this stage of the Bill, unless there is some reason beyond virtuous corporate treasurer efficiency, which should not be necessary as the Government own the Bank of England. Perhaps there is some other reason that the Government are not disclosing.

Will the Economic Secretary deal with the specific organisational questions to which I referred earlier, and tell us the reason for using the National Loans Fund as the cash manager, rather than the Bank of England?

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight), I also wonder why this new clause has been introduced on Report. The explanatory note produced by the Treasury says that this is merely a technical provision. Unlike my hon. Friend, who believes that it has been introduced by the treasurers for some Machiavellian reason, I suspect that it was tabled at this late stage of the Bill merely due to incompetence.

What will be the market test for this borrowing from one Government Department to another, or from one series of funds to another, rather than on the open market? The Minister said that it was obviously cheaper to borrow internally. I accept that, but will a nominal interest rate be set? If such a rate is set, who will charge it against whom? Will it be entirely within the Treasury, or will a particular Department benefit from the loan funds overnight?

When the moneys are chargeable, will we see a transfer of funds? And—this may interest the House more—how much does the Paymaster General think will be loaned overnight, as an aggregate sum, over a year? Are we talking about millions, or about billions?

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend's speech, but, apart from the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary, no Government Back Bencher is present to listen to this important debate.

Mr. Fabricant: I find that extraordinary. We may be speaking about billions or, for all I know, trillions of pounds. The Paymaster General gave no indication of the amount that we are discussing. Let us not forget that this is not Government money; it is our money. It is their money—taxpayers' money. We need to know how the taxpayer will be affected. Will he or she benefit from the interest rates that are being set, or will he or she suffer a disadvantage because the money is not sought from outside sources?

It is not good enough to try to slip a measure through late in the evening when Labour Members—all 300-plus of them—are wining and dining in the fleshpots of London. We are talking about taxpayers, money. Thank God we have an Opposition who are at least opposing these proposals.

Ms Hewitt: I rather regret the fact that I do not have the chance to wine and dine, whether in the fleshpots or simply in the Members' canteen.

We engaged in a full and interesting debate on this subject in Committee. Clause 125 completes the separation between monetary policy and cash management—debt management operations—that we undertook when we gave the Bank of England operational independence in regard to monetary policy. The new clause is simply and genuinely a technical consequence of the main provision that we introduced in the Bill. It follows from the assumption of cash management by the Debt Management Office, a Treasury agency that already handles debt management.

As the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) said, at present the Government's daily need for cash to balance the books is met through the Bank of England, and through the ways and means overdraft facility with the Bank's issue department. However, once we start managing the cash separately and allowing the Debt Management Office to manage it on behalf of the Government, it would be inefficient to allow money to sit in separate accounts—those belonging to the Revenue departments—if it could be made available to meet a deficit on the National Loans Fund, when the alternative to using that spare cash would be borrowing by the DMO from the markets.

Let me reassure the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues that this has nothing whatever to do with our possible entry into the single currency in years to come. We have simply completed the separation of monetary policy and debt management operations, in order to avoid any conflict of interests—or perceived conflict of interests—between the two. In particular, as I explained in Committee, the separation will assure the markets that debt management decisions are not influenced by inside information on interest rate decisions.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the Minister answer the specific questions that I asked her? I see that her official has passed her a note, so perhaps she will be able to do so. First, what amounts are we talking about on aggregate—millions, billions, trillions or what? Secondly, if she is in effect market-testing between internal transfers within the Treasury and borrowing on the open market, what interest rates will be set and what criteria will she use to set them?

Ms Hewitt: I was just coming to that. All in good time.

There will be no interest rate charges, because money is simply being lent from one Government account to another. It would be no more appropriate to charge interest on the loans than it would be if I were transferring money from one account to another in my own name. As for the amounts that might be lent, we estimate that the maximum that Customs and Excise might lend would typically be about £700 million. We do not expect to be able to meet the loans from the Inland Revenue to the National Loans Fund, although the new clause gives the power for that to be done.

As I say, this is simply a technical provision that will further improve the Government's housekeeping arrangements and, by reducing any possible need for the DMO to raise money on the open market, will save the taxpayer modest amounts of interest that would otherwise have been paid.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 4

ALLOWABLE LOSSES WHERE BENEFICIARY ABSOLUTELY ENTITLED

'.—(1) For subsection (2) of section 71 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 (allowable losses of trustees treated as transferred to a person becoming absolutely entitled to settled property) there shall be substituted the following subsections—

"(2) Where, in any case in which a person ('the beneficiary') becomes absolutely entitled to any settled property as against the trustee, an allowable loss would (apart from this subsection) have accrued to the trustee on the deemed disposal under subsection (1) above of an asset comprised in that property—

(a) that loss shall be treated, to the extent only that it cannot be deducted from pre-entitlement gains of the trustee, as an allowable loss accruing to the beneficiary (instead of to the trustee); but

(b) any allowable loss treated as accruing to the beneficiary under this subsection shall be deductible under this Act from chargeable gains accruing to the beneficiary to the extent only that it can be deducted from gains accruing to the beneficiary on the disposal by him of—

(i) the asset on the deemed disposal of which the loss accrued; or

(ii) where that asset is an estate, interest or right in or over land, that asset or any asset deriving from that asset.

(2A) In subsection (2) above 'pre-entitlement gain', in relation to an allowable loss accruing to a trustee on the deemed disposal of any asset comprised in any settled property, means [illegible] to that trustee on—

(a) a disposal which, on the occasion on which the beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled as against the trustee to that property, is deemed under subsection (1) above to have taken place; or

(b) any other disposal taking place before that occasion but in the same year of assessment.

(2B) For the purposes of subsection (2)(b)(ii) above an asset ('the relevant asset') derives from another if, in a case where—

(a) assets have merged,

(b) an asset has divided or otherwise changed its nature, or

(c) different rights or interests in or over any asset have been created or extinguished at different times, the value of the relevant asset is wholly or partly derived (through one or more successive events falling within paragraphs (a) to (c) above but not otherwise) from the other asset.

(2C) The rules set out in subsection (2D) below shall apply (notwithstanding any other rules contained in this Act or in section 113(2) of the Finance Act 1995 (order of deduction))—

(a) for determining for the purposes of this section whether an allowable loss accruing to the trustee, or treated as accruing to the beneficiary, can be deducted from particular chargeable gains for any year of assessment; and

(b) for the making of deductions of allowable losses from chargeable gains in cases where it has been determined that such an allowable loss can be deducted from particular chargeable gains.

(2D) Those rules are as follows—

(a) allowable losses accruing to the trustee on a deemed disposal under subsection (1) above shall be deducted before any deduction is made in respect of any other allowable losses accruing to the trustee in that year;

(b) allowable losses treated as accruing to the beneficiary under this section, so far as they cannot be deducted in a year of assessment as mentioned in subsection (2)(b) above, may be carried forward from year to year until they can be so deducted; and

(c) allowable losses treated as accruing to the beneficiary for any year of assessment under this section, and allowable losses carried forward to any year of assessment under paragraph (b) above—

(i) shall be deducted before any deduction is made in respect of any allowable losses accruing to the beneficiary in that year otherwise than by virtue of this section; and

(ii) in the case of losses carried forward to any year, shall be deductible as if they were losses actually accruing in that year."

(2) This section applies in relation to any occasion on or after 16th June 1999 on which a person becomes absolutely entitled to settled property as against the trustee.'.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause is intended to prevent avoidance of capital gains tax through the purchase of losses realised in trusts. We are introducing it now because it is only in the past six weeks or so that the Inland Revenue has gathered evidence of significant exploitation. When we announced the measure on 16 June, our assessment of the potential loss of revenue, if the schemes of which we had evidence were to succeed, was about £500 million. Since then, further schemes have come to light, and the estimate has now risen to £750 million. That is exploitation on a grand scale, and it is entirely unacceptable. We have made it clear that we shall take prompt action to stamp out avoidance of this kind. That is why we are taking action now, and why we shall continue to take such action whenever the need arises.

Capital losses realised by trustees on assets in a trust can normally only be set against capital gains of the trust. The losses cannot be transferred to beneficiaries of the trust, except in one situation: when a beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled to settled property under the terms of the trust—in other words, when the property of the trust becomes the property of the beneficiary. Any capital loss arising on that occasion that cannot be used by the trustees is transferred to the beneficiary.

Those rules, which have applied since 1965, are being exploited in the following way. Trustees of trusts with large losses that cannot be used to offset gains within the trust create an interest in the trust property in favour of a beneficiary. That interest is contingent on a certain event occurring—an event that is almost bound to occur—after a short period.

Steps are then taken for appropriate portions of the interest to be sold to individuals and companies that have gains to shelter. Those individuals and companies become new beneficiaries of the trust. When the appointed day arrives—usually after a very short time—the appropriate amounts of losses pass to them. In such cases, huge losses are available. The Revenue is aware of one scheme where a manufactured loss of £1 billion is involved. The effect is that people with gains can use losses that they have not incurred to eliminate their tax liability. That is wholly contrary to the purpose of the legislation.

8.30 pm

The mischief is not confined to cases where new beneficiaries purchase an interest in the trust. The beneficiaries could be appointed by the trustees, or the interest could be transferred to the ultimate beneficiary via an intermediary. It is because of those difficulties that confining action to the purchase of interests in trusts would not solve the problem.

The Revenue has been aware of the possibility of loss buying in those circumstances for some time, but there has been no evidence of a widespread problem until very recently. However, as I have said, in the past few weeks, evidence has emerged of very large losses being manufactured in trusts purely to take advantage of those rules by profiting from their sale. The scheme takes a number of forms, but all involve the creation of losses within UK trusts, or the use of UK trusts with existing losses, so that the trust loss can be sold to prospective purchasers.

Although the Revenue will challenge the validity of those schemes under existing law, the scale of the problem is so large that we are not prepared to stake the potential loss of so much tax on the possibility of a favourable outcome in the courts. The only sure way to stop the sale of all future trust losses is to attack the source of the problem; I am sure that hon. Members agree.

The new clause provides for losses on trust assets sold by the trustees to be allowed within the trust under the normal rules when a beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled to an asset in the trust and a loss is deemed to accrue on that occasion, and if the trustees cannot offset that loss against gains arising at that time, or earlier in the year, the loss will be transferred to the beneficiary, but the beneficiary can then use that loss only against subsequent gains arising on that asset.

That is how the legislation should work and that is how it will work from now on. The new clause not only stops a serious potential loss of tax, but puts right an anomaly in current legislation, which should have been corrected a long time ago. I commend the new clause.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I have some sympathy for the Paymaster General's approach to the problem. She has set out her thinking clearly, for which we are grateful. However, several points concern me. I shall ask her some questions. I hope that I receive clear and sensible answers, so that we can have a serious dialogue across the Dispatch Box. I hope that she does not follow the example of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who tried to avoid all my questions although, finally, she made the declaration that I wanted all along, so I suppose that we must be grateful to her for that.

Two things concern me most about the new clause. It seems to run counter to, and potentially to damage, two principles that should characterise our tax law, or any rational and fair tax law. I fear that the new clause moves our law on capital gains tax away from those two principles .

The first, which is terribly important, is even-handedness between losses and gains. If trustees can distribute gains and if those gains are subject to tax in the hands of the recipient and beneficiary, it should be axiomatic that trustees can distribute losses and that those losses can be used freely by the beneficiary, to be set against gains for which he or she might otherwise be liable elsewhere on his or her portfolio of investments. We seem to be moving away from that principle of equivalence of treatment between gains and losses.

Secondly, the new clause poses the danger of moving us away from the principle that an individual should be taxed on the basis of his or her income or capital gains to the greatest extent possible, irrespective of whether those assets are held, those incomes or gains derive from a beneficial interest in a trust, or whether they are held directly.

We know very well that, for many years—although it is not always the case—trusts were established deliberately to avoid tax legally. However, the previous Government's reforms, which have been implemented in the past few years, to modernise our tax system have all attempted to remove that anomaly in tax law, and to ensure that people are taxed on their real financial position—on losses or gains for capital gains tax; on income for income tax—regardless of whether income was channelled through, or assets held, in a trust. Now, we are moving away from trying to make such a reform.

There may be very good reasons for establishing a trust, and I do not want anyone to get the impression that Conservative Members are against establishing one. There are extremely respectable—indeed, valuable—reasons for establishing a trust, such as to promote a particular cause or objective, to protect the interests of minors, or to protect family property down the generations by preventing one generation from squandering it all. Those are all sensible and responsible uses of a trust. However, so far as possible—this was the thrust of the previous Conservative Government's reform of trust taxation—trusts should not be established simply to shelter a given income flow or potential capital gains from tax to which

[Mr. Quentin Davies]

New clause 4 moves against the previous Government's reforms, and in the direction of creating a situation in which it is less advantageous to have losses credited to one in a trust, as it would not be possible to offset those losses against gains that might arise elsewhere in one's portfolio. Such an offset should be allowed if gains distributed to the beneficiary are similarly taxable.

Those are my general concerns, and those principles certainly inform the Opposition's thinking and the way in which we consider tax. I should like the hon. Lady to tell us, very frankly and seriously, whether she generally shares our principles in the matter; and, if she does, how she justifies moving the proposals in new clause 4 and, regrettably, taking the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 away from those principles. If she does not share our principles, perhaps she will tell us why she does not.

The hon. Lady justified the Government's proposals entirely on the ground that they would deal with potential tax avoidance, and she gave some alarming figures on that. I am, again, grateful to her for her extremely intelligent and sensible exposition of the Government's thinking on the matter. She explained why the Government feel that there would not be sufficient protection if we legislated that gains could be enjoyed for purposes of setting against losses only when the beneficiary to which the gains were distributed had not purchased his or her interest in the trust—as other mechanisms would be available that could lead to the same abuse that she described. An existing beneficiary could, for example, nominate another beneficiary, or the trustees could nominate another beneficiary.

My initial reaction to those examples is that, presumably, without some financial consideration, no one would nominate someone else to benefit from gains or useful losses that were attributable to him or her. I should think, therefore, that the approach that the hon. Lady rejected might be more promising than, at first sight, she believed they were. I am quite certain that, in practice, any trustee or beneficiary who is giving away his or her rights is receiving some form of compensation. Therefore, if we legislated to ensure that such ultimate beneficiaries could not enjoy the benefits of losses they had thus acquired, we might solve the problem. I hope that she thinks a little further about whether there might be some other way to approach the issue which would not do violence to the key principles that I have just enunciated.

Another approach that is worth exploring and on which I should like a response from the Paymaster General would be to protect those who are beneficiaries by virtue of the original trust deed. They might not be named in the trust deed because they might be a subsequent generation, but they would be of a category provided for in the original trust deed rather than secondary or tertiary beneficiaries who had been nominated or who had purchased their interest in the trust through the avenues that the hon. Lady set out. I make my suggestions in a constructive spirit, because I share the Minister's concern about the potential loss of tax revenue and I am grateful to her for the extent to which she has taken us into her thinking.

I do not doubt the hon. Lady's personal sincerity, but the new clause aroused my suspicions. Eliminating the risk of tax avoidance is not a full and credible explanation of the motives behind the Government's proposals. Only a small part of the new clause—subsection (2)—addresses potential avoidance. Subsection (2D) sets out the rules for the order in which losses can be set against gains for the purposes of determining capital gains tax liability. Subsection (2D)(a) says:

"allowable losses accruing to the trustee on a deemed disposal under subsection (1) above"—

deemed disposal is when an asset is transferred from a trust to the direct ownership of the beneficiary—

"shall be deducted before any deduction is made in respect of any other allowable losses accruing to the trustee in that year".

What the devil does the order in which losses are set off against gains have to do with tax avoidance? If someone set up an artificial scheme to generate losses in a trust to be set against gains from elsewhere to reduce CGT liability, they would not need to be told by legislation that the losses had to be used in that way because they would have gone to the trouble of creating those losses for the purpose of reducing CGT liabilities. That arouses great suspicions, which I hope that the hon. Lady will be able to allay. If she does, we shall support a well considered attempt to attack a genuine source of potential tax avoidance.

by the trustees—

"which, on the occasion on which the beneficiary becomes absolutely entitled as against the trustee to that property, is deemed under subsection (1) above to have taken place; or

Taken together with subsection (2D), which I quoted earlier, the effect will be that trustees who cannot make use of all their losses will not be able to distribute those other than the deemed losses that may have been incurred to the beneficiary, because they will have had to set off against any gains the deemed losses in the first instance. Once those are exhausted, they may find themselves with other additional losses that cannot be transferred to the beneficiary. Trusts will lose the ability to use certain losses.

Is the new clause an attempt to prevent a new source of tax avoidance or is it an attempt to change the existing regime applying to trusts to make it less favourable to honest trusts, which will no longer be able to use the totality of losses that is currently available to be set off against CGT-liable gains? That is what I want to know.

Why are we going in for this complication? Why do we have these rules on the order in which the losses must be applied? Is not it incredible—or non-credible—to suppose that if artificial losses are created, they will not be used immediately to offset gains? Why would people otherwise take the trouble and expense to set up these artificial schemes?

We want to know whether these matters have been thought through. Does this proposal really represent the bare minimum required to address the notional or potential loss? Will the position of entirely innocent trusts—which continue to administer themselves on the same basis and are not the source of any artificial schemes—be made considerably less favourable by what I believe to be a far too bluntly drafted clause?

Dawn Primarolo: As this is the first time that I have addressed the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) from the Dispatch Box since his promotion, may I belatedly congratulate him and welcome him to the Opposition Front Bench?

I will try to deal with the points raised by the hon. Gentleman, which are very important. The Government were faced with a serious situation. The current tax rules in this area are anomalous. Trustees of trusts are taxed as a separate person from the beneficiaries for capital gains purposes, and are chargeable on all gains made on trust property at the special rate.

It is more than a little odd that, in those circumstances, the rules should allow losses on trust property to be passed to beneficiaries to set against gains on property which have not emerged from the trust. Losses realised by the trustees ought to be allowed only against property which is in the trust or which has come out of the trust. That is what the new clause is trying to deal with.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford asked about the purchased interests, and why we have not attacked them. There would be a real difficulty in establishing whether a trust interest had been purchased. Under some arrangements, the trustees and the beneficiaries may be bypassed altogether, with the money—because there is a payment—going directly from the purchaser to the scheme organiser or the loss creator.

It would have been futile to introduce legislation which missed the mark and allowed some schemes to escape and provide opportunities for other schemes to be reworked to get around the rules. The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford asked whether that may still be the case. We have tried to write the rules in the new clause in such a way as to prevent that from happening in what is a complex area.

We have tried to avoid immensely complex legislation, which could deny the transfer of loss to beneficiaries who might be genuinely added at the discretion of the trustees. That would be wrong in principle. The only situation where we consider it justified for losses to continue to be transferred from a trustee to a beneficiary is where the asset on which the loss arises is transferred to the beneficiary.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I am well aware of what the proposals are. I am asking the Paymaster General to think a bit further about a limitation that would exclude beneficiaries who have purchased their interest in the trust. Her original response was that such beneficiaries would not necessarily have had to purchase their interest because they could have been nominated by the trustees or a beneficiary, but it is fundamentally implausible that the trustees or a beneficiary would give away their interest—which must, by definition, have a value if it serves a purpose in a tax avoidance scheme—for no consideration.

Now, the Paymaster General says that the sums concerned might have been transferred from the ultimate beneficiary—the beneficiary of the artificial scheme—to the organisers of the scheme, with the trustees and the beneficiary having no benefit, but it would be a breach of trust law for a trustee simply to give away such an interest. A provision based on someone having directly or indirectly purchased an interest in a trust is a great deal more robust than she originally thought.

Dawn Primarolo: I do not agree. After careful consideration we came to the conclusion that such a provision would be difficult and complex and would not deal with the abuse that is clearly taking place. The Government wanted to get to the root of the abuse without introducing too much complexity in the legislation. The capital gains tax system taxes the gains of trusts separately from those of individuals. The trustees are treated as different persons from the beneficiaries for CGT purposes. The new clause is an anti-avoidance measure. It does not alter the fundamental basis for taxing trusts.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Why, in closing the loophole, are the Government shifting the principle of tax neutrality from the beneficiary to the trust, introducing a much tighter definition that is very unfair to those who were given much fairer treatment under the previous Government's reforms over 18 years?

Dawn Primarolo: To ensure that the abuse is stopped. The potential loss of tax is so great that we had to act. If tax planners introduce such complicated and ingenious ways of getting round the intent of legislation, they must expect the Government to respond.

Mr. Davies rose—

Dawn Primarolo: The complaint of the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford seems to be that the Government have gone too far and that there were other ways of dealing with the matter. I have explained that, despite the fact that we considered some of his suggestions carefully, the only way of guaranteeing that we deal with the root problem is embodied in the new clause, which I commend to the House.

Mr. Davies rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has finished her contribution. She is not giving way.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause 9

EU TRAVEL EXPENSES

'.—(1) In section 200 of the Taxes Act 1988 (expenses of Members of Parliament), in subsection (2), for the words from "the cost of" to "Strasbourg" substitute "EU travel expenses" and after that subsection insert—

"(3) For the purposes of subsection (2) above 'EU travel expenses' are the cost of, and any additional expenses incurred in, travelling between the United Kingdom and—

(a) any European Union institution in Brussels, Luxembourg or Strasbourg, or

(b) the national parliament of another member State.".

(2) This section has effect in relation to sums paid on or after 1st April 1999.'.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 25.

Dawn Primarolo: This clause makes a small but necessary change to the tax rules dealing with the payments that Members of Parliament receive to cover the costs of visiting European Union institutions. In 1991, the House set up a scheme to meet the costs of one visit a year to EU institutions in Brussels, Strasbourg and Luxembourg. To avoid any uncertainty about the tax treatment of payments made under the scheme, the Conservative Government introduced what is now section 200(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 to take them outside the scope of any tax charge.

On 26 May this year, the House passed a resolution extending the range of destinations covered by that scheme. Members can now also get the costs of one visit a year to the national Parliament of another EU member state. We need to carry that through to the tax rules; otherwise, we shall have a tax exemption for some payments authorised by Parliament for hon. Members' EU travel, but not others. The new clause extends section 200(2) to take in the additional destinations now included in the House scheme.

We also need to make a consequential amendment to schedule 5 of the Bill to ensure that the same rules apply to any corresponding payments made to Members of the Scottish Parliament and of the devolved Assemblies, in line with the resolution of the House.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I do not want to tarry long on the new clause, because there are juicier morsels to come. However, I should like to ask the Paymaster General two or three questions.

We recognise that, in principle, the measure flows from a resolution of the House, to which the Minister referred. During the debate on that resolution, my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), who occupies a special position in the House, mentioned that:

"There has been a decline in the reputation of this institution in the past few years" and went on to say:

"It is vital to the authority of this institution that we maintain the public perception of the integrity of Members of Parliament."—[Official Report, 26 May 1998; Vol. 332, c. 416.]

Doubtless, the Paymaster General recalls my right hon. Friend's remarks. In the light of those remarks the House made an amendment—originally tabled by my right hon. Friend, I believe—to the resolution that required Members who took up the option of a trip to Paris, Rome and so on to state in advance the purpose of their visit. That gives rise to my precise questions.

If a visit is for a specific business reason, why would it be taxable? Why is it not analogous to a business visit engaged in by any private sector employee who has correctly stated that the purpose of his visit is a business purpose, which counts as a business expense and is not taxable?

As the Paymaster General reminded the House, under clause 48 of the Bill, Members of the Scottish Parliament and Members of the Welsh Assembly have to be treated in the same way as Members of this Parliament; therefore, they will be subject to the same tax treatment if new clause 9 and amendment No. 25 are accepted. In the light of my previous question, it is material to ask whether that would apply even if the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly had not passed resolutions with an amendment analogous to that which my right hon. Friend tabled in this House. In other words, might not Members of the Scottish Parliament and Members of the Welsh Assembly be exempted from tax simply by virtue of the analogy with membership of this House, even if they do not have to make the declaration on which procedures in this House will now be founded?

If that is the case, is it not an example of the very problem to which devolution generally gives rise? We seek to give the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Parliament certain freedoms of manoeuvre and we forsake the ability to vet whether, in fact, those freedoms of manoeuvre are being used in a way that is responsible from the point of view of taxpayers. Things will have come amiss if it turns out that Members of the Scottish Parliament can do what Members of this House would have been able to do if my right hon. Friend's amendment had not been passed—get both free trip and tax exemption without having to state in advance why they are going on the trip and prove that it is a business affair. If I am mistaken in my assumption, I should be grateful for clarification from the Paymaster General.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): I shall not detain the House for long. The new clause leaves rather a nasty taste in the mouth when one considers all the other new clauses that we are debating this evening which are designed to increase the tax take, and often to take more tax from very vulnerable members of our society. Here we have a group of Members of Parliament, who could hardly be described as vulnerable, seeking to obtain new tax advantages for themselves at the taxpayers' expense.

There is a strong sentiment in many parts of the House that the original resolution was a mistake, and that tax advantages should have been retained entirely to European institutions. That pass has been sold and the privilege has now been extended to other, national Parliaments. I am sceptical about whether people will find sufficient reason to justify the additional trips to national Parliaments. There would be a rough justice in maintaining the present tax concessions rather than handing money back to MPs for these freebies.

I note that the resolution to which the new clause refers enables MPs to be paid twice the corresponding civil service class A standard subsistence rate. The perk seems to be very generous as it is, and it would be perfectly reasonable to tax this extension of it. I do not accept the logic of the Paymaster General's opening remarks.

Mr. Fabricant: The Paymaster General opened the debate by saying that this is a small but necessary amendment, but I am not sure that it is necessary. At the moment, the provisions apply to Brussels, Luxembourg and Strasbourg, and only £44,500 out of a total budget of £250,000 has been spent, so clearly there is not much of a demand for the provision.

I said earlier that I wondered where all the Labour Members were. I notice that there are now two Labour Back Benchers present. I suggested that while we were debating the taxpayers' money, most of them were in the fleshpots of London. What bothers me is that after the new clause has been passed, they will be visiting the fleshpots of Berlin or the beaches just east of Athens, which will now fall under the aegis of the measure.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) said, the economy is contracting and the weakest in society are suffering. It is typical of this Government that the pigs are being lead to the trough at such a time.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that when the original motion came before the House and was fully discussed, only two or three members of the Opposition opposed it in the debate and, more importantly, voted against it when we went into the Lobbies?

Mr. Fabricant: The point is how many Labour Members voted against that motion. Two wrongs do not make a right. If only £44,500 out of a budget of £250,000 has been used, the provision is under-utilised. I put it to the House that these trips are yet more jollies, which seem to have been promoted since the Government came to power.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Paymaster General tell us how much of the budget will be spent under the new provision? What will she do if too many of her colleagues demonstrate a propensity to indulge in this new form of subsidised travel so that the fund is exhausted before the end of the year?

Dawn Primarolo: Opposition Members need to keep this measure in proportion. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) said, when the original motion was discussed the official Opposition did not oppose it. The normal procedure is to make such trips tax-exempt.

The hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who spoke from the Front Bench, asked why we need a specific tax exemption at all. Several provisions in the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 deal specifically with Members of Parliament; they reflect the nature of Members' duties. In most cases, deductions for any payment to meet the cost of Members' visits to European countries would be available under the ordinary schedule E rules, but it would sometimes be difficult to determine whether a visit would meet the qualifying conditions. Section 202 of the ICTA avoids that uncertainty by taking payments to Members of Parliament who have been authorised under the terms of the House scheme out of the scope of any tax charge.

As hon. Gentlemen will know, Members of Parliament will have to apply in advance and give the reasons for and purpose of their visit, and whom they will be meeting, before the travel is agreed by the House. The Fees Office will require information on the visit's purpose, location, duration and the persons or organisations to be met to be sure that the visit is within the resolution of the House.

Mr. Fabricant: I take the hon. Lady's point that Members will have to give an official reason, but what is to stop someone visiting an institution for three days and then spending a further week on the trip at their own expense having had the travel paid for them by the House of Commons—or should I say the taxpayer?

Dawn Primarolo: The rules of the House are laid down and Members are required to comply with them. As the hon. Gentleman well knows—I do not know whether he is advocating an avoidance scheme—that is the correct way in which to behave. I am sure that he behaves in that way. To infer that any other Member would not comply with those requirements is ungenerous of him, to put it mildly.

The hon. Member for West Dorset asked whether legislation was needed to extend the Westminster tax scheme to the devolved Assemblies; the answer is yes. Without the amendment, the Westminster tax rules would not automatically apply to the devolved Assemblies, as should happen.

Mr. Letwin: The question I asked was whether if, for example, the Scottish Parliament did not agree an amendment or pass a resolution that would require Members of that Parliament to make the same declaration in advance, would they nevertheless be tax exempt?

Dawn Primarolo: My understanding is that the rules of the House on the terms under which Members of Parliament can travel, as provided under the resolution of the House, are clear, and that those rules extend, therefore, to Members of the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Parliament.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) felt that the proposal was yet another perk for Members of Parliament. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is important to keep this matter in perspective. In most circumstances, Members are treated for tax in the same way as employees generally. We are dealing with specific provisions to deal with one or two minor areas where the position of Members of Parliament does not fit easily into the general tax framework.

No more money is being made available. The budget of £250,000 for Members' visits to European institutions remains unchanged. The amendments simply bring the resolution of the House into the tax legislation—as was the practice of the previous Government. It is an entirely reasonable thing to do. I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 6

GOODS FOR SALE ON BOARD SHIPS OR AIRCRAFT

'.—(1) For subsection (4) of section 1 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 (goods for sale on board ships or aircraft to be treated as stores) there shall be substituted the following subsections—

"(4) Goods for use in a ship or aircraft as merchandise for sale to persons carried in the ship or aircraft shall be treated for the purposes of the customs and excise Acts as stores if, and only if—

(a) the goods are to be sold by retail either—

(i) in the course of a relevant journey, or

(ii) for consumption on board;

and

(b) the goods are not treated as exported by virtue of regulations under section 12 of the Customs and Excise Duties (General Reliefs) Act 1979 (goods for use in naval ships or establishments).

(4A) For the purposes of subsection (4) above a relevant journey is any journey beginning in the United Kingdom and having an immediate destination outside the member States.

(4B) In relation to goods treated as stores by virtue of subsection (4) above, any reference in the customs and excise Acts to the consumption of stores shall be construed as referring to the sale of the goods as mentioned in paragraph (a) of that subsection."

(2) This section shall be deemed to have come into force on 1st July 1999 but shall not have effect in relation to any shipment of goods before that date.'.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

As hon. Members will know, until last week, passengers on ferries, hovercraft and aircraft travelling within the European Union were able to buy duty-free goods, either on board or at duty-free shops at ports and airports. Within the EU, duty free came to an end on 30 June. All merchandise sold for take away must now be sold duty and tax paid. The new clause makes the necessary changes to the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979, bringing the Act's provisions into line with a decision taken unanimously, in 1991, by the previous Government and all other member states.

Several statutory instruments preceded the new clause to give effect in UK legislation to the abolition of duty free. From 1 July, goods sold to the travelling public for them to take away at the end of journeys within the EU are subject to VAT at the rate applicable in the member state of departure. Excise goods, such as tobacco and alcohol products, are chargeable with duty at the rate of the member state of departure or of the country of destination—depending on where they are sold.

The vast majority of journeys within the EU can benefit from the simplified procedures introduced by the Government, and from the concessions that we managed to extract from the Commission. In the few areas where the simplified arrangements cannot operate, discussions have been held with service providers to ensure the smooth introduction of the successor regime.

The new regime is working smoothly, but the Government will keep the implementation of the scheme under review to ensure that—should further amendment be required—we can assist the trade and the travelling public. That includes the possibility of returning to the Commission to press for any changes that may become necessary.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. Letwin: I have already declared one potential interest in that a pet-food shop might be a client of my bank; I now declare another in case some airline or shipping company is also a client.

We accept that the measure is a corollary of the removal of duty free. In the Standing Committee to which the Paymaster General has already referred, we fully exposed the fact that both the previous Government and the then Opposition were partners in crime in bringing about that sorry state of affairs. Moreover, we have adequately exposed the history of the matter. Notwithstanding the protestations of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), formerly the shadow Economic Secretary, the present Prime Minister came into office, believing, for some reason unknown to man or beast, that he could change something that was locked in unanimous cement—why, I cannot imagine. To his great astonishment, and that of the British public, he found that he could not change it in the least. That, of course, represented a major triumph for the getting to the middle of Europe, sitting at the table and then being eaten thesis—why we have to be at the top table and retain our so-called influence.

Leaving that on one side, the devil is in the detail; that came out in our debates in Standing Committee. The provision makes it clear that the Paymaster General inadvertently misled the Committee in explaining the state of the law. It also demonstrates the depth of the mess. Paragraph (4A) of the new clause is the operative item. It tells us that in order to be "a relevant journey", a journey has to begin in the United Kingdom—that is uncontroversial—and has to have an "immediate destination outside the member States."

You were lucky enough to avoid the Standing Committee where two problems arose, Mr. Deputy Speaker; we christened them the Gibraltar problem and the Basle problem. The Gibraltar problem came to light only after the Paymaster General realised, and correctly and helpfully informed the Committee, that Gibraltar was not actually part of the EU. We had previously thought that it was a Casablanca problem. I had thought that, in order to get duty free, one would have to fly to Casablanca and then on to Gibraltar, because Casablanca is—I quote new clause 6(4A)— outside the EU, but it turned out that actually one only had to fly to Gibraltar. As long as one goes to Spain via Gibraltar, one will be able to collect duty free; if one goes to Spain directly, one will not.

"an immediate destination"

9.15 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) brought out the more vexed issue of the Basle problem. Should Basle airport be privatised, I would recommend that hon. Members consider investing in it early, because Basle has the lucky escape, so to speak, of being in two countries—Switzerland and France—at once, or in neither country at any time. As a result, if one wants to travel inside the EU to France and one happens to be clever enough to do it via Basle, one will also be entitled to duty free, even though one will be walking straight out into France.

Those were just two of the very large run of problems that were brought up, and that illustrated the complicated farce that the present proposals will give rise to. The Paymaster General, in an eloquent series of utterances, told the Committee that it was a puffed-up thing and that no one need worry because "Passengers would have to go to Casablanca, get off the plane, go into the airport and then rejoin the plane before take-off."

Then she said rhetorically to the Committee:

"What am I supposed to do about duty-free goods outside the EU?"—[Official Report, Ninth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 1 July 1999; c. 16.]

Unfortunately, today, the Paymaster General produces new clause 6 and subsection (4A), and we find that the relevant item is the "immediate destination". It turns out that there is no need to get off the plane at all; it is quite sufficient for that place to be the first stop on one's journey. While one is there, or on the way there, the things that one is sold are stores in the technical meaning of the term and therefore may be sold duty free—and hey presto, the mess is not only a mess, but a mess the character of which, it turned out last week, the Paymaster General has not understood.

Undoubtedly, during the coming weeks and months, clever lawyers, clever airlines and so on will illustrate a heap of other such messes. I am sure that the Paymaster General will then return to the House and say that she never meant any of those things and that she really had quite a different clause in mind. It is just a pity that she has not brought that before the House today.

Mr. Edward Davey: Does the hon. Gentleman think that people travel for duty free or to get from A to B?

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman, unlike many of us in the House, is obviously not a skier. I have to tell him that there are lots of ways to get to Switzerland and lots of ways to get to France, and quite a lot of them end up by getting from A to B; it is just that one can choose to go via C, D or E. He would be very well advised to think of going via Basle in future.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have little doubt that you would rule a general debate about duty free out of order, so I shall confine myself to some specific matters that are raised by new clause 6, which are relevant to duty free in general but more specifically to the financial arrangements.

I am worried about this issue because my constituency is hard up against the boundary fence of Heathrow, which means that either many hundreds, or a 1,000 or so, constituents of mine depend on the duty free trade for their jobs. It also means that a significant number of customs officers who work at Heathrow are my constituents. Perhaps more important still, almost all my constituents—whether they travel for duty free or for other reasons—enjoy duty free, so I am very much involved in the entirety of this debate.

I am worried about new clause 6 because it gives effect to changes that will lead to redundancies in my constituency, and that will put pressure on the decreasing number of customs officers—decreasing because the present Government see fit to reduce the number of customs officers at Heathrow fairly regularly. In case the Paymaster General is tempted to say that new clause 6 will reduce the work load of customs officers, I would respectfully suggest that it will actually increase it because, previously, anyone passing through terminals 1, 2, 3 and 4 bought duty free and away they went, and the Customs and Excise people knew the score. Now, it will be necessary to decide, when a person leaves, for example, from terminal 1, where the heck they are going, or if they are arriving at terminal 1, where they have come from. As a result we shall need more, not fewer, customs officers—or very clear assurances from the Paymaster General that the existing customs officers will not be put upon unreasonably.

The new clause also confirms the Government's failure to prevent something happening that they trumpeted that they would prevent. It is a failure by the Government from which they cannot hide on this occasion. When the Paymaster General replies, it will not be good enough for her to say, "We have obtained some wonderful concessions." I heard her try that trick last week.

I have had a good, long and hard look at the so-called wonderful concessions, and one of them bears mentioning. We were told that, if a ferry is coming across the English channel and someone happens to get himself into the shop before the vessel enters territorial waters, there is a concession that enables the individual to continue shopping. However, the small print states that, after three months the concession will disappear. So much for the Government's marvellous negotiating skills when they go to Brussels.

There are a number of matters concerning the new clause on which I seek clarification. I begin with the concept that it is founded upon the treating of goods in ships and aircraft as stores. Are we absolutely clear what we mean? The clause states that it is necessary to refer to section 1(4) of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. That is where we must turn to find our definitions, and I did that this afternoon.

Section 1 of the 1979 Act amounts to four and a half pages of various definitions. The section goes so far as to draw a distinction between a ship, which is defined, and a British ship, which is also defined. Search as I might, I could find no definition of an aircraft. If we are to be told in the new clause that we must refer to the 1979 Act for a starting point, where is the definition of "aircraft" from which we must work?

The Paymaster General may shake her head and think that I am being pedantic. However, she tells us that we must refer to the 1979 Act for a definition of "ship". I ask her to provide us with one for "aircraft".

Another feature that bothers me about the concept of treating goods as stores is that the new clause refers to "Goods . . . carried." It does not refer to goods loaded. Here, there is a problem. As it is made clear in the definition that we are talking about ships and not British ships, we are talking about any ship that comes into a United Kingdom port carrying goods.

Let us suppose that a Norwegian ship leaves Bergen and calls in at Newcastle. There is no problem because it has come from somewhere outside the European Union. However, it is carrying duty-free stores from Bergen which it will take back to Bergen. If I understand the clause correctly, if that ship returns directly to Bergen, there is no problem. It will not have landed anything but it will have duty-free goods on board. However, if that ship, having sailed from Bergen to Newcastle, calls in at Rotterdam before returning to Bergen, Customs and Excise will have to board it and make a list of every last thing on it and make those concerned pay duty, which they may or may not have paid back when they leave Rotterdam to go to Bergen. That is the nonsensical feature of referring to "Goods . . . carried" and not goods loaded. I shall be most grateful if the Paymaster General will tell us why the particular wording has been used.

I am also concerned about "relevant journey" as a definition. We are told that it equals

"an immediate destination outside the member States."

This afternoon, the Paymaster General helpfully gave me a list of those parts of the European Union that are outside the customs union. One of them was Andorra.

[Mr. David Wilshire]

Another that has been mentioned is Gibraltar. However, we are told that a relevant journey must take one outside a member state. Gibraltar is not outside a member state. It is part of the European Union, but it is outside the customs union.

The Andorran situation bears closer scrutiny. Last time I was there, huge numbers of French matrons driving Renaults and Citroens were bombing up and down the mountain, going up empty and coming down full, and seemed to be making numerous journeys every day. If they can go on doing that, why cannot we, when we go across the channel?

I am worried about whether the definition of "relevant journey" is accurate. My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) referred to the Basle-Mulhouse problem. I shall not detain the House by rehearsing the stupidity of it, but when I was given a list of parts of the EU that are outside the customs union, I got wonderful places in the Caribbean and other bits of France all over the place, but no mention of that lovely little part of France that is occupied by Basle airport.

As the Paymaster General told us in Committee last week, if we travel into Basle airport from Heathrow, we can have all the duty free to which the allowances entitle us, but it is in France, so the information that we were given this afternoon was, I suggest, duff information. It did not include all those parts of the EU that are outside the customs union.

Will the Paymaster General therefore revisit the answer that she gave me and try again? Will she also tell me whether the definition of "relevant journey" as an immediate destination outside the member states is sufficient, given that she admitted that travelling to a part of France can be construed as a relevant journey? There seems to be some trouble with the drafting.

There is a further problem with the definition of "relevant journey". If we leave Tilbury and head for Tangier, that is a relevant journey. If, however, we have engine trouble on the way and put in in Vigo in northern Spain, do Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have to fly out to Vigo to say, "Oops, sorry, this is not a relevant journey any more, so we want to make sure that you give us all the excise duty and VAT."? If not, where is the qualification in the legislation that states that an unexpected diversion into an EU state does not trigger the problem that I am highlighting?

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend contrasts the difference in travelling from one part of the EU to another, not involving the UK. He asked whether there had been a mistake in the drafting. Does he think that we have over-egged the European Union directive and made it a tougher regime than it need otherwise be?

Mr. Wilshire: I am certain that we shall behave as we usually do in the United Kingdom, and rigorously enforce measures while others shrug their shoulders and may or may not bother to enforce them. That is one of the reasons why we suffer time and again at the hands of Brussels bureaucrats, when others get away with ignoring them. Again, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I went down that track for much longer, you would rightly call me to order.

Another phrase that concerns me in the wording of the new clause is "for consumption on board". We have not had an explanation why the Government suggest that. I am all in favour of as many concessions as we can get, but this seems illogical. The reason why our harmless bit of fun has been taken away, as I understand it, is that the Brussels bureaucrats decided that it was against the interests of the single market for us to be allowed to buy duty free as we travel round the EU.

If we travel from Paris to London, we are travelling within the EU, but the Brussels bureaucrats say that it is perfectly all right for us to have duty free, provided that we consume it. That is daft. If we can get a concession for consumption, why not other concessions?

The exception is incredibly difficult to enforce. Someone travelling on a ferry may be thirsty and buy lots of drinks, only to be taken ill because the sea is rough. What will he do? He has bought drinks to consume, but has not consumed them. Will customs officers tear around the ship checking what people have eaten, drunk and smoked as they make their journey and demand duty if they have not finished a bottle? We need an explanation.

9.30 pm

Another thing bothers me about the words "for consumption on board". We now know that duty-free prices at places such as Heathrow were seriously inflated—we are talking about £5 on an £8 bottle of spirits. We are granting an exception so that ferry companies and aircraft operators can sell duty-free drinks to passengers. Do the Government plan to make it compulsory for bar price lists and menus to make it clear that the person serving drinks is taking advantage of a duty-free perk? If they do so, there would be a warning of some sort and, when people paid, they would not make the mistake of comparing bar and menu prices with those in what was the duty-free shop and is now the duty-paid shop to judge whether they were being ripped off.

What do the Government have in store for Eurostar in respect of the words "for consumption on board"? When people catch a ferry from Dover to Calais or fly from Heathrow to Charles de Gaulle what they eat, drink and smoke on the ship or the aircraft is duty free—that is the concession—but it is not if they catch a train. That also is illogical. Perhaps the Paymaster General can tell the House why Eurostar and Le Shuttle have been singled out for such particularly nasty treatment.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Has my hon. Friend noticed the astonishing urgency with which the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary is dashing up and down to pick up bits of briefing? He is obviously hitting a few bull's eyes.

Mr. Wilshire: I am fully expecting detailed answers to all my questions. Although some Labour Members may think that I am being a bit of a nuisance, Mr. Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.] I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.] I apologise, Madam Speaker; you can tell that I have been carried away by my enthusiasm.

The new clause raises two other issues—the safety of aircraft and environmental damage. Profit margins are being cut and the holding down of prices in what were duty-free shops will work only if sales increase. There is now no limit on what people can buy duty paid at Heathrow airport or wherever and it therefore follows that it is perfectly possible to buy a large number of bottles of spirits.

When I raised that issue with the Paymaster General in Committee last week, I received the answer that airlines would not allow vast numbers of bottles to brought on board. However, the number does not have to be vast. Someone with no hand luggage could easily bring four or five bottles on board instead of one. That would be within most airlines' limit. Alternatively—this has already happened—someone could buy a large number of bottles and arrange for the aircraft operator to carry them in the hold.

I represent part of Heathrow, and I am worried by the thought of large quantities of inflammable liquid in glass bottles hurtling about the skies. I believe that we have opened up a safety problem and I should be grateful if the Paymaster General would address it. I am also concerned about the extra weight that will be carried by aircraft. It would be easy to say that I am making another pedantic point, but if the weight carried by an aircraft increases the burn of aviation fuel increases and further damage is done to the atmosphere and the ozone layer.

There is a simple solution to the problem that the new clause causes: the Government should allow the sale of duty-paid products at lower foreign prices to arriving passengers at British airports. They would not then need to go to Charles de Gaulle airport in Paris to stock up with huge numbers of cheaper bottles. They could fly with less luggage, the aircraft would be safer and there would be less chance of environmental damage. I commend that approach to the Minister.

So many messages have been passed to the Paymaster General that I have probably asked enough questions of her. I see that another answer is on its way to her as I speak. I hope that she will not fall into the trap of saying simply that I am being difficult, or trying to wile away a few minutes. All my questions are serious. They raise difficulties about the wording of the clause and the workability of a forthcoming Act of Parliament. All of them need clear answers, although some were technical and, if the answers being passed to the hon. Lady do not answer them in detail, I should be grateful to receive a written reply, copied to the Library.

I deplore what has happened. It has spoiled the fun of many. It causes redundancies in my constituency, and it is yet another reason why the EU's powers need to be taken away. But I am a realist. What has happened has happened, and we must get the Bill right. Will the Minister repeat the undertaking that she gave in Committee to introduce the changes with the lightest possible touch from Customs and Excise in the early stages, when problems will arise? Will she repeat her undertaking to review absolutely everything over the next three to four months—not just what suits her—to see whether we can learn from the mistakes that the Government have undoubtedly made?

Dawn Primarolo: I will not say that the hon. Gentleman was wasting time, and he was wrong to suggest that I should. I think that he is misguided, and that he has not paid attention to the fact that the successor regime operates already. He obviously has not read the newspapers or the undertakings given by suppliers about the possibility of job losses, but I understand entirely why he, like any good constituency Member, is particularly concerned about the future employment of his constituents.

The hon. Gentleman was present when I made it clear that preparations for the abolition of duty free and arrangements for the successor regime were working smoothly for traders and travellers. I am happy to repeat that Customs and Excise will work closely with the trade and will apply the light touch for which he asked. We shall review the work of the successor regime in the light of experience. The hon. Gentleman will have seen that many of the disasters that he predicted, and which he continues to forecast, have not happened.

The hon. Gentleman asked why on-board consumption was VAT free. The Commission announced on 2 October 1998 that member states could continue to allow goods consumed on board to be relieved of VAT. I explained in Committee that the Government would allow that to happen.

Mr. Wilshire: The Minister may recall that I asked whether consumption was exempt of tax alone or of tax and duty. She may have made a slip of the tongue, but I understood her to say that goods would be free of VAT. Will they be free of VAT alone, or duty too?

Dawn Primarolo: I am sorry; I misheard the hon. Gentleman. I thought that he was asking about VAT only. The position that I set out earlier on excise duty and VAT is correct.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the immediate destination provision. As I said in Committee, if a flight involves a stop-over outside the European Union, travellers have a limited entitlement to duty-free goods. As he well knows, it is a very limited entitlement and may not be the bargain that they thought they would get.

Over the next few months, the staff of Customs and Excise will concentrate on helping the industry to adjust to the new regime. In the long term, Customs and Excise does not expect the duty-paid regime to be any more demanding of its resources than the former duty-free regime.

The hon. Gentleman may have seen the report in The Sunday Telegraph on the decision of British Airways not to sell alcohol and tobacco on flights, but to continue to offer other goods under the EU restrictions.

As I said to the hon. Gentleman in Committee, safety is a matter for the airline companies, which are perfectly capable of enforcing a reasonable attitude towards the carrying of duty-paid goods, and are doing so.

The hon. Gentleman's final point was on triangular routes. A ferry may move through several duty regimes. As I said in Committee and in my opening remarks, the simplified arrangements apply to the majority of journeys. However, in the exceptional case of triangular routes, fuller accounting procedures are required. Those operators are already used to dealing with more complex accounting of their stores and sales under the old regime. The problem that the hon. Gentleman forecasts is not manifesting itself in the spectacular way that he continues to suggest.

The Government would have preferred more time to work on a successor regime, but it was not available to us. We would have preferred it if the previous Government had made some preparation for the abolition of duty free, for which they voted, but they did not. In the circumstances, we have a regime that has been welcomed by the trade, that is working well for the travellers, and that is ensuring that the transition from duty free to the new regime is as smooth as it could possibly be. I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 14

WORKS OF ART, ANTIQUES, ETC.

'.—(1) In subsection (4) of section 21 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 (which treats as reduced for VAT purposes the value of goods falling within subsection (5) of that section and imported from outside the EC)—

(a) at the beginning there shall be inserted "Subject to subsection (6D) below,";

(b) for "14.29 per cent." there shall be substituted "28.58 per cent."

(2) For subsections (5) and (6) of that section there shall be substituted the following subsections—

"(5) The goods that fall within this subsection are—

(a) any work of art;

(b) any antique, not falling within paragraph (a) above or (c) below, that is more than one hundred years old;

(c) any collection or collector's piece that is of zoological, botanical, mineralogical, anatomical, historical, archaeological, palaeontological, ethnographic, numismatic or philatelic interest.

(6) In this section 'work of art' means, subject to subsections (6A) and (6B) below—

(a) any mounted or unmounted painting, drawing, collage, decorative plaque or similar picture that was executed by hand;

(b) any original engraving, lithograph or other print which—

(i) was produced from one or more plates executed by hand by an individual who executed them without using any mechanical or photomechanical process; and

(ii) either is the only one produced from the plate or plates or is comprised in a limited edition;

(c) any original sculpture or statuary, in any material;

(d) any sculpture cast which—

(i) was produced by or under the supervision of the individual who made the mould or became entitled to it by succession on the death of that individual; and

(ii) either is the only cast produced from the mould or is comprised in a limited edition;

(e) any tapestry or other hanging which—

(i) was made by hand from an original design; and

(ii) either is the only one made from the design or is comprised in a limited edition;

(f) any ceramic executed by an individual and signed by him;

(g) any enamel on copper which—

(i) was executed by hand;

(ii) is signed either by the person who executed it or by someone on behalf of the studio where it was executed;

(iii) either is the only one made from the design in question or is comprised in a limited edition; and

(iv) is not comprised in an article of jewellery or an article of a kind produced by goldsmiths or silversmiths;

(h) any mounted or unmounted photograph which—

(i) was printed by or under the supervision of the photographer;

(ii) is signed by him; and

(iii) either is the only print made from the exposure in question or is comprised in a limited edition;

(6A) The following do not fall within subsection (5) above by virtue of subsection (6)(a) above, that is to say—

(a) any technical drawing, map or plan;

(b) any picture comprised in a manufactured article that has been hand-decorated; or

(c) anything in the nature of scenery, including a backcloth.

(6B) An item comprised in a limited edition shall be taken to be so comprised for the purposes of subsection (6)(d) to (h) above only if—

(a) in the case of sculpture casts—

(i) the edition is limited so that the number produced from the same mould does not exceed eight; or

(ii) the edition comprises a limited edition of nine or more casts made before 1st January 1989 which the Commissioners have directed should be treated, in the exceptional circumstances of the case, as a limited edition for the purposes of subsection (6)(d) above;

(b) in the case of tapestries and hangings, the edition is limited so that the number produced from the same design does not exceed eight;

(c) in the case of enamels on copper—

(i) the edition is limited so that the number produced from the same design does not exceed eight; and

(ii) each of the enamels in the edition is numbered and is signed as mentioned in subsection (6)(g)(ii) above;

(d) in the case of photographs—

(i) the edition is limited so that the number produced from the same exposure does not exceed thirty; and

(ii) each of the prints in the edition is numbered and is signed as mentioned in subsection (6)(h)(ii) above.

(6C) For the purposes of this section a collector's piece is of philatelic interest if—

(a) it is a postage or revenue stamp, a postmark, a first-day cover or an item of pre-stamped stationery; and

(b) it is franked or (if unfranked) it is not legal tender and is not intended for use as such.

(6D) Subsection (4) above does not apply in the case of any goods imported from outside the member States if—

(a) the whole of the VAT chargeable on their importation falls to be relieved by virtue of an order under section 37(1); or

(b) they were exported from the United Kingdom during the period of twelve months ending with the date of their importation."

(3) This section has effect in relation to goods imported at any time on or after the day on which this Act is passed.'.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause enables the United Kingdom to fulfil its legal obligations under the seventh VAT directive, as incorporated in the EC sixth VAT directive. That directive requires member states to apply a minimum rate of VAT of at least 5 per cent. to a wide range of imported works of art, antiques and collectors' pieces. The new clause implements the undertaking given by the previous Government to increase our rate to the minimum level.

Since 1995, the United Kingdom has applied a rate of 2½ per cent. to a limited range of works of art, antiques and collectors' items. Until the UK implemented the seventh directive, those products had been relieved from import VAT. That rate of 2½ per cent. has been available to the UK only under a transitional derogation, which was time-limited to 30 June 1999.

9.45 pm

Despite our inheritance from the previous Government, this Government have decided that, on balance, it would be better all round for our 2½ per cent. rate to be more widely available in the Community. We have fought that case long and hard in Europe, arguing that the interests of both the United Kingdom and the Community generally would be best served by 2½ per cent. being made the minimum rate available to all member states. However, we have also pressed the case for the UK to retain its special rate for a further period in the event of our failing to reach agreement with our European partners.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: May I finish what I am saying? After that, I shall be happy to respond to any points that the hon. Gentleman wishes to make.

Either of those proposals would have required both the support of the European Commission and the unanimous agreement of all other member states. Despite our efforts, it became clear that there would be little support for the UK position, and it has therefore not been possible to secure the unanimous agreement that was necessary to bring about the change.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I want to finish what I am saying. I shall then be happy to respond to any points that hon. Members make in the debate.

We have throughout worked closely with the art trade. We fully realise the importance of the British art market and its worldwide standing. For those reasons, we propose to ease the effects of the increase in the rate of import VAT by widening the scope of the new 5 per cent. rate to a broader range of art works. That rate will apply to the full range of items that may be entitled to a reduced rate of import VAT under the sixth directive.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would let me put the case. I shall, of course, respond to the points that hon. Members make in the debate. We engaged in some discussion about the matter at the outset, and I know that the hon. Gentleman is keen to take part.

Even with the increase, there is still no lower rate of import VAT in Europe on works of art. It is the minimum that the Government need to do to comply with the absolute legal obligation that we inherited from the last Administration. The package offers a much wider coverage of the reduced rate for art imports and should ensure that the UK remains an attractive place for the art trade.

Our proposals have been welcomed by the British art market, which has acknowledged the length to which the Government went to try to undo the damage done by their predecessor. I commend the new clause.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) for drawing attention to the last Government's difficulties. Their decision to accept the halfway house that has persisted until now was a compromise that was, in effect, forced upon them. It was always envisaged that the economic impact of a 2.5 per cent. VAT rate would be properly assessed by the European Union, and it was reasonable to suppose four years ago that, when the matter came up for review this year, our partners would understand the effect that the rate has had on the London art market in particular.

The Paymaster General asked us to applaud her efforts. The fact is that the widening of the 5 per cent. band will not affect the major issue, which is where international art sales take place. It is in the sales of Impressionist paintings and old masters that the really attractive big money is being spent. Those are exactly the sort of sales which, in the future, will take place almost exclusively in Geneva, New York and other places outside the European Union. It is the lucrative end of the market that London will lose, and the consequences for London will be severe.

The Paymaster General has failed to tell us in this debate or the previous one how many jobs she expects the market to lose as a result of the measure. There can be no doubt that jobs will be lost. It may not be as many as the 5,000 predicted earlier—let us hope that that is the case—but there will be job losses.

The Paymaster General's comment that the new measure is tax neutral beggars belief. The only sense in which it is tax neutral is that the amount of tax that is raised may be no more than the amount that was raised under the previous system. Any situation in which the tax rate doubles but the amount of tax collected remains the same is, by implication, one in which the volume of transactions has, in effect, halved. Will she confirm—I hope she is listening—that in the key areas, including the old masters, the Impressionists and other parts of the value end of the art market, the implication of her prediction on revenue is that the value of sales in the United Kingdom will halve as a result of the increase in tax?

In Committee, I suggested to the Paymaster General and her advisers that they should look at the exemption for culture under the sixth VAT directive. There is a clear exemption for cultural activity in the European Union—VAT should not apply to cultural activities where those are not to the disadvantage of other member states.

It is widely agreed that, in the case of the art market, any low rate in the UK is not to the disadvantage of other member states because we are in competition not with them, but with Geneva, New York and other centres where there is no tax to pay. Why is it that before we did not impose tax on art sales in this country? It is because, fundamentally, it is not a financial transaction but a cultural exchange. Therefore, under the VAT directive, there is a specific exemption, which could be explored with our other partners. On that basis, a wide exemption could be granted to the market in this country.

Four years ago, we chose not to go down the contentious legal route to protect our art market. We chose to enter a compromise deal—

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I will finish in a moment; I shall let the hon. Gentleman in in a moment.

We chose to enter a compromise deal on the basis that, within four years, the evidence would be clear that the rate was damaging our market and not helping anyone else's. We assumed that our partners in Europe would accede to our request at the end of the period to cut the rate again. Having failed to do so, we should be going down the legalistic route. We should be trying to protect a valuable business in this country. It is the Government's failure to do so, despite their promises in recent months, that is the real disappointment. That is why our questions deserve a proper answer from the Paymaster General.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): I do not know whether I heard the Paymaster General correctly, but I got the impression that she said that the 5 per cent. rate was not continuous but for a limited period. If that is so, will she tell us how long that period is and what the rate is likely to increase to?

The Paymaster General surprisingly said that the decision to double the VAT rate was welcomed by the art trade in this country. I find that incomprehensible because the only people who will welcome the VAT increase in London are art dealers in New York and Switzerland.

The terrible situation has shown us one thing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) said, naturally, we expected from an equitable point of view that our European colleagues, having looked at the effect of the 2.5 per cent. rate, would see reason and allow us to continue at that rate. As has been said many times, it is not a question of harmonisation to remove unfair competition with other countries in Europe. There are only three international markets in the world: London, Geneva and New York. Once the change is made, all that will happen is that the European Union as a whole will lose out in the international art market to America and to Switzerland. Does not that fact demonstrate—to the House and to the British people—that, when our vital national interests are at stake, we cannot depend on Europe?

It does not matter whether the previous Government made a great mistake in agreeing the change or the current Government are making a mistake now. The current Government said, "Things will be different: we are at the heart of Europe. We shall persuade our European partners to see reason." In this case, we have reason on our side, but the Government have failed completely.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Today, we have heard much froth and rubbish from Opposition Members on the issue to which there are two aspects: first, VAT on certain items will be increased from 2.5 to 5 per cent.; secondly, there will be a VAT reduction on other works of art. However, we have not heard much from Opposition Members about the VAT reduction.

Let us get our facts right. Earlier, my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) asked the shadow Paymaster General, the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), whether he was Paymaster General in 1994, when the previous, Conservative Government agreed the VAT increase from 2.5 to 5 per cent.—about which Conservative Members have been whingeing today, but which they agreed—but he said that he was not Paymaster General at that time. [Interruption.] However, all the records—such as old lists of ministerial responsibilities—seem to say that, in September 1994, David Heathcoat-Amory Esq. was the Paymaster General.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory rose—

Mr. Davies: Obviously the right hon. Gentleman has some sort of memory problem. Perhaps that is why he has a majority of only 528. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I shall certainly give way, if the right hon. Gentleman would like to correct the record.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for graciously giving way, as he mentioned me. I should like to make it absolutely clear, and beyond doubt, that I had nothing to do with the negotiation of those matters or the decision, all of which were dealt with by my noble Friend Lord Cope. Will the hon. Gentleman accept that assurance?

Mr. Davies: Does that mean that the right hon. Gentleman knew nothing about it, and had no responsibility for it whatsoever? In answer to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley, the right hon. Gentleman said that, in 1994, he was not Paymaster General—but he was. Could we get that matter clear, for the record? What sort of Cabinet was involved in the decision? Regardless of whether the decision was taken by him, one of his colleagues or someone who has subsequently slipped off the electoral terrain—as I said, the right hon. Gentleman has a majority of only 528—with such talk about positions previously held, one wonders whether he will be in the House for very much longer. The simple fact is that British art will be successful for much longer than he will be.

There will be a marginal tax increase. Although no one welcomes the increase—which was introduced by Conservative Members—to counteract it, the Government are introducing all types of concessions. There will be a massive reduction in the marginal rate of VAT, from 17.5 to 5 per cent., on tapestries, ceramics, enamels and photographs.

More widely, there is a new generation in a thriving antiques industry, which will generate many new jobs. However, all we hear from whingeing Opposition Members—crying crocodile tears, moaning and rolling around on the Opposition Benches—is, "What about the job cuts?" The Government are reviving the industry, while dealing with the legacy of tax constraints that we inherited from the previous Government.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: Perhaps we can now move on. I would have taken the hon. Gentleman's intervention, but he refused—from absolute embarrassment—to take mine.

Mr. Tyrie: I simply want to ask the Paymaster General a few questions that I was unable to put in an intervention.

First, will the Paymaster General clarify the assumptions behind her forecast of a £10 million revenue increase from the VAT increase from 2.5 to 5 per cent? Will she state categorically whether those assumptions include the sharp fall in business that is likely to occur because of the VAT increase?

Secondly, will the hon. Lady commit herself to the review that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat–Amory) asked for? Will the Government go to Brussels and press for another report after a couple of years, which will show the damaging effect that the increase in VAT will have in Britain and across the European market? The market will move out of Europe to New York and Tokyo. Will she commit herself to pushing for a review of this absurd policy after a couple of years?

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): My hon. Friends the Members for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) and for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) have made a good case on behalf of the London art market and shown how the tax will adversely affect it. I have every sympathy with their point of view and the strength of their argument.

The Government are fully signed up to the European Union. Instead of looking at the issue in the narrow confines of the British interest, why has it not been possible for the British Government to persuade the European Union that not increasing the tax is in the interests of the European Union as a whole, not just the London art market? London is part of the broader picture. Why has it not been possible to persuade the powers that be that the change would damage the European Union? The argument should be advanced on a broader plain. We need to explain to our European partners that the opposition is in New York and Geneva. By damaging the London market, all that we are doing is damaging Europe.

Mr. Fabricant: I endeavoured to intervene on the Minister earlier, but she was determined not to let anyone in. When we debated the subject on the earlier narrow Ways and Means motion, she said that we would be quite competitive at 5 per cent., because, apart from Denmark, other countries had a higher rate. The problem is that those countries are not the competitors. The competitors are Basel, Geneva and New York. What is the general sales tax for art works in New York state or Geneva?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We debated the issue earlier today, but there are some questions outstanding, to which my hon. Friends have referred. I have two questions.

It is regrettable that VAT on imports is to be doubled. That will be a heavy and savage blow to the British art market. No one has made a secret of the fact that we are dealing with a pre-existing directive. I am happy to reassure the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) again that it had nothing to do with me. The negotiations took place while my predecessor was Paymaster General, but I do not dissociate myself from my noble Friend Lord Cope, who secured an undertaking that the Commission would conduct a study before the derogation ran out. That study was forthcoming and showed that damage had been caused even at the existing levels of VAT on art imports.

The study also mentions that in the 1950s Paris was the biggest art market not just in Europe, but in the world. It has been damaged by a combination of the droit de suite—a levy on the resale of works of art—and the imposition of VAT on art imported into France. That is a matter for the French Government, but the same levels of VAT are to be imposed on the UK market despite the damage that has been shown in the study by the consultants. That conflicts with article 2 of the treaty of Rome, as amended, which says that the European Union should have a number of objectives, the first of which is to promote economic and social progress and a high level of employment. It has been shown by the study that the proposal will cost jobs in the EU, and will undoubtedly do further economic damage. It is my contention that the European Commission is breaking the treaty in persisting with its intention to bring the minimum level of VAT on art imports up to 5 per cent.

My first request, which has been echoed by my hon. Friends, is that the Commission should be asked to conduct a further study after the VAT directive is enacted to ensure that no further damage is done and, if damage is inflicted, that action will be taken. That is a modest request to make of the Government.

My second request concerns the linked matter of droit de suite. Happily, that separate threat has been deferred. However, it has only been postponed, and I would like to know on what terms it has been deferred, whether it will come back, whether further technical work will be undertaken and whether further political consultations are taking place.

The art market needs to know the answers to those questions tonight. I asked them earlier today without success. Perhaps the Minister will take this opportunity to answer those two specific questions.

Dawn Primarolo: We can sum up the approach of the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) as, "It is nothing to do with me. I was just a member of the Government of the time—or, at least, I was voting for them."

The previous Government committed the United Kingdom to an absolute legal obligation to increase VAT on works of art from 2.5 per cent. to 5 per cent. It is true that the previous Government asked the Commission to undertake an independent study of the impact of the imposition of 2.5 per cent. VAT on the art market. However, the study was not made conditional on anything. It was not put in the directive, nor was it said that the derogation should not expire until the study was completed.

The study was completed independently, and arrived late. It showed that there were grounds for continuing to argue the case that the increase from 2.5 per cent. to 5 per cent. should not take place. The Commission ignored that, and made its own recommendations. The Government were faced with an absolute legal obligation to increase the VAT to 5 per cent, which could not be resisted. There was simply no practical choice but to implement the increase. We were faced with the legal obligations signed up to by the previous Government.

Earlier, I referred to the cost to the British art market, how much revenue would be raised by increasing the levy to 5 per cent. and the results of the concession. The British Art Market Federation has said that it believes that the overall package will enable the art market to remain as competitive as it is already. Therefore, the Government's figures of a £10 million rise, as well as the cost of the concession, will result in a revenue-neutral position. [Interruption.] I am not surprised that Conservative Members do not want to listen, because their crocodile tears at this late stage are pathetic. The Government have fought hard, working in partnership with the art market, and we continue to press the case. We made it clear to the Commission that we want to pursue the impact on the art market of increasing VAT.

The British art market is of value to Europe. We should think not about our art market versus the rest of Europe but about sales in the international market. I am happy to give the House the undertaking that the Government will continue to fight for the best interests of the art market. We deeply regret the fact that the previous Government were so foolish as to create an absolute legal obligation with which we now have to comply, but there is no alternative.

The package that we have proposed will enable the art market, so it tells us, to remain competitive and vibrant and attract new trade.

Mr. Townend: The Paymaster General said that the art market has said that the reductions on ceramics and tapestries—which are minor parts of the market compared with painting—will allow it to remain competitive. Who exactly has said that?

Dawn Primarolo: I could send the hon. Gentleman a copy of the British Art Market Federation's press release in response to our proposals. I am sure that he would be delighted to read it and to congratulate the Government on having done our very best—given that we were forced to increase VAT—to put together a package that mitigates the impact and helps the art market. I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 5

PREPARATIONS ETC. OF MEAT, YEAST OR EGG

'. Schedule 8 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994 (zero–rating) shall have effect, and be deemed always to have had effect, as if in Group 1 (food), in Note (6) (which provides that certain items which override the exceptions listed in that Group relate only to item 4 of the excepted items (non–alcoholic beverages)) for "Items 4 to 6" there were substituted "Items 4 to 7".'.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause corrects an error made in the transcribing of a cross-reference from the Value Added Tax Act 1983 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994, unintentionally extending zero-rating to VAT on food to include pet food, although it has been this Government's, the previous Government's and the industry's interpretation that VAT was to be applied at 17.5 per cent. It restores the position to what everyone understood it to be until Customs and Excise recently discovered the error. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Letwin: The new clause gives us a marvellous illustration of what is wrong with VAT legislation. The drafting mistake that the new clause remedies arose because of a quadruple negative. In the first place, everything is subject to VAT, but schedule 8 zero-rates—makes not VATable—certain items, including those in group 1, item 2 of which is animal feeding stuffs and pet foods; but certain items in group 1 are excepted and are not not VATable; but there is an override for preparations and extracts of yeast, meat or egg, which are not not zero-rated, or not not not VATable, making them not VATable, or zero-rated; but the override is overridden by note (6), which restricts some of the overrides to beverages such as Bovril, the favourite drink of my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant). That makes the other meaty preparations on that list not not not zero-rated, in which case, they are not not not not VATable—in which case, they are, of course, VATable. All of that was meant to apply to pet foods—poor old pet foods.

Unfortunately, that string of quadruple negatives quite defeated Her Majesty's Government's magnificent legal advisers—and, we are to assume because no challenge was levelled, the entirety of the private sector, until very recently. Now, Her Majesty's Government have splendidly caught up with the fact after the fact; but they hardly needed to because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) pointed out earlier this afternoon, the sixth VAT directive probably had direct effect throughout, so there was probably no need for the change.

That brings me to my questions. Does the Paymaster General know what the yield of the measure will be if it has been correctly drafted? I asked her this some hours ago, when we debated the Ways and Means motion, but she failed to answer—no doubt it was an oversight. Perhaps she will answer now.

10.15 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The challenge my hon. Friend poses the Paymaster General is entirely unexceptionable, so I assume that she will be able to answer it. However, does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Lady does not have to look into the crystal ball when she can read the book? Given that, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), the Paymaster General said that this tax had not only been incurred legally, but had been paid by the relevant sector in previous years, should she not be able to tell us how much was paid in the financial year 1998-99, and do so immediately?

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We are discussing an opportunity loss for the Exchequer and, since we can know what revenue came to the Exchequer through pet food VAT last year, the Paymaster General should be able to estimate what the opportunity loss would be were the new clause not added to the Bill—always assuming it had any value in the first place.

My next question is whether the drafting is now right. I should not bother to ask were it not for the fact that the whole thing is so incomprehensible that it defeated all the draftsmen to begin with, and it might be that there is a mistake this time.

I should also like to know what is a packaged food for birds. Packaged foods for birds will be caught, but packaged foods that happen to be eaten by birds but are not for birds will not be caught. This is just like the Medicines Control Agency: a great deal of fuss and bother has been caused by the difficulty of determining what something is for before one has eaten it. Whether the thing in question is caught depends to a great extent on whether one is a bird or a human being.

I hope that the Paymaster General can tell us that she is confident that, this time around, she and her officials have got the drafting right, because what we have here is legislation that is a dreadful mess. That is nobody's fault—the blame must be spread across the past 50 years—but the situation has been greatly worsened by the sixth VAT directive. What we should have been dealing with this evening is a proper clearing up of some ghastly architecture; unfortunately, what we have is just another piece of patchwork.

I hope that the Paymaster General will tell us, first, that the provision yields some serious revenue and, secondly and crucially, that it has been correctly drafted this time.

Dawn Primarolo: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's second question is that I sincerely hope that the provision is correctly drafted this time and that the transcription error has now been corrected. The yield is £185 million a year, which is not an insignificant sum, so it seemed to be a good idea that the Government should maintain the revenue.

I know that it is late, but I think that the Opposition should consider calming down, and agreeing that the new clause makes sense and represents sensible management. I apologise to the House for the previous Government having made the error, and I hope that the Opposition will now agree to its being corrected.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 3

NON-TAX PAYERS

'Nothing in the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 shall have the effect that any tax payer whose total income is below the personal allowance threshold for income tax purposes shall pay income tax.'.—[Mr. Quentin Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 18—A pensioner's tax exemption certificate—

'.—(1) The Inland Revenue shall be given the power to issue tax exemption certificates to taxpayers who, at any time within that year are of the age of 65 or upwards, whose income does not exceed £6,000 (Tax Exemption Certificate Limit), and is likely not to exceed that limit in the three following years.

(2) The Tax Exemption Certificate shall:

(a) entitle the taxpayer to receive income from all sources without deduction of income tax

(b) exempt the taxpayer from dealings with the Inland Revenue, save to confirm the level of income when renewing the Tax Exemption Certificate

(c) require the taxpayer to notify the Inland Revenue by 5th October following the end of the tax year where their income has exceeded the Tax Exemption Certificate limit

(3) The Tax Exemption Certificate limit shall be automatically uprated every year in accordance with section 257 of the Taxes Act 1988.'.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 19, page 9, line 12, leave out '20' and insert '10'.

Mr. Davies: I remind the House that I have interests that are listed in the register, but none of them is relevant to this debate or to earlier debates.

This is a crucial point in the proceedings. There is no need for any political banter or point-scoring. In tabling new clause 3 and amendment No. 3, we contend that the Government, in only two years, have inflicted immense damage on our income tax system. They have brought about a disreputable shambles by making changes that bear no relationship to the principles that ought to characterise a tax system. In a fair, just and economically sensible and successful society, a tax system ought to be based on the principles of justice, clarity and rationality. We now have an income tax system that is brutally unfair, discriminatory—particularly against the most vulnerable people—and incomprehensibly irrational and opaque.

I turn first to the callously unfair aspects of the tax system, as modified by the new Labour Government. The result of their measures is that people at the bottom of the income scale, whose incomes are so low that they do not even reach the income tax threshold, are now subject to income tax. That is already having a devastating effect on the finances of extremely—indeed, I would say almost pathetically—poor people.

Let us consider someone whose total income is £5,000 a year, which is derived from dividends. That person might be one of those widows whom the Government have decided, in other measures, to deprive of their widows pension. We debated and, I regret to say, unsuccessfully opposed that vicious measure only a few months ago. That person might be somebody who has no pension or other source of income, but who has saved from a lifetime of self-employment a small amount of money that now yields £5,000. That person might be someone who had to leave employment because of disablement, and we know how the Government have now cruelly restricted the eligibility criteria for incapacity benefit and are means-testing that benefit.

Those people are at the bottom of the income scale. A few months ago, their income was £5,000. What is their position now, following the Government's measures? It is almost inconceivable. Most people in this country, who are not in that category, have not even begun to face the reality of what has happened to people on the lowest incomes. The result of the Government's measures is that people who had £5,000 to live on now have only £4,000. Those people, who are extremely vulnerable, have lost £1,000 a year, which is an income reduction of 20 per cent.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is expounding the case with great force and eloquence. Is he aware that during the proceedings on last year's Finance Bill, the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) urged the then Paymaster General to reconsider the Government's position on the tax treatment of dividends as it affected people of pensionable age? The hon. and learned Gentleman, having made that suggestion as a Government Back Bencher to the beleaguered Paymaster General, was subsequently promoted to the post of Solicitor-General. Sadly, despite his promotion, the Government have not shifted their position. Is not it about time that they did so, or that the Solicitor-General relinquished his post?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend makes two telling points—one about an hon. and learned Member who certainly ought to be considering his position in the new Labour Administration. I hope that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who is about to respond to me, is also considering not just her position, but whether she feels proud to serve in a Government who press on the poorest people in our society in such a malicious and devastating fashion. That is exactly what has occurred.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) rightly said, the former Paymaster General, the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson), felt sufficiently ashamed by what his Government had done to express his embarrassment in Committee and to hold out the prospect that something would be done. Nothing, of course, has been done.

This is part and parcel of a campaign waged by this new Labour Government against the new poor—people who are at the bottom of the income scale, but who have a small amount of savings and therefore do not qualify for the Government's means-tested benefits. They are being clobbered over and again by these vicious tax measures.

One thing is quite extraordinary: the Government have protected certain categories of people from the impact of the abolition of the dividend tax credit. They have protected the higher taxpayers—people who would have been paying a marginal 40 per cent. tax on their dividend income and who continue to pay a marginal 40 per cent. on other sources of income. They have a new dividend tax rate of 32.5 per cent. The Government have protected overseas holders of British equities, so that Americans who receive a dividend stream from this country will still receive a cheque—a tax credit—from the Treasury.

The Government cannot find a single crumb for people in this country who have saved hard or who are—perhaps—widows whose husbands saved on their behalf and who have some small savings income from dividends on which to live. The Government should be utterly ashamed of themselves. It amazes me that they can sleep happily in their beds knowing how cruelly they have ruined the standards of living of people who are right at the bottom of the income scale. That is the achievement of new Labour.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Do the hon. Gentleman's comments about people on the lowest income mean that he will now support the working families tax credit?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman has been well schooled by new Labour. The technique that he has learned is this: if one is asked an awkward question, if one is confronted with unpleasant reality, and if it is suggested that one's Government have betrayed the very principles on which the Labour party has thrived for most of this century, one changes the subject. The hon. Gentleman has tried unconvincingly to do so.

I shall next consider people who are slightly up the income scale. What is the position of savers who have an income from saving, from bank deposits, building societies, bonds and gilts, or wherever, which takes them just above the income tax threshold? They do not benefit from the new lower tax rate of 10 per cent. They therefore find themselves at a disadvantage. For reasons incomprehensible, and certainly indefensible either in terms of justice or economic rationality, such savers are taxed at 20 per cent.—not at 10 per cent., as for the first £1,500 earned income band of taxable income.

What has actually occurred? I shall briefly go through the range of rates, because the public have not yet focused on what has happened. Until last year, under the regime inherited from previous Conservative Administrations, there were only three income tax rates in this country. They were applied simply according to the taxpayer's income. They were progressive: the basic rate of tax was 23 per cent.; the lower rate was 20 per cent.; and the higher rate was 40 per cent. People paid at the relevant marginal rate according to their income. The system was fair, rational and comprehensible, and was widely accepted.

What have the Government done during their two years in power? They have replaced those three rates—that simple and rational system—by eight different categories of liability for income tax and by five, soon to be six, different rates. They did so according to no principle at all, so that what has emerged is a dog's breakfast. There is a 10 per cent. lower rate of income tax on the first £1,500 of earnings from employment or self-employment. That does not apply to savings income from bank or building society deposits, bonds, gilts and so on. There is a 10 per cent. basic rate on dividends—not a lower rate—which takes that tax rate on dividend income up to more than £32,000. That is an extremely low rate. Anyone who receives dividend income up to more than £32,000—taking into account the personal allowance, which, I think, is now £4,335—does not have to make any further payments to the Revenue; that person does not have to account for any further tax.

Then, there is a 20 per cent. basic rate on other savings income, so that, although dividends are taxed at 10 per cent, bank deposits are taxed at 20 per cent. Where is the rhyme or reason in that? What about income from earnings from employment or self-employment?

The basic rate is 23 per cent.—not 20 per cent. as for savings—for income within the range of the basic rate; that is up to £32,000 for people aged below 65, and slightly more than that for those aged over 65.

I have already referred to the new 32.5 per cent. higher rate on dividends; there is a 40 per cent. higher rate on other savings income, and on income deriving from employment or self-employment. Soon, there will be an eighth category and a sixth rate: a 44 per cent. marginal rate for those with children, when the child tax credit comes in.

The system is a complete shambles, based on no conceivable principle. Is it to be defended as being fair to the poor and slightly more unpleasant for the wealthier? No, not at all. As I have shown in my example, the people who suffer most—with a 20 per cent. reduction in their income overnight—are the poorest in the country, who have a savings income from dividends. On the other hand, higher rate taxpayers are protected; if they have dividend income, they are subject to a special 32.5 per cent. rate. One could not possibly say that the new system is a workers tax, as has been argued by new Labour, and that people receive better tax treatment if their income is from employment or self-employment rather than from savings. The reverse is true. People with higher earnings from employment and self-employment will pay tax at a margin of 40 per cent., whereas, if their income derives from dividends, the rate is 32.5 per cent. There is no rhyme or reason in that.

I take two examples from different ends of the range. First, let us take a person whose total income is £6,000. If that income derives from United Kingdom dividends, they get £6,000; that is fine. If that income derives from bank interest, they will pay 20 per cent. tax above the threshold, and their income will be £5,711. If they have earned income, they will pay 10 per cent. for the first band of £1,500 above the personal allowance, and they will get £5,855. If their income were from foreign dividends, they would get the same amount, because a rate of 10 per cent. would apply. If they have—

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: Not at this stage.

Therefore, we have a series of five different possibilities—income from UK dividends; income from bank interest; income from earnings; income from foreign dividends; or income from PEPs and ISAs, in which case there will be a tax credit of 10 per cent., so the person will end up with £6,600. The income tax rate depends, not on how much one earns, but on the source of income.

Secondly, let us take someone with a total income of £30,000. If their income derives from dividends, they are credited with having paid tax at 10 per cent. and have nothing more to pay. If it derives from bank interest, it is taxed at 20 per cent. beyond the personal allowance, and they will get £25,665. From self-employment or employment, they will get £24,293; from foreign dividends, £27,433. From PEPs or ISAs, they will get £33,000 because they will get a tax credit. There is no rhyme or reason in that.

This is a system that simply cannot remain viable. This is a system that has lost all touch with justice or good sense. This is a system that the Government have managed to introduce in merely two years. They have produced a shambles—an extremely damaging shambles—and they are in danger of undermining the fundamental support for taxation in this country, which has always been a feature of British life. If one produces something that is neither fair nor rational, one will not enjoy public respect; and that is the most devastating disservice to the cause of good taxation that any Government could possibly deliver.

Mr. Geraint Davies: It is a great pleasure to have the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), who bears my name, back on the Conservative Treasury team. He is very amusing when he makes his emotional outbursts, which bear no relation to reality. Strategically—to put this in context—the Government are trying to have a Budget that gets people back to work and supports families, while protecting the least poor with minimum income guarantees. The changes that are embraced in the Budget and will be entailed in what happens in the wider economy, should be seen in that context—enabling families to work, stopping child poverty, making work pay, and so on.

There has been a lot of ranting from the Conservative Benches about the so-called pathetically poor and the cruel nature of the new Labour Government, but we should view that in context. The crocodile tears that Conservative Members have been shedding come from those who made up a Government who introduced such things as the poll tax, which obviously hit the poor the worst, and VAT on fuel, which especially hit the pensioners that they claim to be concerned about. That Government introduced charges for eye tests and cut pensions in real terms. We had the pensions mis-selling crisis.

Also under that Government, about a million pensioners underclaimed their rights, and the Conservatives did nothing to encourage and enable people to claim their rights. There was a complicated system, which many people who did not have a very good education—because of the legacy of the lot opposite—did not understand. Essentially, we ended up with a lot of poor people who did not claim their benefits. These are the sort of things that the Government are doing something about.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman is a good colleague of the Solicitor–General and I believe that he sat on the relevant Finance Bill Committee with him. Given the hon. Gentleman's reputation for intellectual curiosity, has he at no stage since the elevation of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) to the post of Solicitor-General asked him whether he has changed his mind about the Government's policy on the tax treatment of dividends for pensioners? Has he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he is now a supporter of the Government's position or whether, continuing to believe in the position that he held as a Back Bencher, he has used his position within government to argue for a change of policy? Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the thought of consulting his hon. and learned Friend has not crossed his mind?

Mr. Davies: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that long-winded question. He would know, if he had bothered to be a member of the Committee to which he referred, that my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General asked whether the Government would care to review their position. The then Paymaster General said, "We will have another look at it because we are very fair on the Government Benches." The Government took that look and came to the conclusion that they were pursuing the right policy.

It is necessary to separate social policy from economic policy. Without rehearsing all the arguments, Opposition Members should know that the changes were introduced to encourage more inward investment in companies and to get rid of tax distortions and excess pay-outs of dividends. The fact that there is a by-product for some non-taxpayers is known, but against that we have a strategy for eliminating poverty that is separate. It is horses for courses, and that is a rational approach.

When we consider the number of people who are concerned by the changes—if he had been up to speed I would have expected the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford to refer to the 300,000 pensioners—we find that 220,000 pensioners are affected by less than £100. About 270,000 are affected by less than £200. After all, we are giving £100 to older people for their winter fuel benefit. We are talking about gainers and losers, and in the wider context there is the reduction of value added tax on fuel, the minimum income guarantee and the extra £21 billion that is going into the health service. We must consider the real impact that the Government are having on pensioners. It is no use considering a small change in a microscopic way. We must have a wider vision of what is happening, and within that broader context is the case that the Labour party is the pensioners' friend.

Sir Robert Smith: If someone is £200 worse off and he is given £100 to pay his heating bills, what is he meant to pay the heating bill with when he is £100 worse off net?

Mr. Davies: The first £100 was only the winter fuel benefit. When we add up the other factors the average is £240. The hon. Gentleman should look up some of the facts rather than coming out with glib remarks that make no sense.

The changes that we made to advance corporation tax were to repay tax. Pensioners who invested in equities were receiving cash back on tax that they did not pay. A differential approach was taken to those pensioners who perhaps invested in other sources of savings. Clearly there was a distortion, which has been removed. If we want to give more money to poorer pensioners, it can be done through other strategies such as the minimum income guarantee and winter fuel benefit. Indeed, that is precisely what we are doing. We have introduced a range of measures including health service changes—

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No, I will not take any more interventions.

We have got rid of eye-test charges for pensioners and there have been VAT changes. A host of measures in favour of pensions have been introduced by the Government. It is fallacious and cynical for pompous speeches to be made by Conservative Members about the particular change that we are considering.

Mr. Townend: I support new clause 3. It would ensure that people who earn less than £4,335—which, I should have thought, even Labour Members would accept is not a very high figure—and more importantly, people between the ages of 65 and 74 who earn no more than £5,720, do not pay income tax. I am particularly interested in that group because in my constituency, East Yorkshire, we have a much higher percentage of old age pensioners than in the country at large.

The new clause tries to set right the perverse situation that occurred as a result of the Government's decision in the July 1997 Budget to abolish dividend tax credits for non-taxpayers. That measure came into effect this year and means that non-taxpayers who have already paid the tax on their dividend income cannot reclaim it, as they used to be able to do. That affects 300,000 pensioners, quite a number of whom are in my constituency.

It is all very well for the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) to say that £75 or £100 is not much money, but for pensioners living on just over £100 a week, an extra £2 a week in their pocket is a lot of money. At the last election Labour claimed to be the party of the old age pensioners, and the hon. Member for Croydon, Central said that today. The Government should think carefully about accepting the new clause, as it would be in their interest.

It was fascinating to me that an officer of the Pensioners Alliance came to my last surgery in Bridlington. That person is a lifelong socialist. I confess that, at the last election, I did not get anything like the support from older people that I had got in previous elections. That was for two reasons. First, it was put about that the Conservative party would do away with the old age pension. Secondly, the old age pensioners were led to believe that the Labour party would restore the connection between the average wage and the pension.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Townend: Naturally, I was interested in why that lady had come to see me. I could not help asking whether she was happy with her Government. She said, "No, that is why I have come to see you, Mr. Townend. I am very interested in learning what Mr. Hague's new policies are likely to be for pensioners, because we feel let down by the Government." She pointed out that people who had saved modest amounts could no longer reclaim the tax on the dividends.

When pensioners heard the Chancellor's speech, they were led to believe that the connection between earnings and pensions had been restored. Then they found that anyone who had an occupational pension got nothing at all. They learned that there was a new 10p income tax rate, but it did not apply to pensioners. They were told that they would keep their marriage allowance, but that was not for new pensioners—only for existing pensioners. The lady at my surgery said, "We are very disillusioned, and I will tell you one thing, Mr. Townend. We will not be voting in the European elections."

The Labour party should take note of that. The old people are feeling let down. If Labour Members say that an old age pensioner on £5,720 a year should be paying tax, they have got it wrong.

Mr. Edward Davey: What the hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) did not tell us is what he told his constituent about Mr. Hague's pension policy. I learned from my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) that when the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) was in charge of pension policy for the Conservative party, his pension policy was not to have a pension policy. I hope that a Conservative Member will intervene to tell us what William Hague's pension policy is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman should realise that when he refers to another right hon. or hon. Member, he should do so by his constituency.

Mr. Davey: I am grateful to you for putting me right, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I agree with the substance of what the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford said. He made the point that the Government's abolition of the dividends tax credit has hit a lot of elderly people—300,000 of them. Despite a long review, the Government have failed to see the error of their ways. It is no good the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) saying that we should divide social policy from economic policy. Of course we should not; they are totally intertwined. The Government recognise that linkage in other policies. I have always thought that the welfare-to-work programme is about ensuring that social justice helps economic efficiency, so he cannot have it both ways.

The Liberal Democrats have tabled new clause 18 to put that idea before the House and the Government. We believe that giving tax exemption certificates to pensioners who are below the income tax threshold would simplify tax administration, bringing to the Inland Revenue and also to pensioners a lot of savings—not only financial, but in terms of anxiety and worry. Hundreds of thousands of pensioners who are below the income tax threshold receive large self-assessment tax returns every year, filling them with anxiety about whether they are due to pay tax, how to fill in the form and who they need to see make sure that they do so correctly. They want to pay any tax that they owe, but are not sure how to go about that.

New clause 18 is based on a simple idea developed by the low incomes tax reform group of the Chartered Institute of Taxation. We have borrowed it and we hope that the Government will borrow it from us in turn. It would ensure that all those unnecessary self-assessment tax returns do not have to be sent out. The Government could take that further and ensure that taxpayers who are sent self-assessment tax returns, even though they owe only a small amount, could benefit from simplification of the tax system.

The Chartered Institute of Taxation has produced many examples of ordinary taxpayers—pensioners—who are extremely concerned when they receive such forms. A pensioner from Tilbury was quoted in one of the institute's recent reports, which was published in June. The pensioner wrote:

"I am one of those pensioners on low income who is being hectored by the Inland Revenue. I've tried explaining about my income not being enough to tax. This is the third year running" that the pensioner has had to do that

"even though my circumstances stay the same."

A pensioner from Stroud wrote:

"My husband is disabled and a non-taxpayer. We now realise that because we have a joint Pensioners Bond we are sent a self-assessment form automatically every year.

We could easily do without this form filling as we are on low income having paid taxes all our lives."

I shall give a final quote, although I could have given hundreds. A pensioner from Ilfracombe wrote:

"My experience from the Tax point of view is basic. I have not paid any for over 20 years, but still receive annual tax forms. Now I must fill in the new Tax Assessment Forms (for the 2nd year running)."

That is bureaucracy gone mad; it is causing huge anxiety among the pensioner population and it flies in the face of the Government's declared policy. When the Chancellor announced the comprehensive spending review to the House, he said:

"We shall also set a tax guarantee that no pensioner will pay income tax unless their income rises above a specified level."—[Official Report, 14 July 1998; Vol. 316, c. 193.]

That is a policy that hon. Members on both sides of the House can subscribe to—it is very sensible—but it is yet to be enacted. New clause 18 would give the Government the chance to do so. It is a practical way forward.

The proposal for tax exemption certificates is simple. The Inland Revenue could work out from the records which pensioners had not paid tax for the previous two years and write to them, making the offer that they would gain a certificate if they filled in a simple application form. Alternatively, the individual non-taxpaying pensioner could apply to the Inland Revenue for an application form for a tax exemption certificate, for which I suggest the following simple wording: "I do not expect my income to exceed the tax exemption certificate threshold of £6,000 for the current year. I do not anticipate that my income in the next three years will exceed the tax exemption certificate threshold. If my income should exceed the tax exemption certificate threshold in the next three years, I will notify the Inland Revenue by 5 October following the end of the tax year."

Everyone would be able to understand such a simple declaration, and it would save us the cost of sending millions of tax returns to non-taxpayers, as well as saving them anxiety. Certificates could be re-registered every four years, and random checks used to ensure that the system was not abused, as happens in other parts of the tax system. Our proposal is in line with the Conservative new clause, but offers a practical idea to simplify administration of the tax system.

Our amendment is not just about non-taxpayers or self-assessment tax returns, but about the relationship of the Inland Revenue and the public sector with pensioners and others who may have difficulty filling out forms, such as those with learning disabilities. The IR ought to be far more user friendly. The Government could use new clause 18 to make a start on that.

Mr. Luff: The Financial Secretary to the Treasury is honourable and decent. If she listens to the purpose of new clauses 3 and amendment No. 2—and of the new clause proposed by the Liberal Democrats—she will realise that her task of asking the House to reject them is unpleasant and unsavoury. The purpose of new clause 3 is simply to ensure that those who earn less than the income tax threshold do not have to pay income tax. Who can argue with that? The Financial Secretary may say that the clause is technically flawed, or that it needs to be rethought. However, the principle that underlies it must be one with which the whole House agrees.

Amendment No. 2 would ensure that savings income is liable to taxation at the new 10p lower rate, not the 20p rate. Both measures would have a disproportionate advantage for those on low incomes, particularly for pensioners. I hope that the Minister will think carefully about what she is to say later.

In the post today, I received a document that I did not recognise. As far as I can tell, it must be a Government briefing document for Labour Members, as it is headed "DSS Key Messages on Welfare Reform June 1999".

Mr. Leslie: Read it; it is very good.

Mr. Luff: Reading it is exactly what I intend to do. It states:

"The Government's central aim is to make the welfare state fit for the next century."

Some new Labour waffle follows, then the document says that the Government aim to "promote work for those who can and security for those who cannot."

On pensioners, it adds:

"Most help for those with most need. Giving more help to the severely disabled, to poor pensioners and to children."

How will the measures on which the Government are insisting tonight help poor pensioners?

The document goes on—particularly amusingly—to say:

"Providing for the future with new stakeholder pensions and encouragement that those who can save should do so."

What encouragement do the measures on which the Government are insisting give to those who want to save?

Later, the document lists all the marvellous things that the Government claim to have done to help pensioners—the minimum income guarantee; the winter fuel allowance referred to by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies); free eyesight tests; and the reduction in VAT on fuel. There is no mention of much more—the abolition of mortgage interest relief at source and the implications for home income plans; the abolition of married couples allowance for new pensioner families; and the higher rates of fuel duty that are crippling poor pensioners in many rural areas. The Financial Secretary will have to defend the position of making poorer pensioners pay income tax or pay it at higher rates than is acceptable.

I invite the Financial Secretary to think carefully about the consequences of rejecting amendment No. 2 on the taxation of savings. The estimates of independent analysts suggest that accepting this amendment would cost just £85 million, and £55 million of that advantage would go to people of pensionable age. I cannot believe that the new Labour Government, who publish such documents to send to their Back Benchers, intend to reject these measures. I am sure that the Financial Secretary, whatever she says, will, in her heart, know that the Opposition are right.

Mr. St. Aubyn: The Government's mantra that we hear so often—that they govern for the many, not the few—will have a hollow ring tonight. The 300,000 people we are discussing are the few. They are vulnerable, and many are old. They are also the few because they believe in being self-reliant. It was significant that the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) emphasised the benefits that this group of people may be entitled to as a result of the Government's measures. Some of them may welcome those benefits, but others take pride in the fact that they have managed to provide for themselves up till now, and that is how they intend to carry on. As a result of the Government's proposal, those people will lose a significant amount of income.

In the debates on this issue this year and last year, Labour Members argued that this group of people could change their investment strategy, and that, if they switched to bonds, they would not suffer income tax. The difficulty with that approach is that inflation, even at the present low rates, eats away at such savings. In the long term, the only way to protect the value of an income through a savings plan is by investing in shares. We learned today that the average income in this country has now reached £20,000 a year. I read that, 25 years ago, it was only £2,500. People who, at the start of their retirement, took the Government's advice and put all their retirement savings into bonds may have had their standard of living severely curtailed compared with what they might have achieved if they had kept their savings in shares.

What is the point of a Government tax strategy that encourages the old, the vulnerable and the weak to put their small amount in the least sensible form of savings? Surely that goes against the whole thrust of modern thinking. We should encourage people to care and provide for themselves. We should foster the self-help culture. The Government are penalising the people who have provided for themselves through thick and thin, and who have wisely invested in shares to protect some of the value of their savings.

The other argument that was advanced in Committee this year and last year was that those people could put their money into ISAs. If they were to do that, they would get a double whammy. Not only would there be an element of taxation on their share income in ISAs but, because the amounts involved are very small, the management charges for running those funds would eat into the net income or into the capital. One way or another, they would suffer greatly compared with the situation they were in before the Government came to power.

Perhaps the Minister could tell us in passing what proportion of ISAs has been invested in stocks and shares and what proportion has been invested in cash ISAs. We could judge from that how successful the Government's new initiative has been.

We have already heard the ghost of the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) hovering over the debate. I remember the surge of optimism among Conservative Members during the Committee stage of last year's Bill when he addressed the Committee with enthusiasm, urging the then Paymaster General to make concessions. We thought that the Government were at last listening to the needs of the few as well as the mantras of the many. Unfortunately, however, that particular Paymaster General has disappeared from the scene. He has not been in the Chamber for quite a while. I fear that he has been sent to Coventry, if not to Coventry, North-West.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend presents an irresistible temptation. Does he agree that, at the end of the speech of the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies), it was no clearer than it had been at the beginning whether he thought that the Solicitor-General had since experienced an apostolic conversion and come round to supporting the Government's view, or whether—secretly, and smothered in guilt—he still believed what he had said a year ago from the Back Benches?

Mr. St. Aubyn: Unlike my hon. Friend and me, the Solicitor-General is a lawyer, and none of us really knows what he believes. I wish that he were here to tell us. In his absence, however, I think that the Financial Secretary owes us an explanation. Why have the Government stalled at the last fence? Why have they failed to treat this section of our community fairly? I feel that they should pause, and consider the negative signal that the measure will send to other savers.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I want to say a little about amendment No. 2, which Liberal Democrats tabled along with Conservatives. It relates specifically to discrimination between different kinds of income earned and unearned, and the 20p rate. Let me summarise what I consider to be the central reasons why that is an adverse development.

The first reason has, in part, already been summarised by the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). It introduces a great deal of complexity into the system. We are talking not merely about the distinction between earned and unearned income, but about the distinction between different types of savings income. Different rates now apply to dividend and fixed-interest income; different rates apply to fixed-interest deposits, as opposed to annuities, which stem from another kind of interest income. There is no economic, equity-based or administrative reason for that; it just happened to emerge from a very complex, badly-thought-out piece of legislation. That is why we are pressing our amendment, which relates specifically to the certification process that will make things much easier for low-income pensioners.

Another point has not been mentioned, although it is important. The Government have unintentionally reintroduced the old tax principle that unearned income is in some sense less worth while than earned income. It used to be a principle of taxation that those with rentier income were somehow less worthy than those who were working. That principle had been scrapped, but now it is returning in disguise. Although it may have been reintroduced unintentionally, it is very unhealthy, and not compatible with the ideas that I thought that new Labour stood for.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman is making a strong point. A case might be made for penalising so-called unearned income, as opposed to earned income, and a case might be made for doing the opposite. At present, however, the Government are penalising unearned income at the bottom of the tax scale, and propose later, at the basic rate, to tax unearned income at a lower rate—dividends at only 10 per cent., and other savings income at only 20 per cent.—while taxing earned income at 23 per cent. That, surely, is complete madness.

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman is right. The central issue of the debate is how the proposals affect people at the bottom end. I sense that the Government still have not appreciated the extent to which people who are otherwise very poor still depend on unearned income. The situation is quite common. We all have constituents in this position—for example, people who have not made the contributions that would entitle them to a state pension, and who therefore save. Because they have substantial savings, they will not qualify for income support, and their future retirement therefore depends almost entirely on savings income. Young pensioners in particular, and those whose allowances are particularly small—those who have retired prematurely, or have been made redundant—are being hit at very low levels of income by higher rates of tax. Therefore, the system does not merely discriminate against unearned income. As the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford says, it particularly hurts poor savers.

In that context, I say a word about dividend tax credits and the dividend problem. It has been referred to, but it is helpful to go over a little of the chronology. The hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) has been singled out. I was present in the Committee when he spoke. He has been perhaps unfairly singled out because he was speaking up for the colleagues who were around him. He was representing a genuine disquiet among Labour Members about what was happening. Indeed, that continued for many months afterwards. There was a widely circulated early-day motion, which was, I think, roughly equally supported in the three parties.

I subsequently went to see the former Paymaster General with the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North and the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). He was very accommodating and accepted fully that an unfair and unfortunate major anomaly had been created. He undertook to mobilise the Treasury's resources to try to do something about it. What was discreditable was not the fact that he was not able to something about it—there may have been genuine administrative difficulties in sorting out the problem—but that it took the Treasury six months to make up its mind to tell us. Its reply came through in a written answer to me; it was sneaked through six months later. Not merely the policy but the way in which the Treasury handled the matter subsequently was discreditable.

In addition to all the other disadvantages of applying extra rates of tax to savings incomes, the provision is a further measure disadvantaging and discouraging personal savings. As the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has been sitting patiently during the debate, it is worth mentioning that he introduced a particularly popular and valuable form of personal savings called pensioner bonds. I was intrigued, as one of my constituents asked, how the returns on pensioner bonds had developed since he introduced them. It was clear not merely that the nominal return on the bonds had gradually declined over the past few years—I would expect that because inflation is lower—but that the real return on the bonds had been allowed to fall by about 2 per cent.

Therefore, a popular form of savings is being devalued and we have increased taxation of savings. In the short run, that may not matter—the United States has much economic growth and deteriorating personal savings—but it cannot go on. A society cannot grow rapidly and in a sustainable way without healthy personal savings. In addition to all the unfairness that the tax change introduces, it undermines the fundamentals of our economy.

Mr. Swayne: I support new clause 3. I would have kept my peace but for being provoked to speak by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies). Otherwise, I would have relied on the eloquence of Conservative Members who have put the case solidly.

The hon. Member for Croydon, Central refused to take my intervention, which was uncharacteristic because he is normally generous in taking interventions. However, I could see his difficulty, with the Government Whip shaking his head and telling him to refuse. The penalty is that he must now endure listening to me.

The hon. Gentleman expounded a most peculiar argument. He seemed to suggest that it was all right to plunder the savings of the elderly, so long as Government policy was viewed in the round. Specifically, he cited the fact that those people would benefit from the minimum pension guarantee. It might have escaped his notice that the guarantee is not yet payable, yet elderly pensioners in my constituency have already lost the right to reclaim tax on dividends. As a consequence, while living on low incomes, they are paying tax where they were not paying tax before. That is what the new clause is designed to remedy.

Labour Members might believe that people who have savings in the form of shares have developed a form of financial sophistication that makes it open season for such a tax increase. However, the lie to such sophistication is given by the number of constituents who are still writing to me to say that they have only just realised what effect the Government's proposals will have on them. That does not speak of great financial sophistication.

11.15 pm

Labour Members might also think that, generally, people who have invested in shares are at the wealthier end of the income ladder. However, the most distressing letters that I have received on the issue are from those who admit that being able to reclaim tax paid on dividends makes a difference, not between wealth and poverty for themselves but between being able to afford small luxuries—such as Christmas presents for their grandchildren, or visits to their relatives—[Interruption.]

Mr. Gray: The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) laughed.

Mr. Swayne: Labour Members may well laugh, but they might also recall that those are the very people for whom the Labour party—before it became new Labour, in pursuit of middle income and of those who are able, because of their income, to make donations to the Labour party—used to care.

Mr. Bercow: The whole House will have noticed that the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) does not believe that pensioners should be able to buy Christmas presents for anyone—that is the scale of the scandal of his position.

Nevertheless, does my hon. Friend agree that, when the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said that the Government's handling of the matter was dishonourable, the one thing that he omitted to mention was that, today, the single most dishonourable aspect of the Government's handling of the matter is that the only currently serving Treasury Minister who served in the Finance Bill Committee when the matter was discussed is not in the Chamber to reply to the debate? I refer, of course, to the Paymaster General. Where is she?

Mr. Swayne: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend; he makes an important point. I am certain, however, that the dignity of age will change the views, and indeed the attitude, of the hon. Member for Shipley.

Quite unacceptably, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central contended that it is perfectly acceptable to plunder the savings, and therefore the self-reliance, of elderly people, and to replace them with means-tested benefit. What signal does that send to generations yet to retire? What message does it send in respect of self-reliance?

The hon. Gentleman went on to speak of the need to eradicate child poverty. Does he not realise that the tax that we are debating would be paid by children? Although I grant him that the tax is unlikely to be paid by children living in poverty—the nature of the arrangements that we are discussing are such that they are unlikely to be made for children by parents who are below the poverty line—I ask him to consider the fact that many parents have arranged for shares to generate income for their children precisely because those children will not be able to provide for themselves, as they are handicapped and their parents are worried about their future. They, too, will pay the tax, and their income will be affected by it.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will reconsider his earlier remarks and reflect both on their wisdom and the message on self-reliance that they have sent to the British people.

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) said that he was not going to speak but was provoked into doing so. I am in the same position: I was tempted not to speak until I heard his speech. I have never heard such arrant nonsense, although he is not alone in this debate. One would have thought that the Conservatives had not presided over record levels of child poverty when they were in government and that they had not introduced VAT on fuel—perhaps the most regressive measure to hit our pensioners; yet they have the temerity to pose as the party of the pensioner. That is nonsense.

We have debated the issue time and again. That makes it all the more surprising that the new clause reveals a basic misunderstanding about the tax credit system and is fundamentally flawed. If the Conservatives really cared about the new clause, they would do their homework and get it right. Once again they have not done their homework, and not only can they not get the politics right but they cannot get the detail right either.

The withdrawal of payable tax credits does not mean that non-taxpayers below the personal allowance threshold will suffer tax on their income. The tax credit has never represented tax deducted on behalf of the individual, and the payment of tax credits on dividends was never a repayment of tax deducted on their behalf. On the contrary, it represented a payment to non-taxpayers of tax that they had not borne in the first place—tax paid by the company. Effectively it was an income top-up. The withdrawal of the credit leaves the non-taxpaying shareholders in the position of having paid no tax on the dividends.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the hon. Lady acknowledge the reality, which is that someone who had £5,000 entirely from dividends to live on will now have £4,000? That is a catastrophic fall in income for someone who is not well off—very likely a pensioner.

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman should listen to what I am going to say about the total package. If he does, he will find out.

Conservative Members have used the new clause as another opportunity to rehearse the well-worn arguments on the issue. Why did we make the change? We wanted to remove a distortion in the corporation tax system that encouraged companies to distribute their profits as dividends rather than reinvesting them in their business. Reinvestment is essential for growth in the economy, which we want to encourage. We know what the Conservatives did to our economy and we are determined not to see it repeated. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may shout. They do not like hearing the facts, but they are going to hear them this evening.

Payable tax credits were abolished immediately for most companies and pension funds, but we recognised that there would be a period of change. By investing in the new individual savings accounts, individuals will be able to benefit for a five-year period from 1999 from the payment of a 10 per cent. tax credit on dividends from UK equities. I urge the House to reject the new clause.

I understand the concerns raised by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) about the impact of the tax system on older taxpayers, but I am not convinced that his solution is the best way to deal with the problems. The aim of the proposed certificate for older taxpayers is that those on low incomes should be given assurances that they are outside the tax system, in particular to enable them to receive income without the deduction of tax at source. The present system achieves what the certificate is designed to do. Around two thirds of older taxpayers are outside the tax system. We are proud of that record. The package of Budget measures has taken a further 200,000 older people out of the system. Many of them have no reason to contact the Inland Revenue at all unless their circumstances change and their income rises.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Is the Financial Secretary proposing that people with share savings should put them through an ISA? How much has been put into share ISAs compared to the amount put into cash ISAs since the scheme was launched?

Mrs. Roche: I would certainly not want to give advice. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman must learn to have some patience. I gave way to him, and I will be pleased to reply if he will wait. It is no surprise that, in the first period, the most money has gone into cash ISAs, considering that they were very much designed to appeal to those with little or no savings. I am delighted to tell the House that ISAs are a tremendous success and are proving very popular. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury on all the work that she has done.

Mr. Davies: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Mrs. Roche: No—the hon. Gentleman had his chance. If he will forgive me, I have heard him at volume tonight. I gave him one chance.

Obviously, the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) is no longer interested in ISAs, as he is busy talking. However, for many poorer people, ISAs have been a great boon and we are proud of them.

The £1 billion Budget package for older people included a new minimum tax guarantee for pensioners; and the age-related personal allowances were increased by up to £200, more than required by statutory indexation. [Interruption.] I am not surprised that Conservative Members do not recognise the importance of that minimum guarantee. It is certainly important for the majority of pensioners whom the Government represent.

The proposal would have the effect of increasing the personal allowance for many lower income pensioners to £6,000 a year. As I have explained, the Budget package already includes generous increases in the age-related personal allowances. [Interruption.] I do wish that Conservative Members would cease chattering. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton is entitled to a reasonable reply and that is what he will get.

The idea of the certificate was put forward by the low incomes tax reform group. I can tell the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton that the Inland Revenue is holding discussions with the group about its ideas, and we are always willing to consider how the scheme might be improved.

Savings income, such as bank and building society interest, is already taxed favourably. It is taxed at the lower rate of 20 per cent., rather than at the basic rate of 23 per cent., until it is of a sufficient size for the higher rate of tax to apply. As part of the reform of corporation tax, dividends are taxed at 10 per cent. up to the basic rate limit.

Mr. Davies: Why?

Mrs. Roche: I will tell the hon. Gentleman why—because one of the basic tenets of the Chancellor's Budget was to encourage work and enterprise and to help families. That is what we have done.

Mr. Davies: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Mrs. Roche: No, the hon. Gentleman has had his chance. I noticed that he took no interventions. I have taken one from him and responded to a sedentary comment.

The Conservatives' amendment, which was not costed, would cost the Exchequer an extra £1 billion a year. Once again, we see that the Conservative party is prepared to talk about public services without saying how it will spend public money. The Conservative party poses as the pensioners' friend, but it is no such thing. It is the party that in the past has undermined pensioners. I urge the House to reject the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 10

CAPITAL ALLOWANCES: ROAD FUEL GAS

'.—After section 36 of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 (definition of "motor car" etc.) insert—

"CHAPTER IIIA

ROAD FUEL GAS

36A.—Where a person, while carrying on a trade, incurs expenditure—

(a) on the provision of machinery or plant intended to act as a filling point for the supply of road fuel gas, or

(b) on the installation of such machinery or plant, and where such expenditure is wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade, a deduction equal to the whole of the expenditure shall be allowed in taxing the trade for the chargeable period.

36B.—Where a person, while carrying on a trade, incurs expenditure on the provision of machinery or plant for the conversion of the engine of a motor car so that the motor car is capable of being propelled, wholly or partly, by road fuel gas, and where such expenditure is wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade, a deduction equal to the whole of the expenditure shall be allowed in taxing the trade for the chargeable period.".'.—[Mr. Jack.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Jack: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 27, in clause 8, page 3, line 26, after 'centimetres,', insert

'a vehicle falling within subparagraph (1) of paragraph 1A, or a vehicle falling within subparagraph (1) of paragraph 1B,'.

[Mr. Michael Lord]

No. 28, in page 3, line 39, at end insert—

'(6) At the end of paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 there shall be inserted—

"1A.—(1) Any vehicle which has during the previous 12 months been certified as achieving an emissions figure of 140g CO2/km shall have a general rate of £100.

(2) The Secretary of State shall by regulations establish the methodology by which the emissions figure referred to in sub-paragraph (1) is to be calculated, and any such regulations shall be subject to annulment by either House of Parliament.

(3) Subparagraph (1) shall have effect in relation to any licence taken out for a period beginning on or after 1st January 2000.".'.

No. 29, in page 3, line 39, at end insert—

'(7) At the end of paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 there shall be inserted—

"1B.—(1) Any vehicle which has been registered during the previous 12 months and which has been certified as using Liquefied Petroleum Gas as a fuel shall have a general rate of £100.

(2) The Secretary of State shall by regulations establish the methodology by which the process of certification referred to in sub-paragraph (1) is to be carried out, and any such regulations shall be subject to annulment by either House of Parliament.

(3) Subparagraph (1) shall have effect in relation to any licence taken out for a period beginning on or after 1st January 2000.".'.

Mr. Jack: This debate gives us an opportunity to review the logic of the Government's proposals on vehicle excise duty and carefully to examine their credentials on the fiscal encouragement that they may be contemplating—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but there is far too much background noise in the House. We are conducting a debate.

Mr. Jack: We have an opportunity also to consider the fiscal encouragement that the Government are giving to the use of fuels for motor vehicles, particularly liquefied petroleum gas, which have several environmental attributes to which I shall refer in a moment.

I thank the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders and the Calor Group plc for their assistance in preparing material for the new clause and the amendments. I tabled them because the Government received support for their proposal in the Budget and the subsequent Finance Bill to introduce a new vehicle excise duty regime. They reduced the VED for cars of 1100 cc or less by £50, but increased the VED on all remaining vehicles by a counter-balancing amount so that the measure would effectively be tax-neutral.

Mr. Fabricant: I am sure that my hon. Friend was not fooled, as so many were, into thinking that the Government were being generous in their dispensation. Is he aware that even as small a car as the Fiat Punto does not qualify for the 1100 cc lower vehicle excise duty dispensation?

Mr. Jack: I suppose that I should declare an interest: I have one of those cars, so I am entirely aware of my hon. Friend's point, with which I shall deal.

The 1100 cc cut-off was chosen quite arbitrarily. Magically, one supposedly reaches a tax-neutral position by taking £50 from the VED of the 2.9 million vehicles affected, and adding £50 to the VED for other cars. It is intriguing, therefore, that in year one of the change announced in the Red Book, the Government gained £14 million.

I tabled amendments on the VED, because in the press release issued at the time of the Budget, the Government said:

"New cars registered from Autumn 2000 will be subject to a VED system based principally upon their rate of carbon dioxide emission, to encourage the take-up of more fuel-efficient vehicles."

I found it odd that they were jumping the gun on the outcome of their consultation document "Consultation on reform of Vehicle Excise Duty to ensure a cleaner environment", which was issued in November, although I do not disagree with such an objective.

In paragraph 2.3 of that document, the Government say:

"The UK also has a domestic aim of cutting emissions of carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas, by 20 per cent. by 2010 relative to 1990."

So, a clear environmental objective was stated right at the start of the consultation exercise.

In paragraph 2.4, the Government go on to point out that "Recently, a voluntary agreement has, however, been concluded between the European Commission and car manufacturers to reduce average emissions from new cars to 140 grammes of CO_2 per kilometre by the 2008, a cut of about 25 per cent. on the current average".

From the two statements, one would have thought that, at that juncture, the Government would have wanted to do all that they possibly could to encourage the take-up of fuels that will reduce carbon dioxide, and thereby encourage those who are to meet the remarkable voluntary agreement by 2008. As I shall demonstrate, my amendments give the Government an opportunity to encourage such developments over the next 12 months. They are entirely consistent with the Government's objectives in their consultation exercise.

Amendment No. 29, which applies the introduction of the proposals to liquified petroleum gas, prays in aid the comment at the end of paragraph 2.5 of the consultation document. It draws our attention to the problems of fine particulates PM 10s, which have a demonstrated link with respiratory and cardiovascular disease, and to oxides of nitrogen, which can damage the lungs and play a part in summer smog episodes. Those emissions currently result from the use of petrol engines, which, as I shall demonstrate, are well tackled by the use of liquified petroleum gas. The amount of encouragement through the VED arrangements for the uptake of vehicles powered by such fuels is zero. It is the lack of consistency that persuaded me in the first place to table the new clause and the amendments.

It is important to consider the detail because we then find that, of the 10 cars with the lowest carbon dioxide emissions, only five have an engine size of less than 1100 cc; the rest are diesel-engine vehicles. Secondly, the best performing vehicles have carbon dioxide emissions of between 129 and 139 g per kilometre. Current technology is already incorporated in some cars; they will meet the 2008 figure. Under the present VED arrangements, there is nothing fiscally to encourage the uptake of such vehicles.

Cars with engine sizes of less than 1100 cc have carbon dioxide levels ranging from 129 g to a massive 172 g per kilometre. It is odd that the arbitrary use of 1100 cc means that the Government are encouraging vehicles with carbon dioxide emissions that are not at the top end of environmental friendliness; they are at the bottom end—if I can put the matter in terms of good and bad. An examination of the logic of the current VED proposals shows that they seem to encourage the wrong kind of cars. My amendments give the Government the opportunity to correct that damage.

Although I have prayed in aid of my arguments the 2008 agreement of 140 g of carbon dioxide per kilometre, the amendments may encourage the Government to consider the fact that other cars are already in existence that perform markedly better than the 172 g that I quoted but whose engine size is above 1100 cc. The Ford Ka at 155 g, or the Nissan Micra at 151 g are two good examples of vehicles that might be encouraged. I shall not read out the exhaustive list of cars that meet the 140 g output—the subject of my amendments—but it includes the Peugeot 106 diesel, the Volkswagen 1.9 diesel mark 3, the Audi A3 diesel and the Ford Focus 1.8 diesel. Many other diesel cars, because of their relative fuel efficiency, already meet the 140 g output of carbon dioxide per kilometre. Sadly, however, they do not benefit from the Government's arguments on VED on cars with engines of 1100 cc or below.

We should consider alternative fuels. I shall apply the same logic as I have already used, but to cars powered by liquefied petroleum gas. The reference to engine capacity is purely arbitrary; it does not take proper note of the logic of trying to encourage more environmentally friendly cars. Liquefied petroleum gas is good on carbon dioxide; it deals effectively with benzine emissions, which can cause particular health risks. It deals well with particulates and PM 10s, with sulphur dioxide, oxides of nitrogen and ozone emissions. I will not list all the medical benefits, but heart disease and respiratory problems will certainly be affected by a reduction in those emissions.

In fairness, the Government are backing their own policy of encouraging the uptake of liquefied petroleum gas. I am advised that the Deputy Prime Minister drives a car that is powered by that fuel—as are most of the Government's car and despatch agency vehicles. Sadly, however, by the end of 1998, just under 8,000 vehicles were powered by that fuel source.

I can think of two reasons why such an obviously environmentally friendly fuel has not enjoyed a greater uptake, and they are addressed by my amendments, which deal with the tax relief arguments.

There is no well-established infrastructure for the refuelling of cars with liquified petroleum gas.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): In past Budgets, the present Government gave specific tax incentives for the conversion of buses and lorries to use road fuel gases. Those incentives were not nearly sufficient because, throughout the country, fewer than 100 lorries and 100 buses benefited from them. The problem is not limited to cars.

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend makes a telling and helpful point. In my view, if there was some fiscal encouragement to install the necessary infrastructure, more cars would be converted to use liquified petroleum gas.

The second of my amendments would encourage the conversion of fleet vehicles to run on liquified petroleum gas. That fuel beats petrol and diesel on all of the polluting emissions that I mentioned except carbon dioxide. It is a very environmentally friendly and health-conscious fuel.

Sadly, the Government appear to have missed a significant opportunity to start the process of encouraging the uptake of such fuel, and the development of the motor vehicle technology that would help to achieve the Kyoto targets by reducing damaging emissions earlier than agreed. For some reason—in my opinion, only to catch a cheap headline—the Government arbitrarily drew the line at 1100 cc. As a result, they have an inconsistent and illogical approach to their objective of encouraging cars that are more environmentally friendly. In the case of liquified petroleum gas, they have completely missed the opportunity to encourage earlier uptake among cars powered by that fuel.

There is compelling evidence that the increased use of liquified petroleum gas would save more than £10 billion in health care and damage to the environment—especially by reducing particulate levels—by improving air quality. There would be many accompanying savings.

My proposal is self-financing. Often, when we advanced perfectly respectable ideas to improve the Finance Bill, we were shot down in proverbial flames because they would cost money. However, I am now suggesting something that will save well in excess of its costs, which the Calor Group has calculated as a net figure of £607,000—the tax costs of encouraging the installation of the infrastructure for LPG. One company, Shell, has expressed willingness to install the infrastructure, but there is scepticism in the industry about how quickly that development will be made. The modest proposals that I am putting before the House tonight would effectively save far more money in preventing damage to the person and the environment than they would cost in tax terms. If the Government were to agree to my proposals this evening, it would be a worthwhile step on the way to achieving their objectives earlier than expected.

Mr. Fabricant: I support the new clause so ably moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). It gives the lie to the Labour Government's claims that the Budget is environmentally friendly. The fact that the arbitrary cut-off figure of 1100 cc generated a net income, in its first year alone, in excess of £40 million simply shows that it is yet another stealth tax, and is even more deceitful than the average stealth tax because it was introduced in the guise of being environmentally friendly.

The new clause and amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend meet the Kyoto accord and follow on from the principles of the Rio de Janeiro summit, which was established by a former leader of the Conservative party and Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, who is now in another place. She established the conference in Rio de Janeiro and was instrumental in setting the targets that other Governments seek to follow. The vehicle excise duties set up in the Budget do nothing for achieving these targets.

As my right hon. Friend has already asked, why have the Government, instead of saying that there should be a cut-off point of 1100 cc, not specified a cut-off point that is related to the emission of particulates or carbon dioxide? Why, for example, have they not encouraged, as has the republic—that is the right way to put it—of California, the introduction of catalytic converters to Californian standards, which can reduce the emission of carbon dioxide to less than 110 g per kilometre. There is—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State for Scotland says from a sedentary position that it is typical that I do not mention British—[Interruption.] I give way to the right hon. Gentleman. I did not understand or hear what he said.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Dr. John Reid): I said that California has excluded almost all British cars. Is he suggesting that we do that here?

Mr. Fabricant: The right hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. If the Government, instead of carping, understood a little about emissions—not from their mouths, but real emissions—and a little about industry, and introduced standards that would reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide, British cars would not be excluded. They are excluded because they do not meet Californian emission standards, and they should. We should aspire to those standards in the United Kingdom and not mock them. The Government mock them because they do not understand.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde was talking about 140 g per kilometre, I could see the eyes of Labour Members glazing over. They did not understand. They are innumerate. They understand only pound signs, stealth tax and the spin to try to make out that the measures that they are taking, which are primarily to raise tax, are designed to produce a cleaner environment, They are trying to misguide the population. They will not produce a cleaner environment by such means.

We have a chicken-and-egg situation with regard to liquefied petroleum gas, which is a very clean way of generating power for motor vehicles. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde will be the first to concede that using LPG reduces the power output of a vehicle by about 20 per cent. The real reason why there are so few cars using LPG is that despite the best endeavours of companies such as Shell, there are only 14 outlets in the United Kingdom selling it.

Mr. Jack: Is my hon. Friend aware that the question of loss of power output has been more than addressed? That has been ably demonstrated by the fact that one of the leading cars in the Vauxhall Vectra racing category happens to be powered by LPG.

Mr. Fabricant: I am interested to hear that. I believe that the Volvo, which is the only commercially available car that has a device to enable it to use non-leaded fuels and LPG, loses 20 per cent. of its power when switched to LPG.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that a very good British car—the Vauxhall Vectra—has such a switch.

Mr. Fabricant: I am pleased to hear that. Like the hon. Gentleman, who is a powerful advocate for British industry, and particularly British Aerospace, I would like to see the British car industry doing well and exporting to California. May I say how shocked I was that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State—I might say my right hon. Friend—should think for one moment that I would not wish to see British cars exported to California.

If the Government were truly interested in the emission of particulates, carbon dioxide and other pollutants, they would focus on the emissions, rather than setting arbitrary sizes of car engine.

Mr. Richard Page (South–West Hertfordshire): I hope that my hon. Friend will develop the argument and explain to the House why the Government have banned the production and licensing of gas-powered electricity stations, as opposed to letting them continue with coal power, which produces far more emissions and environmental damage.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend is right. Although carbon dioxide is extremely dangerous and damaging to the environment—we have all heard of the greenhouse effect—he knows that the power stations fuelled by oil and by coal produce sulphur dioxide, which is an even greater pollutant. One can use as many cleaners as one likes in the emission chimneys; the emission of sulphur dioxide is still damaging, and is in breach of the Kyoto and the Rio de Janeiro targets.

Let us not be confused or beguiled by the Government's weasel words. The Government are not interested in ensuring that our environment remains safe for the generations that will follow. If they were, they would tax emissions. Instead, they tax the size of the engine. They tax it to the tune of £40 million in net gain this year—as I said, yet another stealth tax.

By how much will that increase in years to come? The world will get warmer and warmer, and become more and more polluted. We will have a car industry that still cannot sell into California, as the Secretary of State for Scotland said from the Treasury Bench, because in California people are truly concerned about their environment, so they are concerned with output and emissions.

I should have liked the Government to give real tax incentives for experimentation in the use of liquid hydrogen, which has not yet been developed in this country. Liquid hydrogen is one of the cleanest forms of fuel for the internal combustion engine. The sole emission of liquid hydrogen is steam.

Mr. Page: Is it not explosive?

Mr. Fabricant: Liquid hydrogen is less explosive than petrol.

Before we all get carried away with diesel, may I point out to my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde that it is in many ways dirtier than non-leaded petrol. Whereas non-leaded petrol can produce long-term pollution of the environment, diesel with its particulates is particularly known for causing asthma, especially in schools located near main roads.

I ask the Government to consider the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend. I wait with interest to hear how the Government justify their claim that the original measure was an environmentally friendly move. Even if they deny that it would raise £40 million for the Revenue, will they not come clean and say at least that it was yet another example of Labour spin?

Mr. Loughton: I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and new clause 10.

At the outset, I should declare an interest. A few months ago, together with the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton), I was given a spin round Brands Hatch in the aforementioned Vauxhall Vectra at 116 mph. When we got out, my make-up was rather less smudged than hers. The car certainly revealed no loss of power compared with petrol-driven racing cars. It is the only liquified petroleum gas-driven racing car in the world and I gather that it is currently second in the league tables. There is certainly no difference in that respect.

Mr. Fabricant: Is not a larger engine required and is not fuel consumption therefore greater?

Mr. Loughton: No.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) was right when he said that this is a chicken-and-egg problem. I do not want to go into the environmental and health benefits of road fuel gases, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde has done, but the problem is that there are only about 135 points of service for road fuel gases even though this country has about 19,000 service stations. There are difficulties with access.

There is an LPG service station in my constituency, but there are no others for miles around. The key to the success of LPG—and, indeed, of compressed natural gas—is infrastructure and making tax concessions to create that infrastructure. Installing an LPG pump at the average service station costs in excess of £30,000; installing the infrastructure to enable compressed natural gas to be pumped costs much more. The key to the installation of such pumps is businesses realising that there is a market for the product and the key to that market is company car fleets.

About one car in 10 in this country is a company car, but 50 per cent. of all new cars are company cars. We need to give tax incentives for company car fleet operators to convert their cars to road fuel gas or to buy road fuel gas-driven cars in the first place. At the same time, we need to give tax incentives to the manufacturers of those cars so that they will produce them at rates that are competitive with those of the diesel and fossil fuel-driven cars about which we have heard so much.

One of the few measures that we welcomed in the Budget was the 29 per cent. reduction in taxation on road fuel gases. We found out about it only in the small print and it was a great shame that the Government did not sound off about it rather more. That good measure followed another good measure that was introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) in a Budget about five years ago. He reduced the duty on road fuel gases by 25 per cent.

Not enough has been done despite those two, proportionately large moves being made. The duty on road fuel gases in this country is still higher than in any other European Union country. Certain European countries, such as Belgium, do not tax road fuel gases or LPG at all. We need to make a bold move on taxation—not only on fuel duty, but to enable people to install the pumps and the infrastructure necessary to make such products available.

Getting sales of unleaded petrol off the ground was a great success of the previous Government. They succeeded only because they made a bold move—slashing the duty on unleaded fuel—and because such fuel was readily available in service stations. A new pump head had to be put on the same sort of tank and, in many cases, people had to put an extra widget on to the engine—a 30-minute job. However, the job is far more substantial on road fuel gas-fired vehicles, which is why tax allowances are required to speed things up.

The industry would tell the House that it needs at least a five-year stability plan to show that the Government, whoever they are, are committed to promoting tax incentives and much wider use of road fuel gas-fired cars.

Mr. Edward Davey: I generally agree with what the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends are trying to do. Does he agree that other clean fuel technologies, such as fuel cell technologies, should also be promoted by the tax incentives he proposes?

12.15 am

Mr. Loughton: I entirely agree, but those technologies are still some way off. In fact, 100 per cent. tax allowances are available in some circumstances, including for equipment for scientific research to develop technologies. We need immediate action to promote the use of road fuel gases over the next few years. The Kyoto targets are not many years off, and by the time that new technology comes in, it will be too late to achieve them.

By promoting the use of road fuel gases, we would increase the residual value of cars. Dual fuel-driven cars are a current option, but conversion is much more expensive. If drivers are guaranteed to be close to a pump using road fuel gases, the costs will be brought down, and there are also economies of scale. Grants are available from the Energy Saving Trust for conversion, but such cars would be cheaper if the fuel were more readily available.

There are also implications for noise pollution. Companies such as the John Lewis Partnership and Safeway have converted or bought vehicles that operate on LPG because they are quieter as well as more environmentally friendly, which enables deliveries to shops in residential areas at anti-social times. They can reach the shops more quickly, avoiding adding to the traffic congestion that costs British industry so much.

The new clause would give more of a kick-start to the greater use of road fuel gases than merely reducing duty. It is no use reducing the duty on fuel if people cannot get the stuff. Manufacturers and operators of petrol stations will not make a capital commitment unless they are convinced that there will be some payback over, say, five years. New clause 10 sends a firm message to the industry that change will not cost much in the short term, but will have an enormous payback in the medium term, not only in revenue, but in savings from the promotion of the health of the nation.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I support the new clause tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack).

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

I apologise for not having been here to hear him move it, but I watched his progress carefully on a television monitor.

During the Committee stage, I, too, proposed the encouragement of the use of liquid petroleum gas. One of the key movers of that project, the British Oxygen Company, is based in my constituency. Everyone involved in the project welcomed the reduction in duty rather quietly announced after the Budget, but was concerned that it was not enough. We need more petrol stations providing road fuel gas outlets. In Committee, we heard startling statistics about how far one might drive by filling up with LPG. Of course, it depends on how big the car's tank is, but we need many more LPG outlets if the idea is to take off.

A car converted to LPG requires expensive charges for substantial checks that it is roadworthy. Cars carrying the new fuel must be safe, and the cost of the fuel tank is another hurdle in the way of wider use. The basic cost of tanks is perhaps between £500 and £1,000, but safety checks add greatly to the cost, wiping out the benefit of Government grants. I urge the Minister to give that some thought when she responds to the debate.

If this conversion is to happen it will require further research. I regret the fact that the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) is not present. During the Committee, her thoughts were rather skimpy, to say the least, and tonight, they are not to be had at all. That is regrettable, because the heart of the research into LPG engines is at Perkins Engines in Peterborough. That company was the subject of a serious takeover bid, and it is well known that its new owners are reviewing whether this research project should go ahead.

The comments of Ministers about the LPG project, and about what they are prepared to do to encourage the infrastructure without which the project will not succeed, could have a serious effect on the viability of the research programme and on the willingness of the new owners, Caterpillar, to invest in the project. That would affect employees in Peterborough, and it would have a knock-on effect on employees at BOC in my constituency, and all that it has invested in the project so far. BOC has converted its vehicles to run on LPG, and many other firms are looking into that.

A firm in Cranleigh in the southern end of my constituency takes cars around the country for those who wish to travel by air. It is the air equivalent of motorail. If someone is flying up to Edinburgh, instead of putting his car on the back end of a train, he leaves it at Gatwick airport, where it is put with others on the back of a trailer and driven up to Edinburgh overnight. His car is ready for him when he arrives at his hotel in the morning. For the modern business traveller who uses his car as a mobile office, this is a tremendous saving, because he arrives without the hassle of having to drive all that way.

Mr. Page: I suggest that my hon. Friend recommends to his constituents that they take a hire car in Scotland. That would probably be a lot cheaper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest that we come back to the matter in hand.

Mr. St. Aubyn: That firm ensures that the environmental impact is much reduced, because it takes all those cars up north in one go. The impact is reduced even further because it has chosen to invest in LPG vehicles. That works because it can manage to make the journey, as there are enough fuel stations where LPG is available. It enables the mobile office to move with the business executive, which is not possible with a hire car. To extend that service, many more fuel points are required around the country. That is why we shall listen carefully to the Economic Secretary's response.

Ms Hewitt: I am delighted to hear from the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), and from the other hon. Members who spoke with such enthusiasm about cleaner cars and cleaner fuels. We share their enthusiasm, and the Government are taking practical and consistent action to encourage cleaner cars and cleaner fuels. I shall say a little about that action before I explain why the new clause is unnecessary and the amendments are impracticable.

As several hon. Members have said, in the Budget in March, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor cut the duty on road fuel gases by 29 per cent. As a result, the duty differential is now the largest in Europe, and the duty on road fuel gas is only a fifth of that on diesel. We have committed ourselves to maintaining that differential for the lifetime of this Parliament, which will help to give confidence and stability to those who invest in the infrastructure of road fuel gas filling stations, and to those who are buying or converting to gas-powered vehicles.

Let me also mention—as others have not yet done so—the Energy Saving Trust's powershift programme. The programme provides grants to help cover the additional purchasing costs of gas-powered vehicles, and to help those who wish to convert their vehicles to gas or change their vehicles. In some instances, it can meet up to 75 per cent. of conversion costs. We have also taken steps to encourage the use of road fuel gas by company car fleets. Since 6 April 1998, the extra cost of enabling company cars to run on road fuel gas has been disregarded in the calculation of the company car benefit taxable on employees.

It is clear that there are already substantial incentives for people to buy or convert to gas-fuelled vehicles. As the right hon. Member for Fylde pointed out, the problem has not been encouraging people to use gas; it has been the lack of an infrastructure providing filling stations at which they can buy it.

Mr. Loughton: The Minister specifically mentioned a tax change in the Budget in 1998 relating to the capital cost of company cars. That, of course, was down to an amendment to the Finance Bill tabled by Conservative Members. Can the Minister tell us how many cars have converted to road fuel gas since that date?

Ms Hewitt: It is still quite a small number. As I was about to say, and as several hon. Members have already said, the problem is that the country does not yet possess an infrastructure providing filling stations where drivers can easily buy road fuel gas. But—as hon. Members have said today, and as was said in Committee—both Shell UK and BP have made the welcome announcement that they will implement major investment programmes to ensure that there is a network of LPG sites on forecourts throughout the United Kingdom. Shell UK has announced a £10 million investment programme designed to make LPG available to 80 per cent. of motorists by 2001, while BP aims to have 300 of its forecourts dispensing LPG within the next five years, and 75 sites on line by the millennium.

Mr. St. Aubyn: In Committee, I asked the Minister what proportion of Shell's total forecourt investment the £10 million represented in the coming year. She did not have the figures then; does she have them now?

Ms Hewitt: That is really a matter for Shell rather than for me, but I shall try to write to the hon. Gentleman.

The welcome investment in infrastructure to which I have referred is happening without the proposed special capital allowances. Although I share the objective of the right hon. Member for Fylde, I consider it unnecessary to introduce such allowances. In my view, this is a deadweight proposal; but we will continue to monitor the take-up of road fuel gas, and will keep the case for additional incentives under review.

I should mention in passing that special capital allowances for gas-powered vehicles and gas refuelling points would doubtless have to be notified to the European Commission as a state aid, and would probably also have to be notified to the code of conduct group on business taxation. That may well interest several Conservative Members.

I hope that, for those reasons, the right hon. Member for Fylde will feel able to withdraw his motion. If he does not, I will ask my hon. Friends to oppose it.

Let me now turn to the amendments. As the right hon. Gentleman and, I hope, others will know, in the autumn of 2000 we shall introduce a system of graduated vehicle excise duty for new vehicles based primarily on their carbon dioxide emissions. That will do what several hon. Members have urged us to do this evening: it will create a VED system that directly relates VED paid on new cars to their fuel efficiency and their level of emissions. It will give manufacturers and motorists alike a real incentive to take environmental issues into account when deciding on the type of vehicles that they make or buy. We are working closely with manufacturers to ensure that they have the systems in place to supply our licensing authorities with the emissions data on which we shall base the new system, but that cannot physically be done before autumn 2000.

I can just imagine what the motor manufacturing industry would say if we were to accept the amendment and to demand that it puts in place brand new information systems, to be up and running and linked to the VED system by 1 January 2000.

Mr. Jack: Does the Minister not agree that information is already available about the carbon dioxide outputs of the vehicles that I listed? The information is there now and presents no barrier whatever to the achievement of the proposal in my two amendments.

Ms Hewitt: The right hon. Gentleman is missing the point. New cars have been tested for carbon dioxide emissions since 1997, but the information has not been collated in a form that can be used to calculate VED rates. As I have said, manufacturers, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency and computer suppliers are working together to put the systems in place, but they will not be in place and ready to operate before autumn 2000. For the vast majority of cars—those registered before 1997—no carbon dioxide information is readily available.

The right hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members referred to the initial step that we took in the Finance Bill following last year's pledge by the Chancellor. We introduced a reduced rate of £100 VED for existing cars with engines up to 1100 cc. We did that not at a revenue gain, but at a revenue cost of £85 million, as the Red Book makes clear.

Of course, engine size is not the same as carbon dioxide emissions. It is not a perfect equivalent for environmental damage and pollution. None the less, it is the best available proxy for fuel efficiency that we have and can obtain from the information that is held by the licensing authorities. The measure has given a tax cut to drivers of nearly 2 million smaller cars.

Amendment No. 29 would extend the reduced rate to vehicles that are certified as using LPG as a fuel. I have referred to the incentives that the Government have already introduced to encourage such cars, but, as the right hon. Member for Fylde knows, many of the vehicles that use LPG can run on both gas and petrol. Indeed, according to DVLA records, only some 960 currently registered vehicles run solely on road fuel gas. About 10 times that number—some 9,300 bi-fuel vehicles—can run on either gas or fuel. As the amendment stands, bi-fuel vehicles that are capable of running on gas, but may not for most of the time, would none the less qualify for the reduced rate. Clearly, that would not make sense.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Fylde will support the Government's practical steps to encourage the conversion to road fuel gas and the purchase of smaller and cleaner cars, and agree to withdraw his new clause. If not, I must urge my hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mr. Jack: Although I appreciate the Minister putting on record some of the Government's efforts in the sector, much of what she said in rejecting perhaps technically flawed amendments was not consistent, although she used the word "consistent" at the beginning of her remarks. I understand that there is a legal requirement, if not in United Kingdom law, certainly at European level, to capture and to retain carbon dioxide data on car emissions. Therefore, that information is available and we have the voluntary agreement, which I mentioned and which is mentioned in the Government's consultation document on graduated VED.

It would not be difficult for a motor manufacturer—I mentioned a number of those—to furnish the Government with that information, which such manufacturers are, I understand, legally required to do.

I pray in aid a footnote to a briefing from the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, which states:

> "It was not a legal requirement to collect carbon dioxide data from new passenger cars before 1997".

Admittedly, therefore, it might be difficult to visit my argument upon pre-1997 cars. However, clearly, the hon. Lady's argument falls like a pack of cards when applied to cars manufactured after 1997, as that information is available, and using it would be entirely consistent with the Government's own policy.

I was worried by the hon. Lady's argument—which she based entirely on carbon dioxide emissions—that the Government favour a VED that would encourage environmental improvement, as she not only said that she supports liquified petroleum gas, but prayed in aid a slightly weaker hand when describing its merits.

When the Government make their proposals, the fleet will comprise cars of many different ages. It will be interesting to see how the Government cope with pre-1997 cars, on which data may not be available. I therefore fear that the second strand of the hon. Lady's argument, on consistency, may be difficult for the Government to maintain. Nevertheless, we shall have to await the outcome of the consultation exercise to discover how they will deal with that.

I hope that, when the consultation exercise is concluded, the Government might find some way of rewarding people whose cars are either dual fuel or run solely on LPG, as such cars offer enormous benefits. I am sorry that the hon. Lady had not consulted the Department of Health on the matter. I am sure that, given a chance, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury—who is now in the Chamber, and is a former Health Minister—would have whispered in her ear not sweet nothings, but hard information on how wider introduction of LPG could reduce the number of those who have to go to hospital because of heart or respiratory conditions.

The hon. Lady also prayed in aid the work of certain fuel companies in creating an LPG infrastructure. There is some scepticism about just how widespread that network will be—I quoted figures of 400 forecourts; 200 depots, over a four-year period; and the conversion to LPG of 6,000 company cars. On the net tax effect of my proposals, I quoted £607,000. However, if such proposals were implemented, billions of pounds could be saved in the health budget. It is sad that the Government are not prepared to perform a very straightforward cost-benefit analysis when considering the amendments.

I am grateful for the support for the amendments that I have received from my hon. Friends, some of whom spoke on the matter with great knowledge. However, I acknowledge that the amendments may have technical deficiencies, and that the Government themselves may not have the data necessary to apply the proposals. This debate has been useful, perhaps not only in teasing out the Treasury's thin thinking on the matter, but in encouraging it to do more work on it.

I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 11

ADMINISTRATIVE EFFICIENCY OF THE TAX SYSTEM

'The annual Financial Statement and Budget Report shall include an analysis of the effect of the Budget measures on the administrative efficiency of the tax system, including the following matters:

(a) the change in the number of taxes, tax rates, tax allowances and reliefs;

(b) the estimated change in annual tax compliance costs for the private, public and voluntary sectors; and

(c) progress on the simplification of tax administration for all taxpayers.'.—[Mr. Edward Davey.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Edward Davey: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

It may strike hon. Members as odd that, at this late hour, we are debating a new clause on tax administration, but, as we pass the Finance Bill, we should spend some time debating the matter. In 1986-87, the Tax Law Review Committee estimated that the tax administration industry, in both the public and private sectors, accounted for 1.5 per cent. of national income. At current prices, that means that the administration industry is worth more than £12 billion—as much as the agriculture, fisheries and forestry industries. The way in which we regulate that significant industry and the policies that we give it to administer affect many people and involve a lot of money. It is incumbent on us to look at the serious issues involved.

To their credit, the Government have introduced new measures in clauses 123 and 124 dealing with electronic documentation to assist the administration of the tax system. That is welcome, but we need to approach the issue with humility. Having considered all the factors that make the tax system so complicated, tax expert Robin Godman wrote in Taxation Practitioner in July last year:

"In fact, the Budget and the Finance Bill cycle are very significant factors in the causes of complexity".

What we are doing today—what some of us have been doing for many months—adds to that complexity. We need to look at the process and try to find ways to reform matters and make them simpler—perhaps even to reduce the size of the industry. After all, it does not really help our balance of payments.

That has been a recurrent theme over the years. Many committees have been set up. The Institute for Fiscal Studies was set up more than 30 years ago. The Meade committee report in 1978 influenced the Conservative Government. Recently, we have seen some major new studies on the tax system. The Bath report, published last year—its full title is "The Tax Compliance Costs for Employers of PAYE and the National Insurance System"—has become a seminal work on how we should look at the issues. The Government sponsored the study via the Inland Revenue and the Department of Social Security. It had some hard-hitting conclusions on compliance costs that should make us sit back and think.

The Select Committee on the Treasury has looked at the Inland Revenue and spent some time analysing the report from Bath university. Its findings were published at the end of May this year. This is a live subject and it deserves our attention.

What are the root causes of complexity? The foremost are the taxation policies of any Government. The Government have introduced a significant shift in the direction of taxation policy. We have seen some good signs, particularly in the Taylor report's comments on working towards the integration of the national insurance system with the income tax system. The Government have taken on board some of those important proposals, but they need to go further. The Government's proposals to merge the Inland Revenue with the Contributions Agency are progressive, and will help to reduce administration costs. There are other measures in the Bill that will also reduce complexity, including the abolition of mortgage interest tax relief and the married couples allowance. Those measures are going in the right direction for simplicity.

That is on the positive side of the ledger. Unfortunately, there are too many items on the negative side in this Bill and previous ones. The 10p tax rate that we debated earlier this evening has introduced a great deal of complexity for the personal and commercial sectors. Last year's Finance Act introduced the capital gains tax taper relief, causing huge complexities for many people operating the tax system. The system of tax credits, including the working families tax credit, the child care tax credit and now the children's tax credit, is an innovation in tax administration that I fear will increase compliance costs substantially for the private sector. Those policy changes impact significantly, and the net effect of all the tax changes has been to increase substantially the number of tax rates facing the taxpayer.

For ordinary taxpayers, there are three rates on earned income—10, 23 and 40 per cent. For dividend tax, we have 10 and 32.5 per cent. For capital and savings, we have 20 and 40 per cent. For trust income, we have 20, 23 and 34 per cent. For those receiving children's tax credit in the years to come, there will be a tapered tax rate and, at some stage, people will be paying a tax rate of 46.7 per cent. That is before we get to the many rates that have been introduced with the CGT taper relief. The number of rates has gone up, and that is why we propose that the Government say, when they introduce their Budget report, how many allowances, rates and reliefs there are as a result of the Budget.

Complexity comes not only from policy changes, but from the administrative detail, regulations and rules that come from the tax authorities, be it the Inland Revenue or Customs and Excise. Those are the root of the compliance costs for business. A business man—even someone employing only one or two people—must read all the information and regulations to ensure that he complies. Also, he must understand them—and that can take some doing. This is not just a one-off exercise. Employers must keep up to date because the tax law is forever changing.

For small businesses, huge compliance costs are involved. They must come to terms with the coding for the UK's cumulative tax system. They must operate two forms of direct taxation—income tax and national insurance. Anyone who has had to deal with the complexities of class 2 national insurance for the self-employed will know how taxes that raise only small amounts of revenue can involve huge complexity, and can cause great concern for small businesses.

The Bath report showed the extent of compliance costs and how they unfairly affect small businesses. The report showed that compliance costs per employee for the smallest employers—those employing one to four people—were £288 per annum. For the largest employers—firms employing 5,000 employees or more—the compliance costs were just £5 per annum. The relativities are even worse, and small businesses are even more badly affected. The gains that large employers get from the cash flow benefits of collecting the money from their employees before passing it on to the Inland Revenue are far larger than those for smaller employers.

The Bath study showed that the gains that large employers get from that float income outweigh the costs of administering the pay roll. Large employers do very well from the current tax system, and small employers do not. That is a serious issue when one looks to the long term. The UK's cumulative tax system was designed for a static labour market, when people stayed in their jobs for many years, when there were low staff turnovers and when we had many more larger employers. However, we do not have that sort of labour market now, and that will be the case increasingly in the future. We will have a much more dynamic labour market, with people changing jobs several times during their career. We will have a greater number of smaller companies. That crucial finding of the Bath report was not picked up in the previous studies of tax administration.

The study showed that many of the compliance costs come when one takes on a new employee and a new coding has to be found. In theory, the P45 system should reduce those costs, but the study showed that it does not tend to work. That cannot be good for job creation.

The Treasury Select Committee report said that the Bath study pointed the way forward. It said:

"We recommend that the Inland Revenue be given a target to reduce compliance costs."

That is absolutely right. The new clause would bring that about because it would force the Government to provide the information according to which targets could be set and progress measured.

The report focused on the compliance costs for small businesses. If a similar study were done on the costs for the personal taxpayer and the voluntary sector, it would also show significant compliance costs, increasing over the past few years with the introduction of self-assessment and the working families tax credit. If such studies were available to the House—perhaps the Government should sponsor them—many more hon. Members would be concerned about the matter and urge the Government to review it for the next Finance Bill.

The complexity is not only in administrative detail but in the overall philosophy and culture of the Inland Revenue, which does not seem to emphasise the need for simplicity, which should be an objective of tax policy. With a simple tax system taxpayers—citizens—can more easily understand what is being raised in their name, and how. That will increase accountability and compliance, because, if people understand the system, they will be more willing to pay.

The Government said that they were in favour of simplifying the tax system. That was almost a manifesto pledge. The Chancellor has certainly said that he is pro-simplification. If he is to achieve that goal, he should consider the approach embodied in the new clause.

The new clause would build on initiatives set in train by previous Chancellors. Lord Howe was a great promoter of the tax law rewrite project, which was designed to try to simplify the wording of tax legislation. It is a signally good project, with support from hon. Members of all parties. Labour Members do not seem very interested, but they should be concerned about the regulatory burden that the tax system imposes on small businesses.

The project does not shorten the legislation but it makes it easier to understand, so that one does not have to read it several times to find out what on earth the legislators were on about and what tax laws we were trying to create. It is very important for simplification.

The people involved in the project have often argued for a technical finance Bill, to ensure that we get it right in the first place rather than pushing through imperfect tax legislation and having to amend it the next year. That is certainly one way forward that I would urge the Government to consider.

I also urge the Government to examine the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Treasury in its report on the Inland Revenue. The Committee considered three options. The first was a royal commission on tax simplification: I think that that goes a little far, but it is a possibility the Government might want to consider. The second was a White Paper to be published by the Government at the start of each Parliament, in which they set out their direction for tax policy, so as to give tax practitioners and taxpayers an idea of where it was heading and encourage a little more coherence in the Government's tax thinking. That might be another way forward. However, the most impressive aspect of the Select Committee's analysis of the evidence that it heard was its emphasis of the need for longer-term planning of tax policy. That points toward the idea of a technical Finance Bill, so that there is greater consultation on tax measures to ensure that we get them right.

New clause 11 makes a more modest proposal: it simply asks that the Government provide information, so that we can see how their agenda for tax simplification is progressing. The new clause is based on paragraph 91 of the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury, recommendation (u), which states:

> "We recommend that in its response the Government gives its considered view on the options for simplifying the tax system we have discussed in this Report and sets out its own proposals for a systematic programme of simplification with a view to reducing compliance costs."

If the Government accept our new clause tonight, they will have gone a long way toward implementing that recommendation.

Mr. Flight: I welcome the Liberals' conversion to simpler and, by implication, lower taxes, given that one of the major causes of tax complexity is the overall rate of tax. I hope that they will not mind my saying that they are stealing our line. Earlier this evening, we heard a spirited speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), who focused on the enormous complexity that has been introduced into our income tax system. The new clause would monitor that complexity and the cost to the private and public system, which is currently estimated to be £12 billion per annum. It would be useful if some specific measurement of the efficiency of specific taxes were included in the new clause—for example, ratios of collection costs to amount raised.

The Government's stance—that they are keen to simplify tax and have taken initiatives to do so—does not bear the light of day. Over the past two years, the Chancellor has introduced a substantial degree of complication into the tax system. Much of that has been done for headline spin, some has arisen from the mantra of more means testing, and some has been the result of the traditional and continuing Labour prejudice against people with capital, especially small capital. We have ended up with six different tax rates: the gimmick 10 per cent. rate, which does not apply to one's little bit of investment income; a 20 per cent. rate; a 23 per cent. rate; a 32.5 per cent. top rate on dividend income for top-rate payers; a 40 per cent. rate; and a 44 per cent. rate for those who will be paying tax on the new child credit.

As has been said, there is a separate rate of taxation for trusts. The capital gains tax system is an absolute nightmare that needs to be reformed. There is very little chance that any individual will have the records necessary to calculate the old indexation and the new tapering rates. The Government seem to want ordinary individuals to have to employ accountants to keep and monitor those records. The present capital gains tax regime is unworkable.

The working families tax credit will cost employers a fortune to administer. On pension contributions, I wonder whether Labour Members realise that there are six different proportions of income that are allowable against tax as contributions for two different scales and different types of pension arrangements, depending on age. I do not blame the Government for that situation because it existed when they came to power, but if any Government were to consider reforming pensions, simplifying the tax rules for pensions would be the most important starting point.

There is an element in the tax system of losing touch with ordinary citizens. It is not surprising that elderly people whose means are small complain of being harassed when they are sent tax forms that they do not understand. More and more people are being dragged into the detailed self-assessment tax net and have to deal with concepts and calculations that they simply do not understand. Their returns will be wrong; the fines will go up, and the Government will find that the quite unnecessary complications in the personal tax system become enormously unpopular.

Citizens want tax rules that they can understand and remember. They want to be able to work out, almost on the back of an envelope, what their tax liabilities will be. There is no reason why tax rules for the average citizen should not be that simple—they were that simple not long ago.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) pointed out that small business, which is the great creator of new employment in our society, is also particularly hard-hit by the growing web of tax complications, as the Bath report has shown.

To return to my starting point, one of the big background problems for all Governments is the fact that tax avoidance measures inevitably complicate the tax system. This country should never forget the major difference between tax avoidance and tax evasion. In Germany, there is no legal difference between the two concepts. A central part of culture in the Anglo-Saxon world is the distinction between that which is within the law and that which is without the law. Naturally, all Governments want to stop tax avoidance. I might add that most citizens naturally do not want to pay any more tax than they are obliged to. However, I suggest that there is growing Government paranoia about tax avoidance, which is nowhere better illustrated than in the recent IR35 proposals, which are not in the Finance Bill but will be implemented in April 2000.

There are, no doubt, people who use companies to reduce their income tax and national insurance charges. However, as much of the evidence demonstrates, most of those cases occur in genuine entrepreneurial situations. People set up a business to hire out their services, particularly in the software industry, and they do so through a company. If the Government's proposals remain as they are, they will be a major disincentive to individual entrepreneurship in the service sector. People will not be able to offset their costs; there will be huge hassle in qualifying as an exempt company; and the money that they are paid will have full tax and national insurance stopped out of it.

The proposals will cause huge problems for professional firms. Professional lawyers who second their staff to organisations such as the Financial Services Authority, which will not be able to function without those staff, will face problems. Those proposals emanate purely from the Government's understandable but narrow focus on tax avoidance and their lack of thought about the knock-on effects and injustice caused by many of the proposals.

The best antidote to tax avoidance must be a lower tax regime. In the low tax regimes of the world, it is not worth the possible legal costs to try to make clever cuts or avoid taxation. We on the Opposition Benches have not changed our clothes: we stand for simpler and lower taxation. We very much share the spirit of the Liberal Democrats' new clause, delighted that they are obviously looking to make friends with us, having perhaps been a little rebuffed by Labour. What the amendment recommends is absolutely in the spirit of what we as a party stand for and always have stood for.

Mr. Page: It is not often that I welcome a Liberal Democrat amendment. I believe that it is the first time in 23 years; I do not rush these things. I congratulate the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on the new clause. It flags up problems that face any Government and the Inland Revenue. The point has been made—although obliquely, and perhaps not as intended. I am sorry that it is late and that it cannot be fully debated and allowed the gallop around the field that it deserves.

As matters of increasing complexity emerge in our taxation system, and as the Inland Revenue increasingly twists and turns and adds regulation on regulation to avoid the inevitable, the effect on small businesses will become intolerable. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton mentioned the pressures on small businesses and the Bath report. Compliance costs are rising day by day, and small businesses are finding them an increasing burden to bear. I can quote some examples.

I know of a company that employs just over 100 people. It received a form from the Department of Trade and Industry the other day, which took the senior finance man four clear days to complete. If the company had not completed it, the panoply of law, pressure and fines would have descended on it. There must always be the temptation for those in small businesses to fill in any figure and send off the form, and then say, if ever checked, that they must have made a mistake. The person to whom I have referred was most conscientious; he did everything properly and filled the form in fully.

A company of more than 100 people can withstand such demands, but what is it like for a smaller firm, in which the finance man is required for the day-to-day handling of the company accounts? As time goes by, pressure on such smaller businesses will grow and grow.

It is no secret that I was hoping that new clauses 2 and 12, which deal with the IR35 question, would be selected for debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) has touched on some of the problems that will result from that measure. Again, it will mean pressure on small businesses. Indeed, avoidance and perhaps even evasion may be brought about by the Inland Revenue's actions.

As night follows day, Inland Revenue solutions to tax avoidance often tend to throw the baby out with the bath water. I always find it sad that the Government, who are no doubt driven by their masters in the Inland Revenue, look more to traditional methods for the solution than to the future. I say that because I believe that we are on the edge of a trading revolution, at which new clause 11 hints. There will be huge consequences for tax raising, which may be somewhat similar to the way in which Gutenberg's invention of movable printing broke the vast powers of the Church some five centuries ago.

As hon. Members—I can see them looking at me—have instantly grasped, I am referring to the growth of internet trading. It would not surprise me to find that history repeats itself, with the Revenue trying to block certain internet activities, just as the Church tried to block the printing revolution that swept through Europe in the 15th century. You would correctly rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I moved into the detail of how the Church's hold was greatly loosened—if not broken—at that time, although it would be fascinating and I know that Labour Members would love to hear it. However, it would be wrong for me to take that course. I merely point out that another major effect of the move away from handwriting to printing and publishing in quantity was to contribute to breaking the hold of Latin as a common language at that time. The IT revolution that is introducing the internet will be the reverse of that because it brings with it a common language—English, or perhaps I should say American.

The new clause provides for an analysis of the Budget which will mean an annual reassessment of everything included under the new clause—the costs of compliance and of tax raising and collection will have to be reviewed constantly. Such matters will not be dealt with once and then forgotten for five or 10 years; their consideration will have to be on-going.

The Government seem unaware of the tide of change that is sweeping towards traditional trading patterns. If they are aware of it, they will realise at the same time that their powers are strictly limited. Politicians want to police the internet—perhaps to stop pornography. However, the majority of those politicians do not realise that that is the least of the threats to the established order. The new clause focuses on the accelerating trend of change. Internet users can, and will, use encryptions to transmit electronic data that will be impossible for tax inspectors to read. At least, data will be readable only at vast expense by using an extremely large computer to crack some of those encryption codes. As such codes use large prime numbers, a vast amount of computer time will be needed to break down a relatively short message. That will be impractical for the state to do.

The new clause hints at an erosion of the tax base which will have severe consequences for Government revenues. To remove such controls from the Government will mean a move away from central provision to a situation in which individuals—not politicians—decide on the state that they want. Individuals will make decisions in many spheres of activity by paying for those activities themselves rather than relying on their provision by the state. That will result in a marked reduction in what Harold Wilson called the social wage. Such a tendency will be driven by the erosion of tax bases caused by the encryption of trading on the internet.

If anyone thinks that I am dreaming, or that this is pie in the sky, I tell them that the process has already started. It applies easily to goods for which information can be encrypted and made immune from tax inspection—films, music, airline and theatre tickets, advice of any kind, books, magazines, holidays and even, perhaps, the activities of personal service companies. The IR35 changes may well help to drive companies towards exactly what I have described. If we add to that the mobility of companies—the ability to trade elsewhere in the world—then it will require a Government who are fleet of foot and of mind to stay on top of that pile. The provisions of the new clause point in that direction.

Nothing proves a point better than the practical example that people will migrate—physically or electronically—to the most favourable tax regime. The last part of the new clause makes exactly that point. It says that the Budget report should include an analysis of the effect of the Budget measures on "progress on the simplification of tax administration for all taxpayers."

If that progress is not made, the taxpayer will migrate.

1.15 am

I have the privilege to be joint chairman of one of the most important all-party groups in the House—the all-party racing and bloodstock industries group. The Government have already been forced to cut VAT on training fees because of action by the Irish Government in reducing theirs, and to stem what was threatening to be a flood of horse migration. We have a much reduced stallion base in this country at the moment. Why? Because the Irish have a better tax regime on stallion allowances, so more and more people are sending their mares to Ireland. That is the physical movement towards a lower tax regime.

To take a current example of the way in which electronic means are enabling companies to avoid tax, a well-known bookmaker has set up its operation in Gibraltar, letting its clients off the requirement to pay betting tax of some 6 per cent. on winnings—a loss to Government revenues. The age of digital cash is before us; we ignore it at our peril.

It is late at night—[Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] I take those cheers as encouragement to develop my argument, but I feel that I should draw my remarks to a close.

New clause 11 peels back the first corner in drawing attention to the huge changes that are upon us. I hope that the Financial Secretary—who rescued small businesses in her first year as a Minister and has inflicted the might of the Treasury in her second—will grasp the point that is being made tonight.

Sir Robert Smith: The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) mentioned the problem that conscientious people face when the tax system is complex. The Government need to bear that in mind when considering new clause 11. The more complex one makes the tax system, the harder it is for the conscientious, but one does not necessarily catch those who are fleet of foot or less conscientious, who can evade or accidentally avoid the system. New clause 11 is partly designed to tackle the burden and stress placed on the conscientious.

I agree with the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) that new clause 11 would deter the Government from making a mess of IR35. I have with me a letter from the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, expressing great concern that IR35, as currently proposed and currently out for consultation, might do immense damage through its compliance costs.

The IT industry was mentioned. Worry has also been expressed in the media industry. However, as a result of where I come from, my postbag is obviously most heavily influenced by those who work in the oil industry, providing their services as single-person companies. There is concern about the extra burdens placed on the industries for which those people work, which must meet the costs of trying to police the system. Those who work in the industry have already experienced cuts in their income because contracting fees have been reduced, and further cuts are likely in order to pick up the extra costs of taking on board pay-as-you-earn and national insurance.

I hope that, when the Government consider IR35, they will show some of the flexibility and understanding that they eventually did when they considered roll-over relief for capital gains tax. I hope that they will enter into effective consultation with the industry to work out where the real concerns are on tax avoidance. In that way they will avoid using a sledgehammer to crack a nut, which appears to be their approach at the moment.

I urge the Government to accept new clause 11 because it is in their own interests to have it sitting there, waiting for them every year, to remind them not to put their foot in it, not to make mistakes, not to damage industry, and to think carefully before introducing any new tax system.

Mrs. Roche: The debate has been interesting, but new clause 11 is completely unnecessary; I shall say why.

First, the material published on Budget day contains comprehensive details of any changes in the number of taxes, tax rates, allowances and reliefs. Secondly, the Government also publish regulatory impact assessments for those measures included in the Budget that have compliance implications for businesses. Thirdly, the Government are committed to simplifying the administration of the tax system wherever possible. We are also looking to improve the administration of taxes and to restrict compliance burdens—for example, by introducing the new Small Business Service.

Including the new clause in the Bill would therefore add nothing. Indeed, it would be unnecessary regulation. The Treasury has already set out a transparent framework within which it will work in the code for fiscal stability. That outlines the Government's commonsense approach to managing fiscal policy in the long-term interests of the country. I therefore urge the House to reject the new clause.

Mr. Edward Davey: I take it from the number of hon. Members who are in their places tonight that the theme that is expressed in the new clause has caught the attention of the House. It is a compelling new clause and there is interest in it. There are more hon. Members in their places for this debate than there were for almost all of the previous debates during today's sitting. I am rather pleased that we have been forced to debate the new clause tonight because there have been enough Members present to listen to the serious arguments that have been advanced.

I am delighted that we have won the support of the hon. Members for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) and for South–West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page). I am grateful for their kind words. However, they should not be as surprised as they seem to be that the Liberal Democrats propose such reforms. We and our predecessor parties have a long tradition of trying to simplify the tax system and reduce bureaucracy. For example, there are also proposals to integrate income tax and national insurance contributions.

In the Minister's admirably short reply she was rather dismissive, and unnecessarily so. She said that the new clause and the proposals set out in it were unnecessary. When referring to paragraph (c), she said that the Government are committed to simplification. If they accepted the new clause, they could give some solemnity to that commitment and take on the requirement that they should report to the House on every Budget day about progress towards simplification. That is not a hugely onerous regulation. The Minister seemed to suggest that the new clause represented unnecessary regulation. The Treasury does not appear to like regulation of itself but often it likes regulation of the private sector. We are proposing a sensible regulation.

Given the lateness of the hour, however, and given the Minister's assurances that the Government will move the agenda on—I hope that that comes to fruition in next year's Budget statement—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Further consideration adjourned.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Bill, not amended in the Committee, and as amended in the Standing Committee, to be further considered tomorrow.

CONTRACTS (RIGHTS OF THIRD PARTIES) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 90(6) (Second Reading committees), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills).

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Value Added Tax

That the Value Added Tax (Abolition of Zero-Rating for Tax-Free Shops) Order 1999 (S.I., 1999, No. 1642), dated 11th June 1999, a copy of which was laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

Contracting Out

That the draft Contracting Out (Jury Summoning Functions) Order 1999, which was laid before this House on 14th June, be approved.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Question agreed to.

DEREGULATION COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That Mr. Iain Coleman and Miss Geraldine Smith be discharged from the Deregulation Committee and Mr. Russell Brown and Mr. Andrew Love be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

COMMITTEES

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With permission, I shall put together the remaining motions relating to Committees.

Ordered,

Agriculture Committee

That Mr. John Hayes be discharged from the Agriculture Committee, and Mr. Michael Jack be added to the Committee.

Catering Committee

That Mrs. Jacqui Lait be discharged from the Catering Committee, and Mr. Michael Fabricant be added to the Committee.

Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee

That Mrs. Eleanor Laing be discharged from the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee, and Miss Anne McIntosh be added to the Committee.

Foreign Affairs Committee

That Mr. Shaun Woodward be discharged from the Foreign Affairs Committee, and Sir David Madel be added to the Committee.

Health Committee

That Mr. Robert Walter be discharged from the Health Committee, and Mr. Simon Burns be added to the Committee.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE

That Mrs. Jacqui Lait be discharged from the Science and Technology Committee, and Mr. Robert Jackson be added to the Committee.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMITTEE

That Mr. John Bercow be discharged from the Trade and Industry Committee, and Mr. Christopher Chope be added to the Committee.

TREASURY COMMITTEE

That Sir Peter Lloyd be discharged from the Treasury Committee, and Mr. Michael Fallon be added to the Committee.—[Mr. McWilliam, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

HIV-AIDS

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

1.24 am

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh): I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate this short debate on HIV and AIDS in the United Kingdom. HIV is the most important communicable disease in the UK. That is not my judgment, but that of the Public Health Laboratory Service Board. Since AIDS was first identified in the UK in 1981, a total of 32,200 HIV infections have been diagnosed. There have been 12,800 AIDS and HIV-related deaths, and more than 16,000 people are currently living with diagnosed HIV.

Thirteen years ago, I introduced the Bill that became the AIDS (Control) Act 1987. That Act requires health authorities to report annually about the disease—how many cases there are, and what the authorities are doing to help people with HIV-AIDS and to prevent the spread of HIV.

In introducing the Bill, I had three main objectives: first, to give us an understanding of the epidemic in each area of the United Kingdom; secondly, to tell us what health authorities and local authorities were doing on the ground, as a monitoring tool and in order that we could learn from best practice; and finally, to help ensure that there was a focus at national and local level on this terrible disease.

Much has changed since the Act went through Parliament. The profile of the disease is ever-changing. Sex between men remains the major route of transmission in the UK, but sex between men and women was the transmission route for more than a third of all newly diagnosed cases last year. The majority of those cases were acquired abroad, usually in sub-Saharan Africa.

One of the biggest successes has been in slowing the spread of HIV through intravenous drug use. Although that was once the major route of transmission in Scotland, the number of new cases of HIV transmitted by intravenous drug use has declined from 241 new diagnoses in 1986 to 25 last year. Such improvements can, however, be swiftly reversed, and indeed have been in other European countries.

There has also been tremendous progress in treatment for people with HIV and AIDS. For many years, AZT was the only drug licensed for use by people with HIV and AIDS. Now, there are several different classes of drugs that can be used in combination to prevent the onset of AIDS and to help prevent illness for people with AIDS.

These new treatments have brought their own challenges—challenges for individuals on tough drug regimes; challenges for our health services, which must cover the costs; and challenges for the significant proportion of those living with HIV who are unable to benefit from the new therapies. In addition, the success of the new treatments in prolonging life will result in significant rises in HIV prevalence, and increasing numbers of people undergoing long-term treatment.

Just as the profile of HIV-AIDs has changed, there is now a strong view among those working in the field that 12 years on, we would benefit from updating the workings of the AIDS (Control) Act 1987. The all-party parliamentary group on AIDS concluded in its recent inquiry that the Act should be "reformed into a more meaningful tool of accountability and audit, related to progress in implementing local strategies".

I hope that if my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), who chairs the group, catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the Minister is willing, he will have a chance to take part in the debate.

I propose four changes to make the workings of the 1987 Act as relevant as possible to HIV-AIDs in the UK today. First, when the 1987 Act was going through Parliament, there were fears that people in low-prevalence areas might be identified by the press, and it was decided that where the number of cases was fewer than 10, an asterisk would be used instead.

However, the climate has changed, and it is felt that as long as confidentiality can be guaranteed, it would be useful to amend the 1987 Act to enable reports to publish the number of cases under 10, for epidemiological purposes, for the purpose of studying the allocation of resources between districts, and for the purpose of studying HIV-AIDS strategies among districts.

Secondly, the reports should include data for those resident in a health authority area, as well as those merely diagnosed or appearing for services in the area. I understand that a London local authority believed that it had just six people with HIV living in its area, but it commissioned research which revealed that 179 cases of HIV were readily identifiable as living within that authority's boundaries. The authority had been unaware of those additional people, as they had been travelling elsewhere for treatment.

Making available data by district of residence would help in compiling a more comprehensive picture of the changing nature of the disease in different areas. It would provide a more accurate basis for planning and monitoring prevention work and social service work, preventing health authorities and local authorities from having a false sense of security about the amount and type of work that they should have under way. Also, it would allow more meaningful scrutiny by interested parties of the work of local authorities and health authorities. Again, however, we must be able to guarantee confidentiality.

Thirdly, it is vital that the Government money provided to prevent the spread of HIV is spent effectively, but there are fears that HIV-AIDS funds are not being spent effectively on the people most at risk of getting HIV. It is the job of the AIDS (Control) Act reports to tell us what is being done, but there is concern that the Act and the Department of Health guidance do not do enough to ensure that health authorities account properly for their use of their HIV-AIDS funding, and that there is perhaps too much flexibility for health authorities to apply their own rules. The National AIDS Trust has said:

"The returns made under the AIDS (Control) Act are not an effective tool to promote accountability at a local or national level."

It is important that health authorities show how their prevention spending reflects the local profile of the disease. I suggest that the Act should be amended to require the reports to show total expenditure on recognised epidemiological target groups. Those groups should be identified in the Department's guidance and should be mutually exclusive. I also propose that health authorities should be required to give some evidence that what they are doing is based on good practice, setting out the evidence base on which they are acting.

Regional AIDS (Control) Act reports have not been compiled since the regional health authorities were dissolved. The Department of Health receives 100 reports from the English health authorities, which is hardly a manageable number. That does not make it easy for the Department to make optimal use of the important information in them and the bigger picture does not emerge as a result.

I propose that regional AIDS (Control) Act reports should be prepared and collated annually by the national health service regional offices. We would also benefit greatly from an annual national report from the Department of Health. Such a report, perhaps from the Secretary of State, would give us an extremely valuable national overview of HIV-AIDS prevention, treatment and care work. I should add that that is a devolved matter, although surely the four nations of the United Kingdom should learn from one another.

The Government's decision to initiate a national HIV-AIDS strategy has been welcomed in every quarter, and I welcome the announcement of the steering group to take it forward. In her reply to my letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health setting out these proposals for changes to the AIDS (Control) Act, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health suggested that they should be considered by the steering group. I am happy for it to do so and should be grateful if, in the meantime, my hon. Friend the Minister of State would share his preliminary views with us.

The apocalyptic predictions of the mid-1980s have not come true. When I introduced the AIDS (Control) Act, there was talk of the AIDS time bomb, Edinburgh was dubbed the AIDS capital of Europe and Government reports warned that Britain could have more than 30,000 AIDS cases by 1992. Compared with other European countries, the United Kingdom has done relatively well in dealing with the disease, but complacency about HIV would be a terrible mistake.

There is a danger that people think that HIV is not a threat any more, or that it does not matter if they get it because drugs can help, but HIV is as great a risk as it ever was. There are still 2,500 new diagnoses of infection every year. Given the information we now have about how the disease is transmitted, I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that that figure is still too high. In addition, the new treatments can be tough to take and some people cannot take the drugs at all.

It is vital that the Government money provided to prevent the spread of HIV is spent effectively and, 12 years on, it is time to bring the AIDS (Control) Act up to date. I have proposed changes to give us better accountability, better information and better vision. I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say.

1.33 am

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) and to my hon. Friend the Minister for allowing me to make a brief contribution to the debate.

[Mr. Neil Gerrard]

As my right hon. Friend said, the all-party group on AIDS did a significant piece of work last year when it looked at what the UK's strategy ought to be. I want to say a few words about some of the report's conclusions and where we are a year on. I welcome the work that the Department of Health is doing and the setting up of a steering group within the Department. Its composition is important, and it is not made up simply of civil servants. Its members include people who are living with HIV, workers in the field, academics and medical experts. We need a range of expertise to be introduced. In particular, we need people who have daily experience of living with HIV.

A national strategy can make a difference, as it has in Australia, where a strategy was developed a few years ago. Some complacency has crept in, not among health professionals or the Department, but among the public and in the media, as if we are somehow immune from what is happening in the rest of the world. One need merely consider the enormous changes in eastern Europe to see that that is not so, or the fact that of the 33 million infections across the world, 60 per cent. are in Commonwealth countries. We cannot regard ourselves as immune.

HIV is a public health issue, and my right hon. Friend noted what the Public Health Laboratory Service Board has said. However, wider issues, to do with discrimination and prejudice, remain very much alive. They may not be the primary responsibility of the Department of Health—legally, they fall to other Departments—but a strategy that reaches across the board must take those issues into account.

I shall end by naming four areas that a strategy should cover. First, it should deal with treatment and care, and with the setting of minimum standards across the country. Whether a person lives in an area of high or low prevalence, he or she should be able to expect minimum standards. Services must also be culturally appropriate. In London, problems arise particularly in the African communities, and it is sometimes difficult to get in touch with people in those communities, and to make them understand and participate in available services.

The second major issue is funding. We are moving towards district-of-residence funding, as the stock-taking group at the Department of Health recommended last year, and most people agree that we should. However, we should consider how we allocate funds. This year's allocations were announced late, causing problems for health authorities and for organisations with which they contract, including service providers that are voluntary organisations. We need to ensure longer-term funding, tying together funds provided by the Department of Health, and those provided separately through local authorities and the AIDS support grant.

The third issue is prevention. Whatever we do in care and treatment, we must first consider what we can do to prevent the spread of HIV. My right hon. Friend said that we should target to ensure that money is spent on the right people—those most at risk. I hope that allocations will continue to be ring-fenced as the National AIDS Trust report suggested that some money given to health authorities for prevention work was not necessarily being used in the areas of highest need.

Finally, we need to involve people who have the virus and who live with AIDS in the development of the strategy, both locally and nationally. Through that involvement, we are more likely to get a strategy that works, and that will be able to tackle discrimination and prejudice, which affect work on prevention. Prejudice and discrimination discourage people from coming forward for testing.

I welcome the work that is being done. I hope that later this year, we shall have the first results of the working group and that the Department will embark on consultation, so that we get a strategy that addresses the problems that still need to be addressed.

1.40 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) on his success in proposing this important topic for debate. I also acknowledge the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard). They have both made an important personal contribution to this topic over the years.

The United Kingdom has fared much better than many other countries in limiting the spread of HIV infection. Over the last three years, important developments in drug therapies have led to a dramatic reduction in the number of deaths from AIDS. HIV-AIDS is now often referred to as a chronic disease rather than a disease with a rapidly fatal outcome.

As my right hon. Friend said, HIV and AIDS have not gone away. The people affected are living longer, but coupled with that is a continuing rate of new infections of between 2,500 and 3,000 each year. HIV and AIDS affect mostly young, economically active age groups. It remains an important public health issue that poses some particularly difficult challenges. For that reason, the Government have decided to develop a specific strategy for HIV-AIDS. Our plans to develop an HIV-AIDS strategy for England were contained in the Green Paper, "Our Healthier Nation." To pick up on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow, we are determined that people who use or work in HIV-AIDS services will have every opportunity to make their contribution to the development of that strategy.

Early and sustained action to control the spread of HIV, such as screening of the blood supply, national health promotion campaigns, and the availability of free, open-access genito-urinary medicine clinics and needle exchanges, has contributed to the relatively low prevalence of HIV in the United Kingdom compared with some of our European neighbours. We have a good record on prevention, and we want that to continue. This year, we provided more than £53 million as a ring-fenced sum to health authorities to fund local HIV prevention activities, and centrally we provided some £5 million to carry out national HIV health promotion activities.

With regard to health service delivery of treatment and care for people with HIV and AIDS, the concentration of specialist treatment centres matches the geographical distribution of the disease. Delivery remains skewed towards London and other major cities. In the current year, we have provided £234 million to health authorities for the treatment and care of people with HIV and AIDS, and £15.5 million to local authorities for care in the community.

As I said, we continue to have 2,500 to 3,000 new infections each year. We have a high number of babies born with HIV. We need to ensure that we respond to the demand for new drugs and for common standards, that we maintain our efforts on prevention and that we ensure that we keep prevalence low. Those are some of the issues that the new strategy will tackle.

The process of developing the strategy was launched by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health at a conference last October. The conference made an excellent start on the process that is now being taken forward by the steering group, which met for the first time last week. I am grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends for their positive comments on that process. We hope that a draft document will be ready for consultation by spring next year. It will cover issues related to treatment and care and HIV testing and prevention, and it will draw on available evidence and relevant work already under way.

As for strategies for the United Kingdom, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is tackling the issue, and an expert group, due to report later this year, is currently reviewing the HIV health promotion strategy in Scotland. In 1994, the Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland issued a strategy for HIV and AIDS, which recognised the need for increased efforts in public education, alongside education programmes in schools and youth settings, and the need for support for those involved in this work. Such efforts are continuing.

In October 1998, the Welsh Office published the "Better Health, Better Wales" strategic framework, and work to implement the various strands of the framework is being done by expert groups. The sexual health working group has held its first meeting, and the group to develop the communicable diseases strategy is to hold its first meeting at the end of this month.

The policy context that will shape the strategy in England will include the White Papers, "The New NHS" and "Modernising Social Services", and the forthcoming White Paper, "Our Healthier Nation". We shall also wish to provide the necessary frameworks to monitor the implementation and progress of the strategy.

I want to say something about the role of the AIDS (Control) Act 1987 in the context of the HIV-AIDS strategy. My right hon. Friend was instrumental in the enactment of the legislation through his private Member's Bill some 12 years ago. I think there is no doubt that that legislation laid the foundations for one of the best surveillance systems in Europe for HIV and AIDS, and successive Governments have been able to build on it over the past decade. The Act has, uniquely, allowed the Department of Health and the NHS to build up information on service development and HIV prevention programmes undertaken by local health authorities over time throughout the country.

I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's continued interest in the matter, and for his suggestion that a review of the legislation would be timely and, perhaps, should be incorporated in HIV-AIDS strategy work. His suggestion was supported by a recommendation from the all-party parliamentary group on AIDS in its recent and very welcome parliamentary hearings report on national HIV-AIDS strategies.

I am pleased to report that the HIV-AIDS strategy steering group was satisfied that such a review would fit sensibly into its work plan. Any proposed changes in the wording of the Act and its provisions will, of course, need careful consideration, but the development of a national HIV-AIDS strategy provides an excellent opportunity to update the Act in line with changes that have taken place in the epidemic, and in the provision of services. The Act provides for the submission of annual reports by health authorities on epidemiology, and on the use of resources for HIV-AIDS treatment and care and HIV prevention. Any changes in monitoring that are considered necessary will be indicated in the HIV-AIDS strategy document.

I recognise, and share, my right hon. Friend's wish for rapid progress. The strategy work provides the opportunity to get any review of the Act right, and I am keen that we should use it in full for that purpose.

The strategy development will also take into account developments on a number of different fronts that are of direct relevance to the formulation of the new strategy. Earlier this year, the Government announced their intention of drawing up an integrated strategy for the whole of sexual and reproductive health, with the aim of joining services and health promotion messages when that is relevant. We have known for some time that the presence of other sexually transmitted diseases can influence the spread of HIV, and it makes sense to link some health promotion messages.

A key component of the overarching sexual health strategy will be the separate and complementary strategy for HIV-AIDS. The separate strategy will provide a clear focus in a difficult area where there are major cost implications for the NHS. Our priorities remain to communicate clear messages about safer sex, to focus on groups at high risk of infection, and to continue to enlist the help of community organisations in delivering our messages.

The overall framework of the sexual health strategy will include key messages from other related programmes, including those involving HIV-AIDS, which will link with the communicable diseases strategy. We will thus be "joining up" health promotion messages when it makes sense to do so, but there will be no let-up in the important targeting of messages to the groups that are most vulnerable to HIV infection. Those are gay and bisexual men, people from countries with a high prevalence of HIV, currently sub-Saharan African countries, and injecting drug users.

This country's excellent surveillance systems keep us alert to the changing epidemiology of HIV and AIDS and allow us to assess the impact on the UK population of the HIV epidemic elsewhere in the world. They also allow us to keep a close watch on groups such as injecting drug users, among whom HIV prevalence has been at a steady level for years.

The NHS budget for drug misuse has been bolstered with funding from the NHS modernisation fund. This year, £12 million has been provided to health authorities. That will rise to £20 million over the next three years to achieve the key objective of increasing participation of problem drug misusers, including prisoners, in drug treatment programmes that have a positive impact on health and crime. The Government's anti-drug strategy is expected to strengthen prevention activities for vulnerable young people, particularly with regard to injecting behaviour.

The surveillance data show that mortality due to HIV and AIDS in 1998 was a quarter of that in 1995–96. That is a direct result of the success of combination drug treatments that are delaying progress of the disease and decreasing the mortality rate. As a result, we have an increasing prevalence of HIV, which makes our HIV prevention activities even more vital.

Meanwhile, national work for African communities has produced new information resources on HIV issues for African men and women. A mass media and poster campaign and a weekly radio project are all under way. Health promotion directed at the general population to keep them alert to the seriousness of HIV, AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections has included a website and targeted work for young holiday makers. Health promotion work with gay men included a new media campaign that focused on awareness of undiagnosed HIV infection. A second conference on the community HIV and AIDS prevention strategy has taken place, which focused on HIV prevention, understanding risk and gay men with diagnosed HIV infection.

Recently, there have been activities with a direct bearing on future services for people with HIV and AIDS—for example, the published work on standards for HIV services and developing networks for HIV care in London, which we hope will be extended to the rest of the country. We believe that developing networks of services throughout the country, using published clinical guidelines and agreed standards, will be key elements in the success of our overall strategy.

Under the new arrangements, commissioning of services for HIV-AIDS and genito-urinary medicine will be commissioned at least at health authority level. The most complex level of HIV services involving the administration and monitoring of combination therapies will probably be commissioned regionally. That should ensure that a coherent package of services that is based on previous experience and expertise is developed.

As part of commissioning in the new NHS, alongside work on partnerships between health and local authorities, development of guidance on long-term service agreements is under way. The guidance will build on good joint working and the introduction of three-year contracts, where possible. Many authorities, especially in London and other cities, have long worked in consortia with their constituent boroughs to place three-year contracts with their voluntary sector partners.

The strategy will clearly have an important role in setting the framework for future services for people with HIV and AIDS. The stocktake group was asked to make recommendations for the distribution formula, taking into account current use of the budget, financial pressures generated by combination therapies and the need to preserve open access GUM services. Some of the group's work has been used in distributing part of the treatment and care allocation to health authorities this year, in line with them taking responsibility for their residents. However, the redistribution of such large amounts of money must be considered carefully and in great detail. We need to move forward at a measured pace to ensure that specialist services are not destabilised while—

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Mental Health Services

1. Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood): What improvements he proposes to make to the quality and provision of mental health services. [88237]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): The Government are determined to raise both the quality and provision of mental health services. We have already set that in motion by investing significant additional resources in this financial year, and for the next two years, amounting to £700 million, and we have made mental health a clear priority for both the national health service and social services. We have initiated a thorough review of the legislation to underpin the provision of care and treatment, and we are about to publish a national service framework to address unacceptable variations in service delivery.

Mrs. Humble: May I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and welcome the additional resources to be made available for mental health? I welcome also yesterday's announcement of the Nye Bevan award for mental health services in Dewsbury. However, as I am sure my hon. Friend is aware, there are excellent mental health services in other parts of the country. In Blackpool, along the Fylde coast, there have been exciting developments in child and adolescent psychiatry. A new day centre has opened and new family support workers have been appointed.

I wish to draw to my hon. Friend's attention the difficulties that my local community trust is having in recruiting and appointing a new consultant to deal especially with child psychiatric problems. I am well aware that he has inherited from the previous Government a substantial shortfall in trained staff—

Madam Speaker: Order. A question, please.

Mrs. Humble: Can my hon. Friend offer me reassurances about the training and recruitment of staff, especially in child psychiatry, which is such an important area?

Mr. Hutton: I can certainly reassure my hon. Friend about that. I remind the House that the Government have committed £90 million over the next three years to improving the provision of child and adolescent mental health services, which have been neglected in the past and which can play an important role in improving mental health services. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to some of the problems in recruiting staff in a specialist area. She may be reassured to know, for example, that between 1997 and 1998, there has been a nearly 8 per cent. growth in the number of consultants in the psychiatry specialty group. The numbers in general psychiatry are expected to double from about 150 to 300. We are trying to address these problems. It is important that we succeed in doing so because these services are extremely important.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): I think that the Minister will know how strongly I believe that additional priority should be given to mental health services. May I ask him again to look at how funding has affected the home counties? In Surrey, there is no money to recruit or employ people and there have been cuts across the board. At a time when policy soundbites are good, it is particularly dispiriting for those who are involved in the service not to have the wherewithal to embark on the necessary improvements.

Will the Minister take forward the commitment that he gave in an Adjournment debate last week to ascertain what more he could do to help Cruse Bereavement Care? This is a day when prevention will be discussed. It seems that prevention in the area of mental health can be provided by assisting the voluntary organisations that help those undergoing bereavement. There could not be a better organisation than Cruse to do that.

Mr. Hutton: I can reassure the right hon. Lady. She will know that I am meeting the chief executive of Cruse tomorrow to discuss her concerns and how the Government can better support the provision of bereavement services throughout the country. I remind the right hon. Lady that the £90 million to which I referred represents additional resources for child and adolescent mental health services, which will be distributed fairly throughout the country. I point out again to the right hon. Lady and to other Surrey Members, who raise these issues regularly with me, that both local authority social services and the national health service in Surrey have received real-terms increases in their allocations this year. At some point, the right hon. Lady might begin to acknowledge that fact.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): In Bolton, mental health providers are being used to train people who are working for the pilot new deal scheme for the disabled. Jointly with the local authority, specialist helpers have been recruited to help people with mental health problems to get a job. Once they have obtained a job, the helpers are there to support them. Does my hon. Friend agree that joint working of this kind is the way forward for the benefit of our citizens?

Mr. Hutton: I certainly do. My hon. Friend will probably be aware that there are initiatives in the north-west to try to provide better services for people with mental health problems to assist them in getting back into work and in retaining employment. We do not intend to let people with mental health problems slip through the net. We want to provide better services to support them in employment and to help those who fall out of employment.

Waiting Times

2. Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): If he will make a statement on waiting times from GP referral to in-patient admission in the South Staffordshire health authority area. [88238]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): The Department has never collected data on patients' total waiting time from general practitioner referral to in-patient admission. However, I am pleased to say that during 1998–99, in-patient waiting lists in South Staffordshire fell by 2,233. Lengthy waits of over nine months fell by 7 per cent.

Mr. Fabricant: It is not waiting lists but waiting times that count. I found out in January that patients hoping to go to the Good Hope hospital have to wait twice as long if they live in the South Staffordshire health authority area as people who live in Birmingham, for treatment for exactly the same clinical problem. I wrote to the Department of Health in January, and eventually got a reply in March from Baroness Hayman. She agreed that it was an anomaly and that it was wrong, and she stated that she had therefore asked her officials

"at the West Midlands Regional Office of the NHS Executive to meet with the Health Authorities and Trust to see if there is scope for improving waiting times".

Since then, I have heard nothing, despite writing. Surprise, surprise, I got a letter today—

Madam Speaker: Order. We have had a very bad start to questions. These are really Adjournment debates. Will the hon. Gentleman put his question to the Minister now?

Mr. Fabricant: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The letter today stated that there would be no change. My question is this: is it morally right that someone suffering from an illness who happens to live in one postcode area has to wait twice as long to go to the same hospital as those with exactly the same complaint who live in a different postcode area? Is that right or is it wrong?

Mr. Denham: One of the things that we must tackle is the unacceptable variations in access to treatment and care, which were the legacy that we inherited from the fragmentation and divisiveness of the previous Government. May I say to the hon. Gentleman and his constituent that in drawing a comparison with Birmingham, the hon. Gentleman is drawing a comparison with one of the five best performing health authorities in the country. Birmingham has the shortest waiting times for patient treatment and the shortest lists per head of population. It should be congratulated on that. The median waiting time for in-patient treatment at the Good Hope hospital is just under 12 weeks. For South Staffordshire, it is between two and three weeks longer than that.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): When will the Minister produce the figures that matter to patients in South Staffordshire, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) mentioned, and publish the waiting times from referral by their GP to their actual treatment?

Mr. Denham: The reason why this Government have not collected the figures from GP referral to in-patient admission is, I believe, the same reason why the previous Government did not do so: not all GP referrals end up with an in-patient admission, so that would not provide a meaningful statistic about the health service. I remember that under the previous Government, of whom the hon. Gentleman was a member—I should have congratulated him on his new appointment—many, many people waited longer than 18 months for treatment. For nine months in a row, there have been no reports of people in the NHS having to wait for 18 months.

Dr. Fox: The constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) will have learned from the Minister what the true position is. The Government will not collect the figures because they know that they are creating waiting lists for waiting lists. When one adds the number of patients waiting to wait to the number of those actually waiting, one gets a much bigger number than the Government's fiddled figures. The Secretary of State promised to give us the figures back in September. The Minister is in charge of a health service in which junior doctors are betrayed, the British Medical Association says that morale is at an all-time low, complaints are up and confidence is down. The truth is that health is getting worse under Labour.

Mr. Denham: That is simply not true. The hon. Gentleman makes claims about fiddled waiting list figures. He knows that the only change that this Government have made in the collection and publication of waiting list data is that we publish the information far more often than the previous Government did. As waiting lists come down—and they have come down—waiting times are coming down as well.

Accident and Emergency Wards

3. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): What progress has been made in reducing waiting times in accident and emergency wards in London hospitals in the past two years. [88239]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): More than £15 million is to be invested in A and E schemes across London hospitals for 26 accident and emergency departments. The money will help to ensure that long waits are tackled through the introduction of admission wards, special areas for children, the appointment of more emergency nurse practitioners and new initiatives such as direct links with general practitioner surgeries.

Dr. Cable: Is the Minister aware of the absolutely critical situation in south-west London, particularly at the West Middlesex and Kingston hospitals, which is manifested in large numbers of overnight stays and longer waits? Although we appreciate the programme of additional works that the Government are contemplating, will he consider an emergency programme designed to increase the number of beds in the hospitals so that the accident and emergency wards do not simply become annexes to the hospitals and chronically overcrowded as a result?

Mr. Denham: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge that one of the A and E departments covered by the investment to which I have referred is at Kingston hospital, which will receive £2 million for accident and emergency redevelopment. That is, by some way, the largest sum for any London hospital. The way in which the accident and emergency money will be invested across London depends very much on what will make the biggest impact on the quality of service in each hospital. In four cases, X-ray facilities will be improved. In five cases, facilities such as medical assessment units or observation wards will be improved, which will reduce the waiting times for admission. In other cases, there will be additional treatment rooms or cubicles. We are taking the appropriate measures in each of the hospitals concerned to make the biggest possible impact on accident and emergency waiting times.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Does the Minister agree that matters will improve in London's accident and emergency departments only with the support and collaboration of the junior doctors who work in them round the clock? Is it not obvious from the proceedings of the British Medical Association conference this week that the Secretary of State has forfeited the confidence of junior and senior doctors? Would it not be in the best interests of the national health service in London if he were to let someone else rebuild that confidence?

Mr. Denham: I am pleased to pay tribute to junior doctors and the role that they play in our hospitals; I met them recently and we had constructive discussions. I am as anxious as they are to ensure that improvements continue to be made in their working conditions and working hours, and in the other matters that affect the conditions of their rest periods. That is a promise that we are determined to see through. My right hon. Friend has led on it since he became Secretary of State and we shall continue to honour it.

HIV Services

4. Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): What steps he plans to take to encourage commissioners of HIV services to agree longer-term contracts with the voluntary sector. [88240]

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): We fully accept the importance of providing stability for voluntary sector providers of HIV services through longer-term rather than year-on-year contracts. Many authorities, especially in London and other cities, are working with consortiums to place three-year contracts with their voluntary sector providers. We welcome that. I have asked that this issue also be looked at particularly by the HIV-AIDS strategy steering group.

Dr. Tonge: That is all very well, but I am sure that the Minister agrees that voluntary organisations have played a huge part in the containment of HIV in this country. They still have an important part to play, but many of them did not know their financial situation until well into the year and they simply cannot plan. According to the curiously named Home Office document, "Compact on Relations Between Government and the Voluntary Sector", it is "good practice to give voluntary organisations early and transparent information".

The White Paper says that annual contracts are bad practice, so when will we have action instead of pronouncements?

Ms Jowell: I pay tribute to the voluntary sector in the HIV-AIDS field; it makes a vital contribution to the care and support of people with AIDS and HIV. The HIV strategy document will be issued for consultation next spring, and we are determined to deal with the problems faced by the voluntary sector by replacing annual contracts with longer-term contracts to ensure that its work has the stability that is so important for the people whom it serves.

Health Service Investment

5. Mr. Keith Darvill (Upminster): What the planned level of capital investment in the national health service is over the next three years. [88241]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): More than £8 billion of capital investment is planned for the national health service over the next three years. Since we won the election, work has begun on 17 major new hospital projects, and more will be announced shortly.

Mr. Darvill: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. The planned investment will go some way towards addressing the chronic lack of capital investment in our precious asset, the national health service. Does the investment to which he referred include the new PFI-funded hospital at Oldchurch Park, Romford, recommended in the Turnberg report? What a wonderful birthday present that would be for my constituents on the 51st anniversary of the national health service.

Mr. Dobson: I do not want to anticipate any announcements that may be made tomorrow, but I think that my hon. Friend's constituency will be getting a birthday present.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): Why do the public think that things in the NHS are not getting any better even after the Government have been in office for two years? Many of the staff in the NHS think that things are getting worse. Is it because, for the first two years, there was no more investment than there was under the Tories? Or is it because the Government are going down the PFI route far more enthusiastically than the Tories ever did, selling off assets in the biggest privatisation in the history of the health service? In the words of the editor of this week's British Medical Journal, the Government are at risk of leaving the NHS as a rump service. Could that be the reason?

Mr. Dobson: The editor of the British Medical Journal is talking just as much claptrap as the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman should be grateful for the amount of capital that the Government have put into the services in his constituency at Guy's and St. Thomas's hospitals, where building works have already started on massive improvements in the services for the people whom he purports to represent. On top of that, we are building a new medical school.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, later today, representatives of the University Hospital Birmingham NHS trust will be talking to the Birmingham group of Labour MPs about its plans and proposals for a new hospital in the south of Birmingham? Does he agree with me that, although the staff at the Queen Elizabeth and Selly Oak hospitals provide a first-class service, all too often they work in totally unsatisfactory conditions as a result of neglect during 18 years of Tory rule? There is a serious need to improve the condition of our hospital stock in south Birmingham, so it is important that the current consultation reaches a successful conclusion as quickly as possible.

Mr. Dobson: I agree that it is a disgrace that dedicated professionals in many parts of the national health service are expected to work in deplorable conditions with unreliable equipment that no other professional group would tolerate for five minutes. These problems cannot be put right immediately, but since we got in, we have started on 17 major new hospital projects and more will be announced. We are putting billions of pounds into improving existing hospitals. This year, £350 million is already earmarked for improving equipment, because it is a disgrace that staff constantly have to use equipment that goes on the blink or breaks down because it is out of date. I am glad to say that we shall also be using more than £100 million from the national lottery to provide more reliable and up-to-date equipment for cancer diagnosis and treatment.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): In assessing the funds available for capital investment in the next three years, what account has the Secretary of State taken of revenues generated under the Road Traffic (NHS) Charges Act 1999? Is it true that not a penny has so far been handed over? If it is not true, how much has been handed over?

Mr. Dobson: First, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new job. He is the fourth shadow Secretary of State for Health that I have faced. Hereinafter we shall refer to him as Liam IV.

Pathetic sums of money were being raised under the arrangements that we inherited from the previous Tory Government. The new system has been in operation for just two months, so we have not yet received the first quarterly report on progress. As Tories ought to know by now, generally speaking, a quarter of a year involves three months.

Dental Services

6. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): If he will make a statement on the number of dental patients treated under the national health service each month. [88242]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): About 3 million people in England complete a course of dental treatment in the general dental service each month. That means that more than 3 million visit NHS dentists each month, because many will visit more than once during the month.

Helen Jackson: Is my hon. Friend aware that dental practices in some areas—such as Stocksbridge, quite a large town in my constituency—have withdrawn the facility for adults to receive NHS dental treatment, and have told them to use a private contributory scheme? A filling costs £25, and an extraction £30. People are left with the choice between doing that and paying the £3 bus fare to Sheffield to obtain NHS treatment.

Has my hon. Friend any plans to enhance the role and powers of health authorities, which are very concerned about the position, so that they can intervene and offer loyalty bonuses and other incentives to practices that continue to offer NHS treatment, and, perhaps, ensure that practices do not cause patients inconvenience of this kind?

Mr. Denham: Although the number of NHS dentists has risen, as has the number of treatments carried out under the NHS, access to NHS dentistry is unsatisfactory in some parts of the country. I am aware of the problem in Stocksbridge. The Government have introduced two measures designed to enable health authorities to cope with the difficulties. The investing in dentistry scheme, which ran until April this year, will enable an extra 650,000 patients to register for NHS dental treatment, and the personal dental services schemes—of which there are many throughout the country—provide a more flexible way of allowing access to NHS dentistry. It is important for health authorities to take full advantage of those initiatives. Sheffield made no proposals under either scheme; I do not know why, but I urge my hon. Friend to encourage her health authority to make the best possible use of the Government's mechanisms to support NHS dentistry.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Our experience in North Wiltshire is very similar to that of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson). We had three NHS dentists when the Labour party came to power; all three have since gone out of business, and Chippenham, a prosperous town with a population of 30,000, has no NHS dentists at all.

The Minister just suggested that the investing in dentistry scheme had ended in April. That contradicts a letter that I received from him recently in reply to an application by Dr. Hazlem, who is trying to set up a new practice in Chippenham. We were told very recently that that letter was being considered, and that the Government might well provide Dr. Hazlem with the IID funds that he had requested. Is the Minister now changing his mind, and has the IID scheme been run down?

Mr. Denham: The investing in dentistry scheme closed to new applications on 23 April, but a number of applications—including, I believe, that of the hon. Gentleman's constituent—are still being considered under that procedure. We are looking for the best ways to continue our support for NHS dentistry, and will publish an NHS dentistry strategy later this year.

Cancer Summit

7. Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): What progress he has made in implementing the action plan agreed at the cancer summit meeting in May. [88243]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): Work is under way to implement the action plan agreed at the Prime Minister's cancer summit in May. The Medical Research Council is bringing together major funders of cancer research to consider how research can be better co-ordinated. National standards and performance indicators are still being developed as part of the implementation of the Calman-Hine approach introduced by the previous Government. A director of the cancer action team will take up a post in July. We hope that, as a result of those measures, we shall ensure that the standards of diagnosis and treatment of cancer that currently apply in the best units apply in every part of the country.

Dr. Gibson: The cancer summit at Downing street clearly threw down the gauntlet in regard to tackling and improving our dreadful cancer statistics. The all-party group on cancer has issued five policy pledges, which I have here. Will my hon. Friend congratulate the Cancer Research Campaign, which today launched an anti-tobacco research and surveillance unit to chase and harry the tobacco giants as they try to flout the advertising laws? Will he ensure that no doctor has to stand in front of a patient ever again and say, "I cannot give you the drugs to cure and treat your cancer because the health authority refuses to pay for them"?

Mr. Dobson: I generally welcome the actions of the Cancer Research Campaign—even, occasionally, when it asks for more money. I certainly welcome what it is doing in relation to tobacco. Every year, the tobacco industry has to recruit 120,000 people to make up for the 120,000 who are killed by following the makers' instructions on the packets in which the tobacco companies sell the cigarettes. They usually target that effort at children because most people start smoking when they are children. Anything that we can do to counter what they have been doing is to be welcomed. There is clear evidence that, almost 20 years ago, they were looking at ways of countering the possibility that tobacco advertising might be banned.

Tobacco advertising will be banned here from December; we will be the first in Europe to ban it, of which we are proud. [Interruption.] Whatever the mutterings from the Conservative party, we were glad that we stopped being part of the group that obstructed the introduction of an anti-tobacco advertising directive throughout Europe. We are glad that we have led the way in banning tobacco advertising, because tobacco smoking is the principal cause of the inequalities in health among adults in this country. Seventy per cent. of the deaths of working-class people, over and above what one would expect among middle-class people, are the result of smoking.

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): Is the Secretary of State's pledge to introduce a maximum two-week waiting time for breast cancer treatment due to be met on schedule? What representations has he received regarding the clinical necessity of such a policy?

Mr. Dobson: I do not yet have the reports, but, so far as I know, we expect the target to be met in most places; I hope that it will be met in all places. Some clinicians have doubts about the target, but others have welcomed it. We believe that it is right and proper to set those targets, particularly because women are naturally extremely perturbed if they are referred by their general practitioner for urgent examination and diagnosis by a cancer specialist when it is suspected that they may have breast cancer. We were advised by the then chief medical officer that a two-week target was reasonable.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend again on his wisdom and intelligence in selecting the breast cancer service that is based at Royal Lancaster infirmary to be a national health service beacon? May I assure him that his judgment is sound? It is an excellent service. It will go from strength to strength, given the confidence that he and his Department have shown in it.

Mr. Dobson: I always welcome the odd compliment, as we get so much abuse—although, on reflection, I have concluded that we get far more abuse in the newspapers than we ever do in the House of Commons. As my hon. Friend knows, I was pleased to be at the new unit in Lancaster, where there was a good partnership between the clinicians, other people from the NHS, social services and the Macmillan organisation to provide a better service, which backs up the extended service that is available nearby in Preston.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): As vice-chairman of the all-party group on cancer, may I reassure the Secretary of State that none of the five sensible pledges for the comprehensive cancer strategy is described as an early pledge so Liberal Democrats hope that they be may implemented. But how can the Secretary of State implement any strategy on cancer without considering staffing? Is he aware that any expansion in the breast screening programme may be held up by a shortage of qualified radiologists, who are terrified to enter a sector where they are liable to be condemned by Ministers for errors in the service? Up to half of cytology screening units have lost their quality accreditation and his Department is still sending out redundancy notices to qualified, ready-to-be-consultant gynaecologists, when women are dying as a result of inadequate gynaecological cancer services.

Mr. Dobson: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a doctor, but I noticed a quick shift in his question from radiology to obstetrics and gynaecology. Certainly I am very well aware that we do not have sufficient radiologists to do the work that we should all like to be done. [Interruption.] I cannot imagine why any Tory Member is yakking about that. When they were in office, not enough radiologists were taken on, trained and subsequently made consultants. We want not only to try to make maximum use of the radiologists available but to recruit and train more radiologists as soon as possible. As I said, in some cases, we want to use lottery money—in other cases, just plain NHS money—to improve diagnostic equipment and make it more reliable. That would be good for patients and staff.

The hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that all the cancer screening incidents in which things have gone wrong have not in any way been the responsibility of some of the individuals concerned. However, even some doctors have to take responsibility in those circumstances. If the independent panels that have been established to look into those matters criticise the doctors involved, I think that I am entitled to endorse that criticism.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): The gimmickry of the Prime Minister's cancer summit brings no comfort to cancer sufferers denied access to modern cancer drugs such as Taxol and Tamoxifen. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that, as a result of the work of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, further rationing of those drugs is prevented?

Mr. Dobson: I welcome the hon. Lady to her job. If she had asked anyone who attended the Prime Minister's cancer summit, she would know that none of them thought that it was a gimmick, and that, afterwards, they all praised it. I would rather take my cue from them than from the Tory party. I confirm that Taxol is likely to be one of the highest-priority drugs for consideration by NICE. If the institute advises that it should be rolled out across the country, rolled out it will be.

Teenage Pregnancy

8. Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes): If he will make a statement on the level of teenage conception and pregnancy in the South Humber health authority area. [88244]

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): In 1997, the conception rate for under-20s in South Humber health authority area was 81 per 1,000, compared with an average for England of 61.9 per 1,000. South Humber has already identified prevention of teenage pregnancy as a local priority.

Shona McIsaac: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply, and warmly welcome the Government's recent initiatives on tackling teenage pregnancy. However, does she acknowledge that emergency contraception plays a vital role in tackling unwanted pregnancy and in reducing abortion rates among young women? To that end, will she seriously consider making emergency contraception more widely available—as has been called for by Cosmopolitan magazine and the British Pregnancy Advisory Service? The harsh reality is that, for young women who have unprotected sex on a Friday or Saturday night, it is nigh on impossible to get to their doctor within 72 hours to get that prescription.

Ms Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for her question, and her praise of the social exclusion unit's action plan to tackle teenage pregnancy. For a combination of reasons—such as low expectations, ignorance and the mixed messages on sex sent to our young people—the United Kingdom has Europe's highest teenage pregnancy rate. My hon. Friend is absolutely right that one reason why our teenage pregnancy rate is so high is the low rate of contraception use compared with that in other European countries. About 50 per cent. of young people use contraception the first time that they have sex. One of the intentions of the social exclusion unit action plan will be to ensure better access to contraception and to counselling about contraception, including emergency contraception.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Does the Minister consider that the best treatment for the condition to which the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) has drawn attention is education and self-discipline, or does she consider that it might be treated by adding something to the water in south Humber? If she favours the former, why does her Department retain a fondness for adding something to the water to treat other conditions?

Ms Jowell: The hon. Gentleman's comments explain why the rate of teenage pregnancy under the Conservatives remained high—they believed that it had something to do with the water.

Bowel Cancer

9. Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): What investment his Department is making in services to combat bowel cancer. [88245]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): To help prevent bowel cancer, £750,000 has been made available this year for pilot studies relating to diet and colorectal cancer and £1.5 million per annum over three years is funding colorectal cancer screening pilots. Since 1998, an additional £20 million has been invested in additional work force, equipment and audit processes to speed access to diagnosis and treatment of colorectal cancer and to reduce waiting times.

Dr. Naysmith: May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the Bristol beating bowel cancer campaign, launched earlier this year? It has two main aims: first, to raise £1.5 million for research into bowel cancer, some of which will be spent at the world-class laboratories at Bristol university headed by Professor Chris Paraskeva; and secondly, and perhaps more important, to raise the awareness of bowel cancer among the general population.

Bowel cancer is one of those cancers that is susceptible to treatment if caught early. May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention also to the fact that recent research suggests that, following treatment, the outcome can depend heavily on the affluence or poverty of the groups from which patients are drawn? Will he assure me that he will supply the resources and has a strategy to deal with that problem?

Mr. Dobson: I welcome the activities of the BBBC campaign in Bristol, which is obviously doing good work and is exactly the sort of thing that we want to encourage. It sounds to me that it makes better use of its money than the BBC. The statement I shall make a little later today will emphasise the extent to which we want cancer to be combated by early identification and early treatment, particularly those cancers where early treatment means that people can recover entirely. That is very much to be welcomed, and I will do my best to sustain such initiatives.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that irritable bowel syndrome in children is a serious problem? What resources are the Government devoting to that? Does he agree that one method of combating bowel complaints is a restrictive diet? Are the Government looking at ways in which such diets can be employed to reduce the incidence of conditions such as irritable bowel syndrome?

Mr. Dobson: I try to be honest, and I do not know the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question about what the Government are doing about irritable bowel syndrome in children. I shall write to him as soon as I find out. Diet has a major impact on that complaint and on all sorts of bowel conditions, including cancer.

Clinical Treatment

10. Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): What steps he is taking to achieve greater geographic evenness of clinical treatment in the health service. [88246]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): We have introduced a number of measures to avoid the problem of the postcode providing unequal access to treatment in the NHS, which we inherited from the previous Government. One major development is the establishment of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, which seemed to be endorsed for the first time by those on the Tory Front Bench today. It is there to provide guidance to doctors in every part of the country on the latest drugs and treatments.

Mr. Boswell: I am sure that the Secretary of State would allow a measure of autonomy to local health authorities and primary care groups in setting their local strategies and that it would be most inappropriate if he, as a politician, were to tell doctors what to do or what to prescribe. Would he nevertheless concede that, especially in relation to complex or expensive treatments, such as the prescription of beta interferon for multiple sclerosis, we really cannot accept for a moment longer than is necessary the continuing tyranny of prescription by postcode, and that people expect not merely more words about that but some effective action, whether from NICE or from himself, to ensure that it is ended as soon as possible?

Mr. Dobson: We will shortly hold consultations about the use of beta interferon, which will ultimately be considered by NICE, but, in fairness even to the previous Government, there are disputes in some parts of the country between clinicians about the appropriateness of the use of beta interferon and I do not want to poke my nose in if I can possibly avoid it.

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that one of the most effective ways of ensuring the even geographic spread of services is to ensure that resources are spread equally around the country. Is he aware that Leicestershire health authority is still below its weighted capitation fee, and will he ensure that, over the coming years, as the new money feeds into the national health service, Leicestershire makes up the gap between the 97 per cent. that it currently receives and the 100 per cent. that we believe it deserves?

Mr. Dobson: It is our intention to move all authorities near to their established norm, and that will certainly apply in Leicestershire as well as everywhere else.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The Secretary of State is to be congratulated on the moves to spread excellence around, but does he agree that treatment cannot be given if there is still ambiguity about diagnosis? Is it not time to concentrate more on the treatment of ME or chronic fatigue syndrome, which medical people in some parts of the country deny is a disease?

Mr. Dobson: This is one of those difficult matters on which there are almost savage disagreements between medical professionals not only about the possible treatment of the condition but about whether it even exists. Once again, that is best resolved by the people who at least in theory know what they are talking about, although if there are two diametrically opposed sides, one of them must be wrong. It is better for them to try to thrash these things out than for me to try to lay down the law. Secretaries of State should keep their powder dry and interfere over the availability of particular drugs only in extreme circumstances.

Testicular Cancer

11. Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): What measures he is taking to encourage men to examine themselves to assist early diagnosis of testicular cancer; and if he will make a statement. [88248]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): The Government are committed to improving cancer services and we fund a number of publications emphasising the importance of a healthy life style, and giving advice on recognition of symptoms of illness, including testicular cancer. The NHS home health care guide, published in 1998, encourages men to be aware of any unusual changes and to discuss them with their doctors at an early stage. From 2000, all those with suspected cancer will be able to see a specialist within two weeks of their GP requesting an urgent appointment. Referral guidelines to help GPs to identify early symptoms of cancer are being developed to assist in the early diagnosis of all cancers.

Jane Griffiths: Does my hon. Friend agree that the lives of many women have been saved by their having been encouraged over the years to do breast self-examination and that, because the lives of men with testicular cancer—the incidence of which is doubling every 20 years—can also be saved if the diagnosis is early, men should be encouraged to examine themselves without embarrassment?

Mr. Hutton: I strongly agree. My hon. Friend will probably be aware that many of our leaflets have been focused on younger men and that testicular cancer is the commonest cancer in men aged between 20 and 34, with about 1,000 new cases being registered each year. I am sure that she will agree that the consensus is that promoting testicular awareness is the most effective way of tackling the problem.

NHS Dentistry

13. Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): What initiatives his Department is pursuing to increase the availability of NHS dentistry. [88250]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): We have already taken action to improve the availability of NHS dentistry through the investing in dentistry and the personal dental services initiatives. We are currently considering options about how best to use available resources in the future to improve the availability of NHS dentistry further. As I said earlier, we shall publish a dental strategy later this year.

Charlotte Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware that, when the Labour Government came to power, no NHS dentist in my constituency was accepting new NHS patients? Since then, new NHS dental practices have opened in Leek and Werrington, but more must be done if we are to safeguard the dental health of our population. I welcome the initiative on an NHS dental strategy, but will my hon. Friend assure me that new and innovative ways will be studied to spread access to NHS dentistry not only to inner-city areas but to rural constituencies such as mine?

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend is right. In north Staffordshire, eight investing in dentistry bids have been approved since the Government came to power, of which my hon. Friend mentioned two. They should give a further 23,000 patients in the area the opportunity to access NHS dental care.

My hon. Friend is also right to say that, in developing the dental strategy, we shall need to study a range of mechanisms to ensure that people can access NHS dentistry. I agree with my hon. Friend that the problem is not always greatest in inner-city areas, where the task will be to persuade more of the population to register with the dentists who are available. We will need to come up with proposals that fit a wide variety of circumstances across the country.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am sure that the Minister will know that there has been a large drop in the number of people registered with NHS dentists since the Government came to power. A dental strategy must be based on people having regular check-ups, which people are not having because they are not registered with NHS dentists. What is the Minister going to do about that?

Mr. Denham: There was a drop in the number of registrations because the registration period was shortened. The people who did not re-register were those who did not visit their dentists regularly in that period. As I said earlier, the number of NHS dentists is greater than two years ago, as is the number of treatments carried out under NHS dentistry. However, we are not complacent: as I have acknowledged several times this afternoon, access to NHS dentistry is unacceptably difficult in some parts of the country. We have taken many more measures to tackle that problem than the previous Government, but I am sure that we shall need to do more.

GP Funding

14. Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): What plans he has to review the funding arrangements for GPs; and if he will make a statement. [88251]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): We have established the equity in primary care working group, whose membership includes representatives from the general practices committee of the British Medical Association, health authorities, the medical practices committee and the NHS executive. Its task is to consider the equitable distribution of work force and resources in general practice. I expect to receive its recommendations shortly.

Mr. Mullin: In so far as I understand the funding arrangements for GPs, they are ring-fenced and cannot be used to employ GPs on a salaried basis, for example. One effect of that is that places such as Sunderland—which has difficulty attracting its full quota of GPs—effectively subsidise places such as Buckinghamshire. Does my hon. Friend consider that to be satisfactory? If not, will something be done about it?

Mr. Denham: I personally have nothing at all against Buckinghamshire, but my hon. Friend raises an important point. It is not possible simply to take money notionally allocated to pay a GP under the general medical services budget and reallocate it to a different use. However, health authorities can use the personal medical pilot scheme to create positions for salaried doctors, as well as to vary, by agreement, the contractual arrangements with GPs. I know that Sunderland is keen to use that mechanism to deal with the shortage of GPs.

It is also worth stating that recruitment difficulties are not the only problem, including in Sunderland. Some GPs with large lists are reluctant to advertise for partners, for example. We need to address a range of matters with health authorities if we are to tackle the problems that my hon. Friend raises.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): Might not the Minister also have referred to low rates of recruitment into general practice from among medical students? Is he satisfied with the number who go on to train as GPs, and if he is not, what will he do about it?

Mr. Denham: I am pleased that the latest national GP recruitment figures are encouraging. A 7.7 per cent. increase in GP registrars shows that many medical students see general practice as an important and fulfilling career. We shall train more medical students, and we announced nearly 800 additional places last week. I am confident that many students will go into general practice as they see our reforms putting GPs and nurses in the driving seat in the new NHS.

Private Health Care

15. Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): What plans he has to introduce new regulations covering private health care. [88252]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): On 15 June we published a consultation document, "Regulating Private and Voluntary Healthcare", in which we have proposed a new body with tough powers to regulate private hospitals and to replace the archaic system that currently treats private hospitals as nursing homes.

Miss Johnson: I welcome my right hon. Friend's reply and the consultation, which builds on work done by people such as my constituent Caroline Buckley, who lost her mother tragically under private health care, and the many bereaved and troubled relatives concerned by the state of the private health care industry. Who does my right hon. Friend believe should foot the bill for the regulation of private health care? Should it be the NHS, as the Opposition believe, or should the industry foot the bill itself?

Mr. Dobson: We propose that the private health care industry should pay the costs of its regulation, and I can safely say that we have the Treasury's wholehearted support.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Will the Secretary of State consider my eight-year-old constituent, Laura Giddings, who lost her leg in the Planet Hollywood explosion and who, as I have said before, has been forced to turn to the private sector to obtain a suitable artificial limb? In drawing up new regulations for the private sector, will he consider applying to artificial limbs the criteria applied to wheelchairs so that someone who has to go to the private sector for a suitable appliance will receive the money that would have been spent on a less suitable appliance by the NHS?

Mr. Dobson: I express sympathy for the little girl and her family. The family have met my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health, and I am prepared to consider any arrangement that would facilitate the little girl's being able to get about as well as humanity can manage now that inhumanity has deprived her of her leg.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Has my right hon. Friend been able to study the work of Dr. John Yates at Birmingham university, which proves that areas of the country with the highest number of private beds also seem to have the longest NHS waiting lists? Has he had a chance to consider that matter, and if so, what action are the Government taking?

Mr. Dobson: Yes, I have and the Select Committee on Health, which is chaired by my hon. Friend, is studying that and other matters related to the regulation of the private sector. I look forward to receiving its report and considering it along with the other representations that we receive in response to our consultation document.

Alzheimer's Disease

16. Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): What assessment he has made of the impact of the closure of Burford hospital on the treatment of Alzheimer's disease in west Oxfordshire. [88253]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State instructed officials at the south-east regional office of the NHS executive to facilitate further discussions about the proposals to reconfigure community services in Oxfordshire. While no decisions have yet been taken, should the Secretary of State decide to support the health authority's decision on the reconfiguration, the authority is committed to consider the relocation of the specialist Alzheimer's disease service that is provided at Burford community hospital.

Mr. Woodward: The Minister will be aware that this is national Alzheimer's awareness week. He will also be aware that the Secretary of State has now had nearly an entire year to consider the future of Burford community hospital. The Royal College of Nursing report on Alzheimer's found that the Burford unit was top of 75 units throughout the country in the pioneering work that it did. The report went on to say that if we are to take Alzheimer's work seriously,

"it is vital that the parent service continues at its present location."

Will the Minister take that report seriously and will he finally make a decision about Burford and allow my 750 constituents who rely on the facilities of that hospital to know that they have a secure future?

Mr. Hutton: I reassure the hon. Gentleman that we certainly take Alzheimer's disease seriously. In fact, as he will be aware, the publication of the national carers' strategy, which will help significantly the carers of people with the disease, has been widely welcomed. He will also probably be aware that, next year, the new national service framework for the NHS will be for older people. We are looking within the context of that framework to define new service models and national standards for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease. I am sure that he will welcome that.

I am afraid that I am unable to give the hon. Gentleman any of the assurances that he is seeking about the future of the hospital in his constituency. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is still considering those proposals in great detail, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman would want him to do. A decision will be made as soon as possible.

Public Health

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): The new White Paper which I am presenting to the House today is called "Saving Lives: Our Healthier Nation", and that is exactly what it is about. It spells out how we want to save lives by stopping people becoming ill in the first place.

We aim to save 300,000 lives by 2010 by reducing the death rate from cancer in people under 75 by at least one fifth; by reducing the death rate from coronary heart disease and stroke in people under 75 by at least two fifths; by reducing the death rate from accidents by one fifth; and by reducing the death rate from suicide by one fifth. Those are ambitious targets, which should mean that we become a healthier nation. They are bigger reductions than we suggested in the Green Paper—and unlike the Green Paper, those tough targets now apply not only to people under 65, but to people under 75.

Those targets are backed by action. On cancer, it is action against smoking, action to improve diet, action to improve screening uptake and quality, action to modernise cancer scanners and equipment, and action to improve treatment. On heart disease and strokes, again there will be action on smoking and diet and also action on blood pressure and exercise, action to cut heart attacks and action to improve rehabilitation.

However, that is only part of the story. We are not only setting tougher targets than the previous Government: we are explicitly aiming to do something quite different. Poor people are ill more often and die sooner, so we are going to tackle the inequalities in health, which grew under the previous Government.

Our policies are designed to improve most of all the health of the least healthy. The national health service has a big part to play, but our strategy requires a three-way partnership between the whole Government, local communities, families and individuals. None can succeed without the others. We reject the idea that individuals are powerless victims of their fate, but we also reject the Tory idea that individuals are entirely to blame for their own poor health.

We need to use all the means at our disposal to make it possible for everyone to lead a healthier life. Unemployment, low wages, poor housing, crime and disorder, lack of education, and environmental pollution all make people ill. The Government are taking action to tackle them. The windfall levy, opposed by both the Tories and the Liberal Democrats, provides jobs and training for young people; and 400,000 more people are now in work than when we were elected. Low pay is a health hazard, so we shall improve the health of more than 2 million people and their families through our introduction of a national minimum wage. This autumn, those families and many others will be further helped by the working families tax credit. Many thousands more will benefit from having a decent home to live in as a result of our increased investment in new and better homes for people who are badly housed at present. Improved educational standards are providing economic opportunity and pathways out of social exclusion.

The Government will play their part, but so too must communities. In some areas, whole neighbourhoods are unhealthy because of poverty, pollution, crime and disorder. We must target effort on those neighbourhoods. The most deprived areas are being helped by the extra effort and extra funding that flows from regeneration schemes, from health and education action zones, from lottery funds going into healthy living centres, from the replacement of substandard general practitioner premises, from the sure start programme for children, from the healthy schools project, and from our £96 million public health development fund.

We want to work with community organisations, local councils and health bodies to ensure that those programmes are delivered on the ground. Every health authority will have to draw up and implement a health improvement programme that identifies and meets the particular health and health care needs of its area. That is because priorities differ in different parts of the country, with different individuals and groups having different problems—for example, respiratory disease in areas of heavy industry, or formerly of heavy industry, or the higher incidence of heart disease or cancer among certain ethnic groups. Local councils, businesses and voluntary organisations will all be involved in developing and implementing those plans.

Fluoridation illustrates the new approach. The White Paper makes it clear that we will conduct an independent expert review of the safety and benefits of fluoridation. If that shows that fluoridation is beneficial, local authorities will be given new powers to require water companies to fluoridate where there is local support for doing so.

We also propose to strengthen the public health professions and to develop extended roles for health visitors, community and school nurses, and midwives. The new primary care groups will enable GPs and practice nurses to draw upon their unique relationship with patients to help to promote better health. Many of the groups are already doing that.

We want action by Government and action by communities, but that cannot be the end of the story. Individuals and families must play their part—for example, on smoking, which is the biggest single cause of avoidable death and of inequalities in health in this country. We have a twin-track strategy to stop the tobacco companies recruiting new smokers and to help existing smokers to give up the habit. Unlike the Tories, we accept the overwhelming evidence that tobacco advertising helps to get children addicted, so the Government intend to play their part by banning advertising from December. However, we also accept that individuals need help to give up smoking, which is why we are making free nicotine replacement therapy available to poor smokers who want to give up.

That is a recognition of the fact that up to now most health promotion strategies have actually widened the health gap, because the better-off have taken more notice than the worst-off. We need to develop strategies that have the most impact on the least healthy. That is one reason why the White Paper announces our decision to replace the Health Education Authority with a new hard-hitting Health Development Agency, with a much bigger role in working out and delivering the approaches that will work best.

Individuals and families can help one another. That is why we are launching a health skills programme that will give young people first-aid skills and health information; that is why we are launching our expert patients programme to help people with chronic diseases such as asthma and diabetes better to manage their conditions. That will be good for the NHS and good for patients, as fewer complications mean better health and less demand on GPs and hospitals, with resources used to tackle the highest priorities.

The White Paper sets out long-term plans for improving the health of the nation and reducing inequalities in health. They really are long-term plans: their full benefits will show up only in a decade or more. That is the time scale involved, but it is no reason for delay. It is all the more reason for getting on with it: 300,000 lives saved, 300,000 reasons for action.

Fifty-one years ago this week, the national health service, which Nye Bevan founded, came into operation. We all benefit from the far-sightedness of that Labour Government, whose action cut inequalities in access to health care. By itself, that action could not reduce inequalities in health, but common justice requires that we do so.

Conservative Members who represent areas where people are comfortably off and pretty healthy should recognise that ours is a simple but difficult aim. We want to help to make sure that the standard of health of the people they represent in Surrey or Sutton Coldfield is shared by the people we represent in Barnsley or Bethnal Green. That is what we mean when we say that we want to end the divisions that mar our society and instead create a genuine one nation. I believe that that is what all decent people want, wherever they live and whatever their own state of health. That is why I commend the White Paper to the House.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Usually, farewell performances get a better cheer than that. The Opposition would welcome any genuine measures to improve the health of the people of the United Kingdom, but we deserved better than the right hon. Gentleman's remarks.

There are some aspects of the White Paper that we welcome. Since the publication of the Green Paper, the Secretary of State has changed the targets, but I am sorry that he has not widened them. For example, the expert patients programme he outlined for asthma and diabetes is welcome, but it is not a substitute for targets, which we wanted. Of course we need to send positive health messages to the population—lose weight, eat sensibly, exercise more and, as it says in "Ten Tips For Better Health":

"Manage stress by . . . talking things through . . . Practise safer sex"

and

"follow the Highway Code."

Those are important messages for the public, but the White Paper is heavy on gimmicks and short on substance.

Let me give one example. The section on defibrillators says:

"members of the public can use them as soon as it is clear that they are needed" in, for example, supermarkets, railway stations and airports. How are members of the public to know when a defibrillator is needed? How will they be trained? What will any indemnity consist of—will the Government provide blanket indemnity? If the Government are truly concerned, it would be better to spend the money on improving ambulance response times.

If, as the Secretary of State said, cancer scanners are to be modernised, are more staff to be recruited to operate them and interpret the results? There is currently a shortage of both radiographers and radiologists. At a time when fully trained obstetricians and gynaecologists are being laid off, how does that give comfort to women suffering from cervical or uterine cancer? The reality does not match the rhetoric. If exercise is to be encouraged, why has sport been removed from the national curriculum for primary schools? Does the right hon. Gentleman genuinely believe that suicide rates are the best way to measure the prevalence of mental illness, and on what basis has he arrived at that judgment?

If the White Paper is big on rhetoric, it is short on facing up to the big issues. The new approach was well illustrated by the Secretary of State's remarks about fluoridation: if it is shown that fluoridation is beneficial and there is local support for it, local authorities will be given powers in that respect—but only after there has been an independent expert review. Information on fluoridation is pouring out of the Department of Health, but the Government refuse to make a decision because somebody, somewhere, might not like it. That is a cowardly and pathetic approach to public health.

Rather offensively, the Secretary of State suggested that the Conservatives had said that individuals were responsible for their own ill-health. No Conservative Member has ever suggested such a thing. However, the Government cannot solve all the nation's health problems; the right hon. Gentleman was correct to say that there must be a partnership. He said that there must be a three-way partnership between the whole of Government, local communities, families and individuals—four parties, not three. There was no mention of the medical profession, which seemed to be noticeably lacking from what he had to say—perhaps because he has alienated almost all its members in recent times.

Perhaps the worst part of the statement came at the end, with the Secretary of State's class warfare rhetoric. As a result of Conservative economic policies and his party's very large majority, many of his Back Benchers represent the constituencies that he says are very affluent and therefore need less money. His ugly soundbites will offend many inside and outside both the House and the medical profession, as well as the natural decency of many people who care about those less fortunate than themselves. Is he saying that there is massive inequality in the allocation of money in the health service on a geographical basis? Will there be a transfer of resources from the Prime Minister's beloved middle England, or is the rhetoric merely aimed at those voting for a London mayor?

Despite laudable aims, better health can be achieved only with a health care system that is working well. Faced with a system in which morale is at an all-time low, junior doctors are being betrayed. complaints against the NHS are up and patients are waiting to go on waiting lists, we have heard nothing but complacency. Health is getting worse under Labour. Although the Secretary of State is excelling at soundbites and photo opportunities, he has failed in his primary duty to put patients before his party politics.

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman speaks a little quicker than his predecessor, but he does not talk much more sense. The first target of his mockery was the Government's chief medical officer. I would rather stick by that distinguished doctor more than the one who has just been speaking.

In talking about people dying, the hon. Gentleman apparently upbraided me for choosing the measure of suicides. As a doctor, he ought to know that, if suicides are successful, they involve people dying. If we can reduce the number of suicides, we will reduce the number of deaths. That seems to be a reasonable proposition.

The hon. Gentleman complained that we are not getting on with fluoridation. My understanding is that the data at present available in the Department of Health are rather out of date. We want an up-to-date assessment. I have never for one minute made any secret of my view that fluoridation works and should be introduced, but in fairness to those who have what they see as legitimate doubts, it is only right and proper that we have an independent review in which people may put their point of view and we may come to sensible conclusions.

On the rest of it, it was very interesting that the hon. Gentleman never seemed to recognise that ill health is caused by unemployment, poverty, low pay, crime and disorder—that soared under the Conservative party—or poor housing. We are addressing all those matters. We are improving the NHS so that it can make a bigger and better contribution. The point that I was trying to make was that all the Government and all the country must be involved.

If the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is class war for me to suggest that I would like the people whom I represent to be as healthy as those in the constituencies of my Tory predecessors, he believes in a strange version of class war. Most decent people in his constituency, or in the Surrey constituency of one of my predecessors, would probably agree that it is a good idea for us all to be as healthy as one another, and to achieve that by raising, not lowering, standards.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Does he agree that for the previous Administration, public health was politically inconvenient—for the reasons that he has set out—and that as a consequence they sidelined, for example, the crucial Black report, on which we should have acted in the early 1980s and which would have delivered so much in public health to the generations who are being born today? Did they not also sideline the public health function?

I want to pick up one point on which my right hon. Friend knows I feel strongly. One thing lacking from what he said today is the restoration of the public health function to the political mainstream in local government, where it used to be, alongside housing, social services, education and environmental health. Will he consider that point, which is crucial to achieving the objectives that he has rightly set out today?

Mr. Dobson: I agree with my hon. Friend's point about the previous Government refusing to address health inequalities. Not only that—they banned the use of those words in the Department of Health, so that officials were forced to refer to variations in health because the Conservatives practised inequality but were not willing to preach it.

We appointed Sir Donald Acheson, who had been one of the previous Government's chief medical officers, to produce a report. His excellent report on various sources of inequality in health put forward many sensible propositions on how we should go about reducing those inequalities, and I am glad to say that we are getting on with that.

As my hon. Friend knows, I sympathise with his view about the disappearance of the post of medical officer of health from local government—but when we consulted, in opposition, on whether that post should be restored, local government had little enthusiasm for the idea. That is one of the reasons why we placed in the Health Act 1999 a duty on health authorities to draw up a health improvement programme to identify the health care needs of their areas. That must be done through co-operation and consultation with local government and voluntary organisations. I hope that the report and that approach will eventually have the status that the chief medical officer's report had in times gone by.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): We very much welcome the White Paper as far as it goes, but why is it much more timid than it was originally billed to be? Are the Government yet committed to putting more resources from our national wealth into national health? Are they committed to putting more resources into public health, or will those resources come from the money allocated to the NHS? What indication is there that there will be, for example, a great programme to make sure that people do not live in badly insulated, damp flats and that local government has the money to deal with that?

Why were there 21 targets under the previous Government, but only four targets now? Why is there no target to reduce smoking? Why is there no target to reduce traffic? Above all, why is there no target to reduce health inequality, which is meant to be at the centre of the whole policy?

Will all Government policies be audited? If so, will we be given a guarantee that there will not, for example, be policies to take away benefits from single mothers, to reduce help to asylum seekers or to prevent pensions from increasing in line with national wealth, none of which can be great for health equalisation?

Did I understand the Secretary of State to say that the Health Education Authority—the one body that might be able to stand up and speak independently about what the Government are or are not doing—is to go? We want a body that can tell the Government when they are not meeting their targets and hold the Government to account. If the Government are tough on themselves, they might deliver; but if they are weak on themselves, they will let the rest of us down.

Mr. Dobson: It sticks in the gullet to listen to a Liberal Democrat say that the Government are not putting money into measures that combat ill-health, when his party voted against imposing the windfall levy on the fat-cat utilities. That money has been invested in providing jobs and training for young people—and as the hon. Gentleman should know, the only group whose mortality and morbidity figures were increasing was young, unemployed men. We are reducing those figures, and we are doing so with money that the hon. Gentleman did not want to collect, so he cannot complain about the way in which we are spending it.

We are putting £96 million into the public health development fund.

Mr. Hughes: Is it new money?

Mr. Dobson: It is new money. It is money that was not previously intended for that purpose, so it must be new. We are putting £5 billion into building new houses and improving old houses. Much of that money is intended to make sure that houses are well insulated, and it will concentrated on families who are poor and old people who are poor. That is more money that we are spending.

Mr. Hughes: Is it new money?

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman talks about new money as though there were something different about it. It is money. It gets houses built and improved; it gets jobs for young people; and it gets all sorts of other improvements.

When talking about health, we must remember that the Tories wanted to spend only £500 million a year extra. We want to reduce inequalities, but it is sensible to measure them in particular localities. It is necessary to be a statistical freak to obtain any significant run of figures about reducing health inequalities in less than about a decade.

The hon. Gentleman should know, having burbled on about pensions, that they have increased faster than wage inflation.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): My right hon. Friend's statement will be welcomed by right hon. and hon. Members and by many of those who have worked in the medical profession for many years. Does he agree that the rant about the national health service from the Opposition Front Bench shows little understanding of public health? If economic and social environments lead to ill-health in certain regions and if getting rid of it is a war, it is a war that should have been fought many years ago.

Mr. Dobson: When it comes to fighting a war against poverty or one against ill health among the poor, the Tory party would only qualify for white feathers.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): Is it not extraordinary that the Health Secretary can come to the House to make a statement about his future policy towards public health and spare virtually not a word for the future of the medical profession? Rather than inventing entirely spurious party political differences between the Labour party and the Tory party, should he not have devoted himself more seriously to his statutory responsibilities for the national health service on the day after Dr. Bogle accused the Government of achieving total alienation from the medical profession? Does the right hon. Gentleman remember the speeches that he used to make in opposition about how morale in the health service had reached an all-time low? That is what he and his hon. Friends used to say. Has he not used his two years in the Department of Health to prove himself wrong?

Mr. Dobson: No.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is my right hon. Friend aware that we have just about got rid of the two years of Tory spending plans, albeit that he secured a little extra money for health? We are now moving into an era where my right hon. Friend will be able to spend £21 billion over the next three years, which is about 10 times as much as the Liberals wanted and more than twice what the Tories wanted. Does he accept my opinion that he must ensure that not a penny of that money is wasted? Come the general election, when some people will be prattling on about the euro and all that crap, we should be talking about saving people's lives.

Mr. Dobson: I say to my good and hon. Friend that I hope that by the time of the next general election there will be some signs of improvement in people's health. However, we can only measure those signs locally, not nationally.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): The right hon. Gentleman will know that I applaud the strategy, unpopular as it often is, and difficult as it is to win battles with colleagues in delivering it. However, I ask him to look again at some of his comments. Why did his party vote against the new GP contract? It provided bonus pay for GPs in deprived areas; it paid them for the first time to screen new patients; and it gave them additional resources for hitting targets on immunisation and cancer screening. There are few practical steps that could do more to raise standards in poor areas.

Secondly, I applaud the reappearance of mental health as a target, but regret that a more sophisticated target has not been found than suicide figures. Will the right hon. Gentleman examine the effect of NHS Direct, which is starving of resources Samaritans and Saneline, which offer a practical service for people with mental health problems?

Finally, is it the right hon. Gentleman's policy to make the sick healthy by making the healthy sick? Mr. Roger Humphreys was admitted to the Royal Surrey hospital at 2.30 on Sunday. He was not found a bed on the ward until Monday night. He is 90, and he happens to live in a healthy area. People in that area feel that the Government's policy is to starve them of resources.

Mr. Dobson: We are not starving any area of resources.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Yes, you are.

Mr. Dobson: The craw can wait. Every part of the country is getting more money in real terms this year than last year, and that is an increase by anyone's standards.

I congratulate the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) on some of the things that she did when she was Secretary of State, but not all that many. We are devoting more resources to mental health now than have ever been devoted in the past, and we are paying great attention to that aspect. It is fairly significant that of the Nye Bevan awards that were awarded yesterday, three were for mental health projects. The overall winner—the Nye of Nyes—was also for a mental health project, because we believe that in the past mental health has not had the attention that it deserves.

It is rather foolish of the right hon. Lady to start attacking NHS Direct, which is a good service. It has worked well. When I announced its extension, it was welcomed from the Tory Front Bench, which is a fairly novel experience for me, at least. NHS Direct provides a first-class service and offers help to people with physical and mental health problems. It is not draining resources from anyone. It is providing a 24-hour nurse-led service in 40 per cent. of the country now; it will cover 60 per cent. of the country by December; and it will probably cover the whole country by this time next year. When an independent survey of satisfaction was carried out, 97 per cent. of the people contacted were satisfied.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Rothwell): How will my right hon. Friend judge public opinion on fluoridation in a particular area? My family, who were brought up in New York, still benefit from the fluoridated water that they used there. I hope that we will introduce fluoridation and give the right instructions.

Mr. Dobson: Our proposal, subject to the outcome of the independent review, is that the law should be changed so that local councils conduct the process of consultation, because they have a democratic legitimacy that the local health service does not have in that respect. We would then have to sort out the form that the consultation would take in order to meet the requirements, whatever they were. Once that consultation had been carried out, and if there was a local majority, the water company serving that area would be obliged to fluoridate.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I very much welcome the consultation on social inequality in the report, but I am extremely worried about the loss of the national targets. They seem to have been shoved off into some never-never land of local targets. When the Green Paper was issued, the Minister gave an undertaking that he would place the local targets, in amalgamated form, in the Library, so that we could see whether they were being met through local endeavours.

Primary care groups have been working to health improvement programmes—and no doubt setting targets—for the past two months, yet we have not seen any Government figures to indicate what targets are being set, let alone what they are trying to achieve. When will we have a statement on these matters?

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman speaks as though the "The Health of the Nation" project succeeded, but it did not. It failed. It did not make the progress that it should have done. It is our view, and that of a substantial number of people who could be described as practitioners of public health—although I accept that it is not a universal view—that it is better to have a series of local targets and to monitor progress. The health improvement programmes will include targets, they will be monitored by the NHS regions, and therefore they will be monitored nationally—

Dr. Brand: Will the targets be published?

Mr. Dobson: Yes, the targets will certainly be published. Everything is published. The health improvement programmes themselves are published and the progress reports will have to be published. That brings pressure to bear on those on whom it should be brought to bear—the local people who are supposed to be doing the job.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): My right hon. Friend said earlier that mental health is a much-neglected area of public health. Does he agree that the mental health of black and ethnic minority people is an even more neglected area, even though a disproportionate number of black people are diagnosed as schizophrenic or are in the mental health system?

For three years, successive Health Ministers have told me that the Department is collecting figures nationally. For three years, successive Health Ministers have told me that they still do not have figures that they can make publicly available. Will my right hon. Friend take steps to ensure that his Department does what it says it has been doing for the past three years—collect figures on the number of black and ethnic minority people in the mental health system so that strategies can be developed to give the whole community the service it deserves?

Mr. Dobson: As my hon. Friend knows, I am determined to make sure that every individual and group in the country receives the proper, targeted attention they deserve, but, as she knows, one of the problems is that there are disputes about whether some black people are being diagnosed in what might be described as a racist way as suffering from mental illness, or a particular form of it, when that is not the case. We are wrestling to get statistics on which we can genuinely rely, rather than publishing statistics that we believe to be unsatisfactory and possibly misleading.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Where does the thinking behind the White Paper take the Department's contribution to the debate within the Government on the future of housing benefit?

Mr. Dobson: We are involved in all debates and all discussions within Government on housing policy generally, which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. They include all aspects of housing policy, including benefits. We are involved, and we have to try to make sure that people have homes that are safe, secure and healthy at rents that they can afford.

Mr. James Wray (Glasgow, Baillieston): Does my right hon. Friend believe that including fluoridation in the White Paper will set alarm bells ringing all over the United Kingdom? Is he aware of the moral, medical and legal aspects of fluoridation? Does he know that fluoridation breaches the Medicines Act 1968, the Water Act 1945 and the Food and Drugs (Scotland) Act 1956? No one in the medical or dental professions decided that fluoridation was good for people's health; that decision was made by a researcher appointed by an aluminium smelting company, who decided that, because dumping its waste was costly and because that waste was attracted to teeth and bones, water should be fluoridated. That is why people get skeletal fluorosis, dental fluorosis and chronic fluorine poisoning.

For the past 20 years, the medical and dental professions have been divided equally on fluoridation of public water supplies. I hope that, following the independent review and in order to stop one holy war in which I shall certainly play a great part, we do not fluoridate water and do not breach the civil liberties of individual citizens of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dobson: It is certainly the case that there are divisions within the medical and other related professions over the merits or otherwise of fluoridation, but it would probably be an exaggeration to say that they are evenly divided. In so far as I have looked at the most modern evidence—one of the problems is that quite a lot of the evidence is not modern—I am reasonably convinced that the benefits exceed any risks. We should consider the health of children of poor families in Birmingham and in big cities where there is not fluoridation. There is a danger that some people may be putting their principles above a great deal of pain and unpleasantness for a large number of children.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): Where will the dividing line be between the Health Development Agency and the Food Standards Agency in matters of nutrition? What are the implications of the statement for the Government's review of local authority standard spending assessments?

Mr. Dobson: We have made it clear that the Food Standards Agency will have some responsibility for nutrition. That is also being made clear by my colleagues on the Committee considering the Bill. The primary responsibility for nutrition will remain with the Department of Health, where it properly lies, as part of our overall programme to improve public health. We did not think that it was right to separate nutrition, as some people have suggested. Quite a few people thought that the Food Standards Agency should take on a substantial part of the Department of Health's role and virtually the whole function of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and that that role should be recreated at arm's length. We did not think that that was a sensible approach.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): I welcome the White Paper. When is the review likely to be published? I invite my right hon. Friend to take this opportunity to congratulate the water companies—through Water UK—on their responsible attitude towards the discretion that was given to them under the Water (Fluoridation) Act 1985. It proved to be hopeless in practice. The water companies, the British Medical Association and the British Dental Association did not want that provision, and the Government have said that they will remove it.

Mr. Dobson: We intend to publish a report next April. I hope that it will be then, but these matters tend to drag on, as my hon. Friend knows. The water industry wants the law to be clarified. As for most organisations, a little clarity is a great help.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Given the importance of exercise to the health of the nation, what discussions prior to the publication of the White Paper did the Secretary of State have with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, with specific regard to the reduction in the time that is devoted in primary schools to physical education in general, and to the abolition of the compulsory requirement for team games to be played competitively after the age of 14? Furthermore, if the right hon. Gentleman believes in leading by example to show the importance of exercise and fitness—he appears to be shaking his head at that suggestion—will he take up my challenge to take me on at a game of better than five sets in lawn tennis on the assumption that I shall readily give him a 30:love start in every game?

Mr. Dobson: Apparently, the hon. Gentleman is so talented that, but for the fact that he was unable to find the time, he would have won the Wimbledon championship. One advantage of my girth is that no one ever accuses me of being part of the nanny state.

The Department for Culture, Media and Sport was involved in our discussions. In fact, when the hon. Gentleman complains that sport has been eliminated from schools, he is criticising the Government who eliminated it.

Mr. John Austin (Erith and Thamesmead): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), I remember the days of the old medical officer of health. I welcome the statement, which has elevated public health on the political agenda, and begins to transform a national illness service into a national health service. I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the Minister for Public Health on the attention they have paid to the problems of osteoporotic fractures and the possibility of prevention. I welcome the national guidelines.

In his statement, my right hon. Friend emphasised the importance of local decision making. What attempts will be made to ensure that those important national guidelines, which will reduce the cost to the Exchequer and to the health service, as well as the cost in human suffering, are implemented locally? On his commitment to action and his reference to smoking, given that most Departments, local authorities and private employers have policies on smoking in the workplace, when will the House be dragged not into the second half of the 20th century, but into the new millennium?

Mr. Dobson: The House of Commons Commission and the House itself are responsible for what happens here, so I am cleared of all responsibility. Like everyone else, I just have my one vote.

As I said earlier, I have some sympathy with the view that it was a sad change when the role of the medical officer of health disappeared from local government, and the task was taken on by people in the third and fourth tiers of a health authority as a part-time job, when they could get around to it. By changing the law in the Health Act 1999, we have made the production and implementation of a health improvement programme part of the core of the national health service. I hope that that will elevate the function in a way in which it has not been elevated for a long time.

I pay tribute to the National Osteoporosis Society for the developments to which my hon. Friend referred.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his statement was a classic of its genre? A similar statement led a former Leader of the Opposition to observe that parts of it were true and parts of it were trite, but that, unfortunately, what was true was trite and what was not trite was not true.

Let us take an example: the question of fluoridation of our public water supplies. All the research has been done, and all the evidence has been amassed. What is needed is a decision whether to insist that our public water supplies are fluoridated, or that they are not—or to leave it to someone else to make a decision. No further research is needed.

Mr. Dobson: I have considered the matter carefully, as has my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health. We are both in favour of fluoridation, but we recognise that a substantial amount of the research that has been done, and is in the literature, is now pretty old. We would like a review to consider the up-to-date position.

We live in a democracy. A substantial number of people do not share my views on putting fluoride in water, so I think that I—and all the rest of us—have an obligation at least to deal with any legitimate concerns expressed by those people. If we are left with plain prejudice against fluoridation, we can assess that at the end of the process; but I feel that we owe it to everyone to try to get a group with sufficient authority, status and independence to carry all sensible people with them.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Points of Order

4.18 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Today, hon. Members on both sides of the House received a three-page critique from the Communication Workers Union on the Post Office White Paper. Given that the document has yet to be presented to the House of Commons, could you use your good offices with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—and not just to encourage him to bring the White Paper to the House very quickly? In the past fortnight, the Secretary of State has made four major announcements, none of them on the Floor of the House. The House would welcome an opportunity to hear from him at first hand, and to question him.

Madam Speaker: As the House knows, I feel strongly that important Government decisions should be made known to the House before being communicated to anyone outside. On the basis of the papers that the hon. Lady has given me—I am grateful to her for letting me see them—I am by no means convinced that any such impropriety has occurred in this case. As for the hon. Lady's request for statements to be made from the Government Front Bench, it is for Ministers to inform me when they are ready to do so.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As a now shy Scot, may I ask, in regard to a reserved matter, whether by any chance the Secretary of State for Health asked for an opportunity to answer question 36, on a United Kingdom matter—namely, the policy on retention of samples of smallpox? This is an urgent matter, in which the United Kingdom could play a major part. It would be a terrible thing, which we would rue greatly, if smallpox samples were destroyed without any being kept. Did you have any such request from the Secretary of State?

Madam Speaker: No, certainly not. Question 36 would have been dealt with had we progressed more speedily. It is very difficult for us to reach question 36, but I have to say that I am very disappointed, not just today but every day, with the lack of progress that is made at Question Time. I should like us to make better progress. I doubt that we could have reached that question, but we might have made a better stab at it if we had made better progress.

Property Letting Agents (Client Money Segregation)

4.20 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the segregation of client monies collected by letting agents, to be held in designated client money accounts.

My Bill is to require the segregation of client money—rent and deposits from tenants—that is collected by letting agents, to be held in separate designated client money accounts. I was amazed to discover from a constituency case that that is not already the law. The position is entirely analogous to that of lawyers, stockbrokers and fund managers handling client money.

The case involved a very decent constituent who was looking after the interests of some elderly neighbours who were visiting family elsewhere. The constituent helped that couple to arrange the letting of their house. She diligently searched out a letting agent who had the Association of Residential Letting Agents cover.. The letting agent went bust in 1995, since when my constituent has been unable to recover the £1,000 owing under the ARLA bonding arrangements. Digging into the case, I discovered that part of the reason for the failure to recover is because there is no simple, clear law requiring the segregation of client money.

The Estate Agents Act 1979 set up a requirement for deposits for buying houses to be segregated when estate agents deal with deposits; the regulations to that were set out in 1981. Letting agents are regulated under the Accommodation Agencies Act 1953. That created three offences, but did not lay down a requirement to hold deposits in segregated client accounts. There was a Government consultation on the Act in 1993. In 1994, there was a parliamentary question. The then Government felt that, in principle at least, the ARLA arrangements should suffice.

The reason why ARLA has not paid out in that constituency case—it can happen quite often—is that the insurance bonding requires clear fraud to have occurred. Police rarely prosecute when letting agents go bust. A letting agent spending a client's money merely on the employment of staff is not sufficient to constitute fraud. Therefore, the ARLA bonding arrangements often do not work.

In 1998, ARLA approached the Minister for Local Government and Housing with proposals for a clear law requiring the segregation of client money into client accounts, but nothing has resulted from that. Again, it is crucial to crystallise the legal situation. The National Association of Estate Agents is particularly keen that the proposal should become law. Similarly, the Southern Private Landlords Association is keen for that to happen. Citizens advice bureaux point out the huge increase in the number of private tenants—it is up 600,000 and still rising—and to problems over recovery of deposits. They claim that there are unreasonable withholdings of some 50 per cent. of deposits. Therefore, all that is wanted is a simple law to benefit both tenants and landlords.

In October 1998, the Minister for Local Government and Housing called on landlords and agents to set up some form of pilot scheme. Candidly, it is a straightforward issue, not a pilot scheme matter. It is not even a complicated regulatory matter. Clear law, as with analogous situations, is what is wanted.

In the past two years, as the market has increased, there has been a massive increase in the number of letting agents. Analogous to that increase was the increase, in the late 1980s, in the number of estate agents. Currently, however, the lettings market is satiated, and it is often quite difficult to let property. In the next two years, it is likely that many letting agencies will fail, just as many estate agencies failed in 1990–92.

I therefore urge Ministers to deal with the matter in a timely fashion, before many innocent people—including some of my constituents—are damaged because current arrangements cannot operate efficiently without clear law on the matter. We need only simple legislation—which should be passed now—requiring segregated accounts, and arrangements analogous to those established by ARLA, stipulating that letting agents may take money from client accounts only in accordance with letting agreements, such as to cover their own bills, as specified.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howard Flight, Mr. Peter Viggers, Mr. Graham Brady, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Andrew Tyrie, Mr. John Bercow, Mr. Christopher Fraser and Mrs. Marion Roe.

PROPERTY LETTING AGENTS (CLIENT MONEY SEGREGATION)

Mr. Howard Flight accordingly presented a Bill to require the segregation of client monies collected by letting agents, to be held in designated client money accounts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 23 July, and to be printed [Bill 132].

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Not amended in the Committee and as amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

Clause 2

RATES OF DUTY AND REBATE ON HYDROCARBON OIL

4.27 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 1, line 24, leave out '£0.5288', and insert '£0.499'.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 41, in page 1, line 26, leave out '£0.4721', and insert '£0.4355'.

No. 42, in page 2, line 2, leave out '£0.5021', and insert '£0.4557'.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The amendments seek to bring the massive increase in road fuel taxes back into line with the retail price index. Since the general election, the Government have increased the rate of annual increase in road fuel tax—the so-called escalator—from 5 per cent. above the rate of inflation to 6 per cent. above the rate of inflation. Additionally, they have sneaked in an extra Budget, and a further increase. Moreover, they have loaded further increases on to some fuels, above what one might have assumed to be the 6 per cent. limit.

Diesel fuel has been singled out. This year, VAT on diesel has been increased not by 6 per cent., but, in cash terms, by almost 12 per cent. That increase, in a single year, is simply staggering. It is a tremendous and enduring burden for all those driving diesel cars and, most particularly, for the road haulage industry, which relies almost entirely on diesel fuel.

The Government have replaced the environmental justification for fuel taxation—which does exist at lower levels and for more moderate increases—by a crude tax and cash grab. It is part of the relentless increase in business and personal taxation that we have seen in the past three Budgets. Annually, fuel duties now net a staggering £25 billion, and that is rising steeply.

The Government have ceased even to attempt to justify that huge annual tax escalator on environmental grounds. In the Budget debates, we asked Ministers how they justified the increase on grounds of global warming, or otherwise, but they simply backed away from the issue entirely. I am not surprised, because the Government's own publication on climate change shows that this is a ridiculously expensive and inefficient way of achieving moderate reductions in carbon dioxide emissions. Compared with other reductions which are attainable in the domestic sector and other business sectors, this is not the right way to go about reducing carbon dioxide. The same reductions could be achieved at a fraction of the cost.

Most remarkably, the Government seem entirely unaware of the scale of the increases that they have put through. The Chief Secretary told the House on 21 April:

"The truth is that the price of a litre of diesel has risen by 7p since the general election."—[Official Report, 21 April 1999; Vol. 329, c. 929.]

It was immediately pointed out that the Automobile Association had calculated that the increase in diesel prices since the election was not 7p, but more than 13p a litre—nearly twice what the Chief Secretary had admitted to.

The figure was checked by "Energy Trends", an official index of the energy sector, and the House of Commons Library helpfully confirmed that the figure of 13p a litre was correct. The Library confirmed also that it had no idea how the Chief Secretary had calculated his figure.

We took this matter up with the Chief Secretary, but he failed or refused to admit his error, until a parliamentary answer from the ever-helpful Economic Secretary referred to the correct figure and the right source. It is now confirmed by the Treasury that the price of diesel rose between the election and that April date by 13p a litre.

In a sense, it does not matter that it took so long for the Government to admit the truth, because everyone else knew the truth. Motorists, particularly rural motorists, all knew the truth. Ministers in their Government cars may be insulated from the increases. They do not have to fill up their own tanks, and they are becoming increasingly out of touch with the needs of motorists, particularly those in isolated areas. Now, about 85 per cent. of the cost of fuel is represented by taxation. A forecourt or petrol station is now a massive tax office for the Government.

It is not just the private motorist who knows the truth and must bear the daily burden—the road haulage industry knows it. The industry warned the Government before the Budget. Its representatives gave the Government the facts and figures, explained their case with great patience and showed the Government that the industry would be made uncompetitive in European terms by the annual increase. Their case was dismissed and entirely ignored by the Government.

We now have the most expensive diesel in Europe, with a cost that is far higher than our continental neighbours. There is no way that the haulage industry can avoid this tax. Lorries do not drive around for fun, and there is no way in which they can avoid using diesel or avoid the tax. The haulage industry either has to absorb this extra tax burden, or pass it on. The burden is enormous. Nearly a third of the costs of running a heavy goods vehicle is represented by fuel costs. If a company has to absorb those costs, it could be put out of business—or certainly be made uncompetitive. If it passes on the costs, that raises the price of all goods which must be transported by road.

Yet the Government say that they are in favour of industrial competitiveness. They have had seminars and meetings to lecture industry about the benefits of American-style management, competition and productivity. If that is their message, they could start by giving us American fuel tax levels.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Is the right hon. Gentleman making a pledge that the Conservative party manifesto for the next general election will include the aim to work towards reducing fuel duty to American levels?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am making the point that if the Government are so keen on American business practices they should start introducing some American-style costs. The European Union has to put up with the spectacle of the Prime Minister telling it to adopt American business regulation, or the lack of it, while at the same time he is converging on European costs or, as in the case of fuel duties, increasing them above European levels. As usual with him, it is very much a case of, Do as "I say, not as I do". Our pledge to the British people is to get off the fuel escalator, which is damaging and uncompetitive.

It is crass hypocrisy for the Government to talk about competitiveness and productivity while undermining them through their tax policies. It is the economics of the madhouse. There was a time when the Labour party knew something about industry, but these days very few Labour Back Benchers know anything about manufacturing. I do not think that a single Treasury Minister has ever had hands-on experience of that sector, so perhaps we should not be surprised at Ministers' not understanding the case put to them by the haulage industry, but that does not entirely excuse them.

The Government are penalising the industry not only by higher fuel taxes but by higher vehicle excise duty. Anyone can understand that raising British vehicle excise duty to make it not only the highest, but almost twice as high as the next highest in Europe, is tantamount to delivering a body blow to the industry.

For the 40-tonne articulated lorry—the workhorse of international haulage—our hauliers have to pay £5,750 a year. The figure for France is £486; for Italy, £634; and for the Netherlands, £670. The duty that the Government have imposed on the industry, in addition to the fuel escalator, is staggeringly higher.

The forum with which the industry was fobbed off at the time of the Budget has met only once, and despite what the Government said, there is no independent study on which we can rely to give an accurate comparison of costs here and on the continent.

It is wrong to say that no one will benefit from the Government's road tax policy, however: foreign hauliers certainly will. About 1 million foreign lorries will visit the United Kingdom this year and their operators cannot believe their luck. They are puzzled, amazed and in many ways delighted at the spectacle of a United Kingdom Government who are signed up to a code of conduct on unfair tax competition but create unfair competition against one of their own industries. They have created and are widening a gap that renders the British road haulage industry uncompetitive in Europe.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Does my right hon. Friend agree that in describing the Government's policies on these matters as "crackpot, cock-eyed and ridiculous" on 19 March 1999, the president of the Freight Transport Association, Mr. Lawrence Christensen, might conceivably have been guilty of understatement?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes. The gentleman concerned was in fact being rather restrained: he is a great deal ruder about the Government in private. I am sure that he will return to the subject next year if the Government persist with this lunatic tax policy, which is rendering an important British industry uncompetitive in the way that I have described.

I said that several people and sectors will benefit from the policy. I mentioned foreign hauliers, but we must not overlook foreign Treasuries. The Treasuries of France and Belgium, in particular, are massive beneficiaries, as British lorries go overseas to fill up with foreign diesel. When they make trips abroad, drivers leave the United Kingdom with empty tanks and fill up on the continent. Before they return to this country, they make sure that they fill up at foreign ports. There are five haulage firms of significant size in my constituency, one of which is Frampton's. Mr. Frampton tells me that more than half his diesel is now purchased abroad. That is a huge and continuing drain on the British Exchequer, but the Government either are unaware of it, or do not care about it.

Another group to benefit from the policy are the smugglers in Northern Ireland. The Province has a land border with another EU member state, so smugglers do not have to take a trip by ferry or the channel tunnel to reach it: they need only drive across the border and fill up their tanks. The association representing petrol retailers has estimated that the Government lose about £100 million a year through the smuggling of diesel and other fuels across that land border.

The Inland Revenue has not produced an estimate of the amount lost through that smuggling. I have asked the Government to make a stab at an estimate and to do something about what is a real problem, but to no effect. Given that much of the smuggling is done by paramilitaries, it is odd that the Government's tax policy should put illegal funds in their hands.

It has been reported that the Government are having second thoughts about the fuel escalator. Trailing changes of policy in the press instead of announcing them to the House is not unusual for the Government, but I hope that the Economic Secretary, when she replies to the debate, will confirm that the Government have changed their mind. That would be welcome, but it would be too late for many haulage firms. However, the House would have something to celebrate if the Government were to repent, even at this late stage.

Another fiasco is developing for next year—the possibility of a climate change tax. That threatens to do to the rest of industry what the fuel tax escalator has done to the haulage industry. Perhaps the Government have decided to attack only one sector of industry at a time, and will drop the fuel escalator to concentrate damage, through the climate change tax, on the rest of manufacturing industry.

The House would benefit from an explanation of the Government's intentions. One supposed virtue of the tax escalator has always been that it gives industry some warning of changes to duties and that car manufacturers and others can plan design and production. If the Government are having a rethink, as reported in the press, it should be made explicit and clear.

In anticipation of the Government's belated change of heart, we have tabled amendments to this year's Finance Bill to end the fuel tax escalator. The destruction of the haulage industry and the campaign against the private motorist—carried out under a bogus environmental justification—have gone on too long. The amendments would end that process, and I invite the House to support them.

4.45 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): I support the amendment, and I agree with every word that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) said about the way in which the Government have introduced their road fuel duty policy and its perverse effect on the environment and competitiveness.

Like my right hon. Friend, I seek from the Economic Secretary to the Treasury a clear statement of the Government's policy but I think that matters are even worse than he suggested. There is press speculation, presumably stimulated by loose talk in the Treasury, that the Government are rethinking their unpopular policy, but the Economic Secretary, at Treasury questions on 13 May, implied not that the policy was being rethought but that the Government intended to pursue it until 2010 if they were re-elected often enough. The price of unleaded petrol would then reach £6.90 a gallon, and diesel would be more than £7. Is that the Government's policy? Are we on an escalator from which there is no exit for a further 11 years if the electorate continue to elect the Government? Or should we believe the press speculation?

The Economic Secretary's first duty as a tax Minister is to set out clearly the Government's policy. The policy as last expounded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a commitment to the 6 per cent. ratchet—is misguided. It sits badly, to put it no stronger, with the implication that the Government want to reduce the tax burden, an impression that various Ministers, from the Prime Minister down, create, and that was the reason for the income tax rate cut on Budget day. The Government's rhetoric is about low tax, but they are piling on tax by stealth as fast as they dare in parts of the economy that they hope the public will not recognise or in ways that the public will tolerate without too much noise.

The Government's approach to taxation of petrol and diesel is a perfect example of stealth tax. The tax is deniable, and it need not be justified year after year because it has been pre-announced. The Government clothe themselves in the garments of tax cutting, but they have made a clear commitment to increasing the burden of taxation paid year after year by a section of the community. That is objectionable.

Mr. Leslie: As the right hon. Gentleman is talking of matters deniable, can he deny that he was in the Cabinet when the fuel duty escalator was his Government's policy? How does he reconcile the previous Government's view with his statements today?

Mr. Dorrell: I find no difficulty in reconciling the two things. To be on an escalator is not to deny the possibility of getting off. We announced a series of tax measures, but, in the present circumstances, we believe that the process has gone far enough, and I have no difficulty whatever in saying so. Presumably, the person who has gently speculated to the press that the Government may rethink the proposal equally finds no such difficulty.

My first objection to the Government's policy is that it relentlessly increases taxation on identified sections of the community. Secondly, it reveals a deep-seated prejudice against car ownership that runs right through the Government. I am not opposed to public transport, but I am vehemently against those who oppose in principle the development of private transport.

The motor car has been a huge source of wealth creation for those who build and sell cars and a huge source of freedom for those whose horizons have been widened by its flexibility. Surely the challenge to policy makers is not to dress the motor car up as a public enemy, but, through tax and regulation, to create circumstances that make it a good neighbour.

I do not understand how relentless increases in the tax on fuel redeem the obligation that rests on the Government. It is a form of intellectual slovenliness on the part of Ministers to think, "We can pander to a prejudice against the car" and that it is somehow a cost-free option. Ministers owe it to the House to be more direct and analytical and to discharge their responsibilities more seriously.

The third and perhaps the most immediate reason why I object to the Government's policy on road fuel duties is the reason that my right hon. Friend the shadow Chief Secretary emphasised in his remarks—the effect that the policy is having on the competitiveness of the British road haulage industry and of wider British industry as well. In that connection, I should probably declare an interest as a director and shareholder in a manufacturing business. The manufacturing sector perked up during my right hon. Friend's speech. It is true that all manufacturing businesses rely, at least to some degree, on the haulage sector, and I therefore have an indirect interest in the issue.

The tax policies that the Government are pursuing mean that every British road haulier is at a gradually increasing disadvantage compared with continental competitors. Year after year, the Government are creating a set of circumstances in which there is an increasing incentive for British hauliers to tank up and, in some cases, to register their vehicles overseas. Continental hauliers increasingly have the opportunity to undercut their British counterparts on journeys that involve transport between one British destination and another.

The British road haulage industry is being crucified by the Government's hostility to road transport and the use of the road vehicle is a key part of the British economy. Beyond that, it is not merely the road haulage industry but all those parts of British industry that rely on the transport of goods that are affected. In a modern economy, the link between one part of the supply chain and another is a key cost element in the build-up of total costs that is charged to the eventual consumer.

When the Government increase the cost of haulage between one plant and another within the United Kingdom, they put up not only the cost to British consumers but the price that the producer has to charge in Britain and abroad to compete against foreign competitors. It is not merely the competitiveness of the road haulage industry that is being undermined. The policy is an important source of lack of competitiveness throughout British industry and the Government are solely responsible. Therefore, it is incumbent on Ministers to explain to the House what greater good is being achieved by that relentless and increasing burden on not only the road haulage industry but the whole fabric of British industry.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Surely the answer to the question, "What is being achieved?" is that the Government can add taxes by subterfuge. If they tax through the Inland Revenue, the voter feels it. By doing it this way, they have achieved tax increases by stealth.

Mr. Dorrell: That is why I said earlier that I object to the policy as it is an increase in the tax burden that allows the Government, year by year, to deny that it is a tax increase brought about by the Budget, as they did in this year's Red Book. In a narrow technical sense, they are right. It was not a tax increase brought about by the Budget, because it was previously announced. However, it means that the tables in the Red Book are misleading, if they are intended to show a change in the tax burden from one tax year to another.

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend think that, on 23 January 1995, when the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Dawn Primarolo), now the Paymaster General, complained in the Finance Bill Committee that 75 per cent. of the cost of a gallon of petrol or of diesel was accounted for by tax, it would have been helpful if she had explained that her intention, on becoming a Minister, was to increase the percentage to 85?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend makes his own point; it is a good one, and might be developed if, in response to the debate, the Economic Secretary were to set out clearly the Government's long-term intention for the escalator. The 85 per cent. to which my hon. Friend refers applies only at present. How much further is the policy to be pursued before we reach Ministers' objective?

Before I conclude my remarks, I want to mention the broader impact of the Euro-argument—to use that shorthand. We discussed that issue in Standing Committee, to the great merriment of Labour Members, who felt that those of us who favour active and positive involvement in Europe would find it difficult to engage in the debate. However, the issue clearly illustrates the principle of tax competition that should underlie our tax policy—indeed, it would be difficult to think of a better illustration. What is at stake is the use of the tax system to seek competitive advantage for this country vis-a-vis our continental neighbours.

The Government are busy making Britain uncompetitive, while a competition is taking place to which they are not responding. I believe in tax competition and that is why I think the Government should examine what their competitors elsewhere in Europe are doing; they should respond to that competitive pressure—it should apply to Governments just as it applies to everyone else in the economy.

One of the great benefits of an open liberal economy is that Governments—like every other agent—should be responsive, and should be subject to competitive pressure. The Government are answerable to a competitive marketplace, but they are not responding to the pressures exerted by that marketplace. Until they respond, our economy and those who work in it will carry a heavier and heavier burden; they will pay for the Government's inflexibility with their jobs and their living standards.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I shall speak about the broad principles of the escalator. Yesterday, the Liberal Democrats supported several Conservative amendments. The amendments were well made and well argued; we agreed with them on their merits. However, these amendments are opportunistic and cynical in the extreme. I fully intend to support the Government on the principle of the escalator. Some genuine problems have been raised—such as the international competitiveness of the road haulage industry—to which genuine solutions were proposed in Committee and during our debates in this place. I should be interested to know how far the discussions on the Brit disc proposal have advanced.

Before I get into the meat of the subject, perhaps I can tempt Ministers to tell us more about the press reports—especially the story by Messrs Brown and Grice in The Independent. I always read Messrs Brown and Grice, because they seem to have several days' advance notice of Treasury thinking—especially the Chancellor's thinking. By reading their column, one has been able to follow the debate on economic and monetary union several days ahead of public pronouncement. Their suggestions are more than interesting. They seem to suggest that the Government are considering withdrawing the escalator—by which I think they mean the petrol rather than the diesel escalator—and replacing it, in its environmental impact, by a series of congestion charges to be levied by local authorities. That might represent a considerable advance in policy, but I do not know that for sure, because I have not seen the details. I can see that such a policy has both positive and negative implications, but let us first think a little about the positive aspects.

Such a regime would be far more targeted than the escalator. If the rumours are true, levies would fall most heavily on areas where congestion is worst. Instead of farmers or rural families in Caithness and Sutherland having to pay much higher petrol duty, the levies would fall most heavily on congested cities, which is where most pollution is generated and where there are extra social costs resulting from congestion. Therefore, the policy would appear to be sensible.

Another positive aspect would be that the Government had adopted an approach of decentralisation, as local authorities, especially the new mayors, would be able to make their own judgments. The reports also appear to suggest, although we do not know the details, that the Government are now committed fully to the principle of hypothecating revenue from taxation on transport. Yields from the congestion taxes would be fed back into either reduced vehicle excise duty or improved public transport.

All those would be positive developments, but we cannot have an intelligent debate until we know the details of the proposals. It could be—I suspect that it is—that the Chancellor is trailing a backdown from the whole principle of environmental taxation generally. We have already seen that trend in the abandonment of the policy of shifting from gas to coal, and the proposals might herald a continuation of it. Even if we get the information a little later than Brown and Grice, we would like to hear more from Ministers about where their thinking is leading.

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

Let me address a few comments to the Conservatives. My belief that their amendments are rather opportunistic is based on two reasons. First, there are the revenue implications of their proposal. As I understand it, the escalator is worth roughly £1.5 billion a year, which is a substantial sum. It is incumbent on those who attack the escalator and so break the cross-party consensus on its use to explain clearly and precisely how else that sum can be funded.

Secondly, and following on from that point, if the Conservatives want to lead opinion away from the concept of the escalator—which they promoted in office, with the support of the Liberal Democrats and the then Labour Opposition—do they intend to embrace the new philosophy, which the Government appear to be considering, of having road user charges? Support for the use of congestion taxes would seem to be compatible with the Conservatives' overall philosophy. Right-wing think tanks such as the Institute of Economic Affairs and the Social Market Foundation have long argued that such measures are the right way to deal with the problem, so will the Conservatives support their use? If would be helpful to all parties if we knew that, in London, controversial new taxes to deal with the problem would command all-party support.

If the Conservatives are leading us away from the escalator, what alternatives do they propose? To make that point slightly more general, if we do not have an escalator, how is the problem of pollution to be dealt with? There are two options, of which the first is to do nothing.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments with great interest. Can he explain how congestion taxes would affect freight drivers, who have to be in the centre of towns rather than in the highlands of Scotland because that is where their customers are and where they have to deliver goods to shops and factories? How would the introduction of congestion charges help them, as opposed to removing the absurdly high escalator on diesel fuel?

Dr. Cable: That is a good question. However, since we do not know whether the Chancellor's new thinking focuses on petrol duty, the diesel escalator, or both, I cannot answer it. The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that the road haulage sector faces a set of problems that are completely different from that facing urban commuters, against whom congestion charging is primarily directed. We need to know where the Government's new thinking is leading.

To return to my basic theme, my justification for the escalator is twofold. First, it is a market-friendly way of changing policy. It sends a signal to consumers—whether road hauliers or motorists—and to industry that they should change their behaviour. It is a price signal; it is an economically efficient way of changing behaviour.

The other basic reason why the escalators—whether on road haulage or motorists—are justified is the simple "polluter pays" principle. Pollution is generated, particularly by road haulage. Most of the studies that I have seen suggest that the road haulage industry pays nothing like the social costs of its activities, which are extremely great, both in damage to the carriageway system, especially by very heavy lorries, and in emissions, particularly of black smoke. I think that the industry accounts for about 40 per cent. of that particularly lethal emission. Social costs will not be covered unless there is a proper system of environmental taxation, which the escalator provides.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman said a few moments ago that the escalator was a sensible, market-friendly way of seeking to change behaviour. Does he accept that, in order for it to be such a mechanism, it is necessary for consumers to be able to choose from other products—if I may use the word broadly—that are capable of being purchased in the market? If, however, there is no credible alternative, as the Paymaster General poignantly observed on 23 January 1995 in saying that most motorists in rural areas were dependent on their cars, surely the hon. Gentleman's point about the market does not apply.

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman is of course exactly right: there must be an alternative. That is why I am hoping that the principle of hypothecation will emerge from new Government thinking and revenues will be returned to improve public transport, which I think meets his point. Of course, some money that goes to the Treasury comes back in order to improve provision, but the sums that have recently been allocated to rural public transport are derisory in relation to the revenue raised from it.

The other question to which the hon. Gentleman's remarks give rise is, this if we do not have a market mechanism such as taxation or congestion charges, what else can we do to change behaviour? One may do absolutely nothing, which may be what will happen. I do not know whether the Opposition are advocating merely letting taxes stagnate and trend motoring rise above the predicted rate, allowing all the pollution and greater congestion to flow from it. There is a laissez-faire solution: let us just see what happens. I hope that that would be unacceptable to most of us on environmental and broader social grounds.

Another approach is to use not the market but regulation. Instead of imposing higher taxes, we could force the motor industry to improve the standards of cars. In many respects, that is happening, and it could happen much more. I came to this House from the energy industry, in which we spent much time thinking about the future of the so-called supercar—cars built from very light materials, with much improved battery systems, fly-wheels and better engines. Enormous improvements could be made to reduce emissions and meet environmental objectives. Through regulation, the industry could be forced to advance production of such models. Of course, there is potentially a very large cost for such regulation, for which somebody must pay—probably not the industry, since it will pass the cost on to consumers.

If we want to achieve environmental objectives, we must do so either through market signals, which are taxation or congestion charges, or through regulation, for which someone must pay—or we do absolutely nothing. If the consensus between the three parties is to be broken, it is incumbent on all of us to make it absolutely clear which of those choices we will follow.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) made an interesting contribution to the debate, as he did the last time that we discussed this issue on the Floor of the House in April. I am somewhat surprised and perplexed by the reasoning behind his intention to support the Government because, in April, the Liberal Democrats voted against clause 2 stand part.

When I sit in my constituency surgery, I am often aware—I suspect that I am not alone in this—that I never know what is coming when the next person steps through the door. However, when fuel taxation is being debated in the House, one knows what is coming next. In the short time for which I have been a Member, the issue has come before the House three times, in the three Budget rounds since the 1997 election. However, it is important that we consider it again today.

The difficulty in such a debate—on this point, I have some sympathy with the hon. Member for Twickenham—is that there is a slight whiff of hypocrisy about much of what is said by Conservative Members, because they invented the fuel duty escalator and applied it with vigour during their time in office. They managed to teach this Government another important trick—to tax by stealth. All the arguments that the Government use to hide behind a claim that they are lowering direct taxation while they increase indirect taxation, of which the fuel duty escalator is a strong and powerful example, were taught to them by the previous Conservative Government and their predecessors, so we need no lessons from Conservative Members on the ability to tax by stealth.

None of that, however, invalidates the substantial points that have been made. First, the fuel duty escalator represents a serious competitive impediment to many aspects of working life in this country, whether in the haulage sector or the sectors of the economy that particularly concern rural communities. Secondly, the increase in indirect and hidden taxation has a uniform and punishing effect on some of those who are least able to pay that taxation. It has already been said that we have the highest fuel prices in Europe. On current estimates, we shall be paying something like £4.30 for a gallon of petrol by the end of this Parliament if the Government continue with their plans.

Over the past few weeks, I have had the benefit of being on the campaign trail, where I have been very assiduous, in the Scottish parliamentary and European elections. I made many visits to individual companies, not only in my constituency, but in central Scotland, the south of Scotland and the highlands, and almost all the discussions that I had with them related to the increasing impediments to competitiveness caused by the increases in the fuel duty escalator. For example, a paper manufacturing company has found that its distribution costs have substantially escalated, and companies in the textiles sector are finding it difficult to get their products to market. There is a direct impact on companies' competitiveness and their ability to secure stable levels of employment.

In a debate in the House in late April, I gave the example of a company in my constituency which is emerging from difficult times. As a result of the fuel duty proposal, it faces an increase of about £10,000 in its annual costs, which is a serious burden for such a company when its employees are working very hard to improve its fortunes. That is the sharp end of the Government's proposals.

Another perspective that I want to bring to the debate is that of rural communities. I am becoming increasingly concerned about the impact of the fuel duty escalator on rural communities, particularly those that I represent. I should perhaps declare an interest because, over the summer, I shall embark on an extensive tour of my constituency which will involve lots of driving, so I should record that a lot of petrol will be put into the vehicles that I shall use.

It is important to consider the impact of the fuel duty escalator on rural communities. It has a direct impact on people who have no public transport alternative and who must own a car to go about their daily business, but I particularly want to draw to the attention of the House the impact that the fuel duty escalator has on public services.

In an area such as the one that I represent, key workers who are delivering public services—for example, home-care workers, those delivering education services and those providing health care services—are disproportionately affected by the level of fuel duty increases that we have experienced. Those increases are consequently disproportionately affecting the ability of public services to be effectively delivered and distributed in key rural areas of our community. This flows through into the prices of goods and services within the private sector and, inevitably, affects the weaker within our society. All those issues have been rather glibly thrown aside by the attachment to the fuel duty escalator that the Government have continued to display.

5.15 pm

One of the central issues raised by the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) and by other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Twickenham, is the status of the Government's intention in this policy area. During the days before our previous debate on this subject, which took place on 27 April, it was suggested that the Government were going cool on the fuel duty escalator. That was before some of the substantial outbreaks of anger in the road haulage sector that we have experienced. The national transport forum has been thrown to that sector to address its concerns. The Government suggested then that they were going cold on the question of the escalator and we have heard little about it until the outbreak of the most recent speculation on the subject. The House deserves an explanation from the Government of where they stand.

It is apparent from earlier discussions that are recorded in the Official Report that the Chief Secretary has made it clear that the contents of the Red Book reflect the insistence on the application of the escalator for the remainder of the Parliament. That remains a central part of the Government's argument. We require clarification from the Economic Secretary this evening.

One of the Labour candidates in the Scottish parliamentary elections—this is someone who will be known to those who run the Labour party in Scotland because he was the candidate for the Galloway and Upper Nithsdale constituency, which I am delighted to say was retained by my hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Morgan) on 6 May—said that the application of the fuel duty escalator in rural areas was a poll tax on wheels, affecting people unfairly and unjustly in rural areas and having no relationship to ability to pay. All the damning criticisms that were made of the poll tax are equally valid when made of the poll tax on wheels that the Labour candidate for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale thought was so iniquitous.

Mr. Bercow: To the knowledge of the hon. Gentleman, is the individual concerned still a member of the official list of prospective Labour party candidates?

Mr. Swinney: That is a pretty select list and I imagine that it is difficult to get on to it. I would not venture to go anywhere near the selection process that goes on there. I advise the hon. Gentleman that he should steer well clear of the issues that bear on access to the Labour party candidates' list in Scotland. It is a secret sect if ever there was one.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Swinney: I must give way to someone who is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Before the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) is so generous, I must tell him that this fascinating mini-argument that has crept into the debate is out of order.

Mr. Swinney: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for taking the House along an inappropriate road, if I might use that pun.

I give way to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Chisholm).

Mr. Chisholm: Did the hon. Gentleman read the comment of a leading environmentalist that appears in a Scottish newspaper this morning? He says that for the Scottish National party to oppose both fuel duty increases and road user charges is the worst sort of populism and the worst sort of rubbish. What is the hon. Gentleman proposing for the environment? How can he justify the fact that SNP Members of the European Parliament are seeking to join the European Federation of Green Parties, which supports all those taxes and far more?

Mr. Swinney: If I were to talk about surrounding issues the European Parliament, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you would rule me further out of order than I was earlier.

It is important that we put in place a credible alternative that will change people's behaviour, and that has not been offered by the Government in support for the rural transport fund or by investment in public transport infrastructure. It is important also that the Government respond constructively and positively to the genuine difficulties that are now being faced by rural communities in Scotland and other parts of the United Kingdom. Nothing has been said by the Government that addresses those difficulties. The sooner we hear an answer from the Government, the better the position will be for the rural communities that are suffering disproportionately as a result of this unfair taxation.

Mr. Loughton: I support the amendments moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). As a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, I am concerned with the issues of green taxation, achieving Kyoto targets and so forth. The Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who has appeared before our Committee many times, knows our commitment to those matters. In the next week, we shall publish a report on energy efficiency, which touches on many of the subjects that we are debating today.

The measure that the amendments seek to ameliorate has nothing to do with energy efficiency and environmental conservation. The crux of the matter is the absurdity of accelerating the fuel duty escalator and then trying to dress that up as an environmental gain. In our many debates on the subject, we never hear from the Government any mention of the change in the cabotage rules that came in last July, which has completely altered the game for the freight industry in Europe and the United Kingdom.

As from last July, there is no environmental gain whatever to be had from jacking up diesel fuel duties in this country. That can only result in British lorry drivers, driving British lorries on British roads and emitting British fumes, being replaced by Belgian, French and German lorry drivers, driving Belgian, French and German lorries on British roads and emitting Belgian, French and German emissions from their lorries. Moreover, those emissions tend to be a rather poorer grade, because of the lower standards of maintenance of those lorries and the poorer quality of the fuel sold on the continent. It is utter nonsense to suggest otherwise.

The Government cannot continue to refuse to believe the evidence in front of their eyes. My right hon. Friend said that there were about 1 million lorries from Europe travelling on British roads this year. For the past three or four years, there have been 100,000 extra lorry trips a year from the continent.

I recently visited lorry drivers up in Lincolnshire. One has only to visit ports around the Humber to see the collapse in the roll on/roll off business. In the old days, foreign lorries would deposit the sealed containers at continental ports, to be brought over to the UK on ferries and picked up by British tractor vehicles and carried on to their final destination. Now continental lorries take the containers all the way through to their final destination, such is the economy of scale.

The British lorry drivers who would normally charge £1 per mile for the journey find that they are competing with continental lorry drivers who are quoting just 60p per mile for such journeys. British lorry drivers cannot compete with such a gap in margins, and no reduction in margins is being achieved by their end customers. The British lorry drivers are suffering at every point.

Eurostar is offering cheap fares for cab drivers to take their tractor vehicles over to the continent to fill up with petrol. There are also special ferry charters taking lorry drivers over to the continent just to fill up. A cheap rate overnight on a Sunday of less than £20 per metre is economically very attractive. To fill up a 1,200 litre tractor unit can save more than £600, which is well above the cost of the fares. In addition, extra lorry-miles are being created on British roads by those tractor vehicles being driven to the ports to be taken to the continent. That is utterly absurd.

What is the net effect? An enormous net loss in revenue to the UK Treasury and a net increase in revenue for the Belgian, French and German Exchequer, as well as the Irish situation, about which we have heard. That of course means less money for the Treasury, which supposedly will hypothecate in respect of more environmentally friendly measures to encourage greater use of liquified petroleum gas to help this country to achieve its Kyoto targets, which we all want to be met.

As we have heard from my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells, the Economic Secretary constantly gets her figures wrong, and, at long last, the admission was squeezed out of her that the price of diesel fuel has increased by 13p per litre since the election. However, there still seems to be no sign of the Government acknowledging the reality of what is going on. As one of my hon. Friends has said, at Treasury questions on 13 May, she envisaged the fuel escalator continuing for a further 10 years. As if to add insult to injury, on 24 June, at the next Treasury questions, those freight drivers who wanted an end to the escalator, which we were advocating, were accused of being extremist. They were called extremist for wanting to preserve their industry and their jobs and for wanting British trucks to continue to carry British goods on British roads rather than lose out to European competitors.

Even if we put on one side all the other additional costs that the freight industry has been facing, such as the selective increases in vehicle excise duty, and the fact that new tyres will cost about £278 per axle on an 18-tyre vehicle—

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way in the midst of painting a picture of doom and gloom. Can he tell us the level of penetration of the British market by foreign lorries?

Mr. Loughton: I have already given the figures. There has been an increase of 100,000 lorry trips a year over the past three to four years. Those are the Treasury's figures. If only one Treasury Minister would stand on a motorway and carry out a survey—[Interruption.] To be generous, a Minister could stand at the side of a motorway.

Treasury Ministers should visit a service station on a major motorway and count up the number of foreign-flagged vehicles in the car park; then they would have to admit the truth. I cannot see why they cannot carry out some basic research. If they did, they would see that the number of foreign vehicles carrying freight on our roads has increased disproportionately.

These measures also hit the smaller operators—owner-operators in particular—disproportionately, because 85 per cent. of goods vehicles in this country operate in fleets of 10 vehicles or fewer. The cost of fuel constitutes at least 40 per cent. of the overall operating costs of such operators. Things would have been even worse had it not been for the weakness in the oil price over the past year to 18 months, although that advantage is disappearing very quickly. With yesterday's news that the oil price has returned to more than $18 a barrel, it will not be long before the small element in the cost of a gallon of fuel that represents the product itself is pushed up. The overall price of fuel will increase even more, let alone the tax on top of it.

Whenever we mention those matters and the real factors that are affecting many lorry drivers in this country, the Minister starts talking about special tax concessions for cleaner lorries, for installing catalytic converters and everything else. She should try driving a 38-tonne lorry fuelled by liquified petroleum gas. She might find that the tanker required to fuel it rather bigger than the vehicle itself was, and that a large amount of fuel to be dragged along behind it. Will she start to explore the economics of catalytic converters, which cost more than £2,500 to fit, although the tax break which is supposed to encourage drivers to fit them is very much less than that? They are guaranteed for 12 months only and account for a significant drop in the fuel economy of a vehicle, yet again threatening drivers' margins.

We debated road fuel gases last night and it was interesting that the Economic Secretary claimed that Government had broadened the differential between the duties on liquified petroleum gas and on hydrocarbon fuels. She said that it was important that the gap between the duty on those two fuels had been widened, because that would encourage more people to use LPG. Of course that gap will widen if the rate for diesel fuel is jacked up at the upper end. It is absurd.

5.30 pm

Unless the Government accept the amendments at the last minute, the proposed measures will result in an overall loss in revenue to the Treasury without any concomitant reductions in CO_2 emissions from freight traffic. Business will go to continental lorry drivers at the expense of British jobs, and UK companies will either relocate their fleets or part of their fleets to the continent or flag out to continental operators. British companies are already doing that. Indeed, firms are springing up on the back of the advice given to British lorry drivers on how to take advantage of flagging out or relocating to the continent.

As the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) said, the rural community is affected, and especially community bus services in the countryside. Some months ago, the Economic Secretary talked out a private Member's Bill that would have exempted community buses from bus fuel duty. They currently have no exemption, and pay 100 per cent. of the excise duty charged on diesel fuel. I thought that we were trying to promote such bus services yet, they, along with the commercial freight drivers, will be one of the biggest victims of the proposed increase in excise duty. Those services are often run by charities and volunteers. The disabled, who rely wholly on their cars and disabled bus and taxi services in the country and town alike, will also be victims.

The Government must wake up to reality. The amendments send a clear signal that enough is enough. We need a drastic reversal of policy. It may have been appropriate five or six years ago, but it is now time to get off the escalator. If not, the measures will be self-defeating in terms of revenue raised and environmental gain. It is about time that this madness stopped.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I intend to make a brief contribution.

I support amendments Nos. 40, 41 and 42. The fuel escalator raises £25 billion. It raises so much money because it is a regressive form of taxation. When designing a tax system, one should take into account not only how to raise revenue, but how to make that fair. The effect of these tax measures will be substantially different in each constituency.

[Mr. Robert Syms]

In large rural areas the car is a necessity. People have to use it to maintain their quality of life—to take the children to school, to go to hospital, to go to church and to do all the basic things. In many urban areas, especially London, there are transport alternatives, but for constituents who live in villages out in the wilds of England, Wales and Scotland there is no alternative to the car. This tax will be determined more by people's postcode than by their choice of transport. It is unlikely to affect wealthier people, but it will hit poorer people in rural areas.

I was a rural county councillor. One should not presume that because people live in pretty villages they have high disposable incomes and are well off. Many people who live in villages struggle to bring up a family and keep a home together. The imposition of fuel duty year on year makes that very difficult. The Government's taxation policies are driving poorer people out of rural areas: that is happening more now than in the past 20 or 30 years. That is a pity, because many villages will end up with unbalanced communities.

I welcome the amendments. At least they have given rise to a debate, and at least they take into account the fact that a policy that is sane when it relates to one year can become insane when it is implemented year after year, and when it impacts on only certain people in certain constituencies. Some of those people may not have the largest incomes, or, indeed, the largest cars; they simply need to use the car to do basic things.

As one who represents a port, and a port that is used by road hauliers, I am very aware of the burden that the clause imposes on the road haulage industry. Road hauliers carry the vast majority of the goods that appear in our shops and supermarkets. There is no such thing as a painless tax increase, and at some point people must pay for the amount that the Government are raising—in this instance, £25 billion. The cost must be paid either by consumers through higher prices, or by road hauliers, who must try to contain their costs. They may be able to squeeze efficiency for one or two years, but that will become increasingly difficult after a period of several years, when fuel prices are constantly rising.

The road haulage industry is very competitive. Most hauliers survive on small margins. It is a problem if they have to jack up prices every year in such a competitive industry: many businesses are likely to go bust as a result, and many drivers are likely to lose their jobs. Continental hauliers have an impact on Britain. Many have 100-gallon tanks, which they fill up on the other side of the channel. They come here and unload, and look for business. Because they bought their fuel on the other side of the channel and they do not have to fill their tanks here, they can undercut British road hauliers.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) pointed out, hauliers are not only contributing a great deal in fuel tax; they are contributing a great deal in vehicle excise duty. The more road hauliers go out of business on this side of the channel, the less revenue the Treasury will receive. We should take account of what happens across the channel, and I think that the amendments are at least a step in the right direction.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) described our policy as opportunistic, but I do not consider it opportunistic to stand up for country dwellers who need cars. I do not consider it opportunistic to stand up for road hauliers who carry the goods that we all want to buy, and who provide a good service for this country—efficiently, we hope—but on whom the Government's policy will impose a considerable burden.

I hope that the Economic Secretary will make clear where the Government see their policy going. I believe that, if we continue in this way, anger will erupt, people will go out of business, jobs will be lost, and people who are struggling to remain in rural villages in which they may have been born and grown up will be forced into urban areas.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I support the amendments.

I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), who drew attention to the small margins on which the haulage industry is based. I wish to stress the plight of the industry in south-west Hampshire. I believe that the relationship between the environment and haulage mileage is entirely different there: indeed, its impact may be perverse in comparison with that in the rest of the country.

The difficulty is that, in south-west Hampshire, the need for haulage services is concentrated along the A31—which is in effect an extension of the M3 and M27 motorway network—down the Southampton waterside, particularly in Totton and the oil-refining area of Fawley, and along the southern strip, where population growth and the growth of enterprise are greatest.

It will no doubt have occurred to some people that the New forest lies bang in the centre of the localities to which I have drawn attention. It is the policy of Hampshire county council—many of my constituents would say that it is properly so—to prevent hauliers from travelling through the New forest. Therefore, any haulage firm that wishes to pick up business, for example, in Ringwood or on the waterside, but which is located along the southern strip must make a considerable detour, entailing much more mileage. They feel that they have made their contribution to the environment by travelling more miles than would ordinarily be the case were they not restricted by the county council's environmental policy. Now they find themselves penalised disproportionately by the escalator that has been imposed on them.

Equally, the greater mileage that hauliers are required to travel has had an effect on many of my constituents. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) will be aware of the complaints of his constituents in Highcliffe and Walkford about lorries that would otherwise have travelled through Lyndhurst and Burley, but which make a large detour to avoid the New forest. His constituents, and my constituents in Sopley and along the A31, would undoubtedly welcome the extra revenue that such taxes might yield if it were invested in the road network to provide them with relief from the additional haulage traffic to which they are subjected. The legitimacy of the tax is completely undermined, however, because the prospect of bypasses, particularly around Lyndhurst, and of noise abatement measures along the A31 to allay the misery of many of the local residents, has receded.

It is precisely because of the current tax's perverse effects, and its disproportionate effect on my constituents, that I am in favour of the amendments.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): First, I apologise to you, and to the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being here at the start of the debate. I was following it in another part of the Palace estate and heard some of the arguments.

If I were in the Government's position and faced with a nice little earner that would yield nearly £1.7 billion extra year on year, I would sit on the Treasury Bench, try not to catch the eye of Opposition Members, and try not to look embarrassed or in any way discomfited that so much additional money was being lifted yet again from motorists.

It is almost as though the Government were trying to outdo the previous Government's efforts in their tax approach. They have looked at the escalator and thought, "That is a good idea. Let's double it. Let's really go for it," but, as always, the shoe has begun to pinch tightly. Let us look at the real-world effect of the fuel duty escalator. At one of my local garages, the price was 58p a litre before the last Budget; now, 69p or 70p is the norm. At a modest consumption of 10 gallons a week, the citizen is now paying about £225 a year more for his fuel.

I ask the Economic Secretary, if she is to reply to the debate, whether she will initiate a study of the escalator's distributional effects. For all the reasons that other right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned, many of our constituents find it impossible to adjust their motoring habits overnight. They are not financially able to buy the latest and most fuel-efficient cars to overcome the effect of extra fuel duty. They are perhaps wedded to an older and less efficient car, which may be a necessity—perhaps even a tool of the trade—for them. None the less, the Government seem disinclined to measure the regressive effect of the tax, particularly on those who are at the lower end of the salary or wage spectrum.

5.45 pm

Will Ministers therefore conduct an exercise examining the tax's full impact? If they continue operating the escalator as they have been, many low-income people will be very adversely affected—which perhaps should, if there is still a vestige of socialism among Labour Members, touch their conscience. I do not think that many people drive many frivolous miles. Most people use their cars of necessity, particularly in rural areas, about which hon. Members have already spoken.

Although the oil price may drop to $10 a barrel, the Government ensure that motorists do not receive the decrease's full benefit. I appreciate that there is a relationship between fuel price and fuel use, but, if the Government want to achieve their environmental objectives, other levers should be used rather than simply hiding behind the fuel escalator. What will happen as the oil price increases? I presume that Ministers will be happy to let motorists not only feel the full force of the fuel duty escalator but bear the full weight of any oil price increase.

Ministers cannot have their cake and eat it. Yesterday we debated the implications of vehicle excise duties and future applications—perhaps to be announced in the next Budget—of the graduated scale, which is the Government's big idea to meet their Kyoto targets. However, to achieve the same targets, they want also to use the fuel duty escalator. Why do we need two economic measures to achieve the same target, when one will do?

The Government are using a very negative and blunt instrument to try to achieve their environmental targets, but they have also committed themselves to a different instrument. They should not have two bites at the same cherry. In trying to achieve their environmental targets, Ministers have taken a lazy approach to taxation. If they want to raise more money to meet the targets, they could do so in other ways—but they are frightened rigid of taxing anything else. Therefore, with a blunt instrument, they are going for the same old "winners", which is having a seriously regressive effect on lower-income groups. Ministers owe it to us to undertake a study to examine the policy's real impact.

I take modest comfort from thinking that Ministers may support amendment No. 40, as press reports state that the Chancellor is getting cold feet on the issue. However, I suppose that, being a Scot, he would rather have the money than show even a little generosity to hard-pressed motorists, many of whom are suffering from the Government's anti-road, anti-car policies. Motorists are stuck in traffic jams, spending even more money on fuel and adding to the Government's coffers. I suppose that that is the new stationary method of raising taxes.

The Government need very carefully to consider this sphere of taxation. I think that a report on the escalator's impact on individuals, compared with its impact on the environment, would help greatly to clarify Government policy.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I do not know whether the Economic Secretary is a fan of George Gershwin, but, judging by her previous statements on the escalator, I should not be surprised to see her standing at the Dispatch Box singing, "I'll build a stairway to paradise". Nevertheless, as we have heard in the debate, the truth is that the Government are building a treadmill to ruin for businesses across the United Kingdom.

We heard from the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) how the previous Conservative Government's success in attracting funding for Scotland's infrastructure—thereby revitalising so many of its regions—is now being undermined by the ever-increasing cost of getting products made in Scotland to their markets. That is the extent of the damage being done by this serious increase in taxation.

Mr. Swinney: The electorate's conclusions about the great success of the Conservative Administration were shown on 1 May 1997, when the Conservatives failed to win any seat within Scotland. Perhaps that little piece of information will be a part of the hon. Gentleman's recollections about Scottish politics.

Mr. St. Aubyn: We well know that the Conservative party bequeathed to the country, including Scotland, a golden economic legacy. There were other reasons why we lost that election, but the reasons for the legacy will be the reasons why we will win power again.

If the Government increase taxation without a thought-through strategy, they will hurt business and destroy jobs, and the tax increases will become self-defeating. That is the stage we are reaching with the so-called fuel escalator.

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

In my part of the country, people do not have a choice to whether or when to use their cars. They are busy people who have to get to work and who have to use the transport that is available and—as in many other parts of the country—that means the motor car. It is no good telling them to put all their freight on rail. They need to use the road transport network which has been built up over so many years.

I was struck by the way in which in a recent exchange with me, the Minister for Transport patted herself on the back for having announced a £5 million noise reduction fund—£5 million across the country to reduce noise is a paltry sum when the Government, as a result of their increments in taxation on the motorist, are raising an extra £12 billion from motorists during this Parliament.

If the Government were to use a modest increase in road duty to improve our road network by imaginative noise reduction measures, better surfaces or schemes to encourage road traffic to use main roads—and not to disrupt the lives of many people by driving heavy lorries through villages—at least some benefit would flow back to our constituents who are paying these high costs. The Government do not intend to do that. The reason why the Conservative party is opposed to high taxation in principle is that Governments who increase tax simply tend to hoard the money, and do not have the imagination to put it to good use. That is why we need to stop the increases in road fuel taxes. We need to stop and think before we use these extra taxes simply to force businesses into ruin. Any money must be put to good use for the real transport needs of our country.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): This has been a lively and interesting debate—albeit one perhaps inevitably, has gone over familiar ground. It might help if I reminded the House of the origins of the fuel duty escalator, which was introduced by the Conservative Government in 1993. It was set initially at 3 per cent., but raised in the same year to 5 per cent. With the exception of some references in one or two speeches from Conservative Members, one would never have thought so.

The escalator was inherited by us, confirmed by us and increased to 6 per cent. in 1997. The fuel duty escalator was right when the Conservative Government introduced it—I am prepared on this occasion to give them the credit for it, even though they have since abandoned the policy—and it is still right today.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the Economic Secretary complete that statement of policy? For how long will it be right?

Ms Hewitt: As we said in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" the escalator will be applied in future Budgets. Our environmental assessment is that if the road fuel duty escalator is continued until 2002, it will, by 2010, save between 2 million and 5 million tonnes of carbon—an extremely significant contribution towards our Kyoto targets.

Mr. Jack: Will the Economic Secretary give me an undertaking that she will publish the details of how that calculation was arrived at?

Ms Hewitt: The calculation was based on the models used by the Treasury and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. We referred to that in the environmental impact assessment table in the Budget documentation. There is nothing further that I can add. However, if any further technical details will assist the right hon. Gentleman, I will let him have them.

The reduction in greenhouse gases was for the Conservative party and is for this Government the first and continuing justification for the fuel duty escalator. However, there is a second justification—the contribution that the fuel duty escalator makes, by constraining the growth in demand for road transport that would otherwise take place, to improving local air quality and thus people's health.

Last night, Conservative Members posed as the friends of health and the opponents of air pollution. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) moved amendments on road fuel gases, and referred to the problems of "fine particulates PM10s, which have a demonstrated link with respiratory and cardiovascular disease, and to oxides of nitrogen, which can damage the lungs and play a part in summer smog episodes. These emissions currently result from the use of petrol engines".—[Official Report, 5 July 1999; Vol. 334, c. 770.]

The right hon. Gentleman was absolutely right. He referred later to benzine emissions from petrol, which cause health risks.

Let me remind the House of those health risks and the contribution to them from the emissions from cars and lorries. In 1996, airborne particulates in urban areas brought forward more than 8,000 deaths, and either caused or brought forward more than 10,000 hospital admissions for respiratory diseases. Road transport is one of the major sources of those particulates. Across the country, road transport contributes about a quarter of the total emissions of particulates. In London, where the problem is most severe, nearly 80 per cent. of those particulates—about which the right hon. Member for Fylde was so concerned last night—come from road transport.

Road transport is responsible for nearly half the emissions of nitrogen oxide. In London, where the problem is at its worst, it accounts for nearly three quarters of emissions.

Mr. St. Aubyn: By how much has traffic been reduced in London since the Government increased the amount of the escalator?

Ms Hewitt: The escalator has ensured that the demand for petrol, and therefore the emissions from petrol and diesel-powered engines, has reduced by 0.1 per cent. compared with a year ago, and is somewhat lower than it was more than 10 years ago. Compared with the scenarios that we could have anticipated in the absence of the escalator, that is an important constraint upon the increase in road transport and pollution.

Opposition Members were concerned last night about people's health. Today, they are concerned only about people driving cars and lorries. It is worth remembering that particulates from diesel engines are responsible for a large number of those premature deaths and hospital admissions for bronchial and respiratory diseases.

I remind the House of the remarks of the former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who said—quite rightly—that hon. Members who sought to support the Kyoto targets and to show concern for people's health and the impact on health of road transport-generated pollution, and who simultaneously opposed the fuel duty escalator, were sailing dangerously close to hypocrisy.

Several hon. Members spoke about the road haulage industry. I commend the remarks of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who rightly referred to several studies that strongly suggest that the road haulage industry is contributing considerably less than the total cost of the social and environmental penalties that it imposes on this country. Of course, the industry's competitiveness is taken into account when the Government set diesel duty rates and vehicle excise duty, but the duty on diesel also reflects valid environmental and health concerns which I would have hoped by Conservative Members were shared.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor and I have often stressed that, in considering the industry's competitiveness, we must take into account not only our fuel duty and VED, but our total package of business costs. Thanks to the Government, we now have the lowest rate of corporation tax of any major European Union country. Our non-wage labour costs are generally lower than those in our competitor countries. The small companies rate of corporation tax was cut to 20 per cent. in the Budget and a 10 per cent. rate was introduced for the smallest companies.

We have cut VED for the cleanest lorries by £1,000, and in response to a request from the industry we have made it easier for vehicles to change their licence category to become eligible for the lowest possible rate of VED to suit the loads that they bear.

In response to the industry's concerns, we set up the road haulage forum, which will meet again under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Transport later this month. At the request of right hon. and hon. Members, we are considering the specific question of the Euro vignette scheme, although I stress again that the scope for such a scheme is severely constrained by a European directive to which the previous Government committed us.

There is considerable evidence of overcapacity in the haulage industry. A third of total mileage is run empty and the supermarkets have achieved enormous improvements in fuel efficiency and loadage, which shows that we are giving the industry absolutely the right incentive, partly through the road fuel duty escalator, to ensure that it makes much more efficient use of its fuel.

A recent study by the energy efficiency best practice programme shows that only a third of commercial fleet managers know how much they spend on fuel and only a third have active policies to improve fuel efficiency. The escalator should go some way towards the extremely necessary goal of improving that record.

One damaging effect of the amendments is that they would reduce the duty incentive for clean ultra-low sulphur diesel to just over 2p a litre. We have seen clearly that the trade needed the 3p differential that we introduced in the March Budget, as it enables ultra-low sulphur diesel to be offered at the same pump price as conventional diesel. In February, clean diesel was only 41 per cent. of the diesel market; by June, that had already increased to 96 per cent. We have put in place the right duty differential and ensured that virtually all diesel now sold in this country is environmentally friendly. That has been a resounding success, and the amendments would go back on our promise to the oil industry to maintain the differential.

The amendments would backdate the reduction in rates to Budget day on 9 March, which would necessitate our repaying about £300 million to the oil industry. I am not sure that the Opposition have begun to think about how that could be administered or how one could insist that the reduction was passed back to the motorists on whom the increase was imposed.

As we have come to expect from the Conservatives, their refusal to abide by the policy that they rightly adopted in government and their opportunistic decision to abandon it, as the hon. Member for Twickenham said, mean that there is a black hole of about £5 billion in their spending plans.

Perhaps the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) will tell us how he proposes to fill that hole and whether he believes that the resultant cuts should fall on the health service, on schools or on some other part of public spending. I hope that he will tell us how he would achieve the Kyoto and other greenhouse gas targets and the improvements in people's health, of which many Conservative Members have spoken, in the absence of this highly effective and well-justified policy. I urge my hon. Friends to oppose the amendment unless, as I hope, the right hon. Gentleman decides to withdraw it.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The facts of the issue are not seriously in dispute. The road fuel duty escalator is now well past the point at which it had an environmental justification and is doing severe damage to the private motorist and the road haulage industry. It is part of the Government's totally unnecessary war on the private motorist and it is making an important industry uncompetitive in Europe.

The Government first chose to deny those facts and they now choose to ignore them. We do not ignore them and we will now vote to reverse the damage by supporting the amendment, which would cut the escalator back to the rate of the retail prices index.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 40

MEANING OF CONDITIONAL INTERESTS IN SHARES

Dr. Cable: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 21, line 4, leave out subsection (7) and insert—

'(7) The amendments made by this section shall be deemed always to have had effect'.

This technical matter was pursued at length in Committee, but I should like to take it a little further. It arises from a measure against tax avoidance that was designed to stop people converting remuneration into shares, thereby exempting themselves from higher rates of income tax. That measure fell on a particular class of companies—unquoted companies that frequently pay employees or directors in shares that must be transferred when the employee or director leaves the company.

That presented a problem for those people, who would have to pay taxes at higher rates on valid and welcome forms of employee share ownership because of the attempt to clamp down on tax avoidance. The Finance Act 1998 attempted to address the problem by exempting people when the arrangement was built into the company's articles of association. However, it is clear from discussions with the Inland Revenue that the exemption was too narrowly drawn. Many people were caught out who had acquired shares as a result of employee contracts, or because they worked for a subsidiary—unlike the fat cats who work for main companies.

Clause 40 is designed to narrow further the range of the anti-avoidance measure, and is generally welcome as it allows exemptions to be extended to people who work for subsidiary companies. However, the exemption is limited to people who bought shares after Royal Assent was granted to last year's Finance Act. It still catches a substantial number of people innocently involved in employee share ownership schemes who purchased their shares long ago.

The amendment would therefore apply the anti-avoidance measure retrospectively. Little revenue is involved, though if the sum is more substantial, the Treasury should give us some figures. The amendment cannot conceivably be construed as doing anything to encourage tax avoidance as it applies to decisions already taken. It is a reasonable technical suggestion to widen the scope of the exemption already accepted in principle by the Government in a way that will meet the concerns of those who are trying to promote employee share ownership in a specific category of companies.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): Clause 40 and the Liberal Democrat amendment are the fruits of excessive zeal in anti-avoidance measures, the complication of which has resulted in mistakes by the Government. The amendment is broadly correct, as the administration of clause 40 would be a nightmare for the Inland Revenue during the year in which an unfair tax rule existed, but it sets a precedent with which we are uncomfortable by making tax matters retrospective, even though it favours individuals. However, we cannot see how clause 40 will operate smoothly without it, unless the Revenue acts as if it had been included in the Bill.

Where companies pay individuals in shares subject to later forfeiture—which creates a difficulty in valuing the benefit and the income tax that arises—special rules apply. When the original provisions were drafted in 1988, cases in which an employee dismissed for misconduct had to sell the shares at a discount were not included, but those cases were included in the special rules last year. Those people are in a tax situation different from the deliberately advantageous situation in which shares become forfeit in order to avoid charges to income tax. The tidying up of parts of last year's Act made the mistake of including a charge to income tax that no reasonable person would have considered.

We are glad that the Government are correcting that error in clause 40. However, do they intend the Revenue to be lumbered with the unintended law for a year, or will the Revenue operate as if the mistake had not happened, even if the amendment is not accepted?

Mr. Fabricant: I, too, support the amendment and welcome clause 40. The clause is a small demonstration of the Government's so-called commitment to a stakeholding society, although they are also attacking fat cats and claiming that anyone who enjoys the fruits of the company for which he or she works is a fat cat. There is a fundamental inconsistency there.

It is wholly wrong that clause 40 should become operational from a particular future date. It should be backdated. It should, indeed, have gone further. When in Opposition, Government Members criticised our Finance Acts, claiming that share and profit participation schemes were not lawful, and that profit schemes were being abused. There were instances of that, for example, one at Nottingham university, which was quoted by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). A [illegible] company was set up and people were paid through dividends rather than wages.

6.30 pm

Assurances were given before the last general election to companies such as the John Lewis Partnership, which I do not think any hon. Member would accuse of operating a scheme to make use of a tax loophole and which has suffered as a consequence. Everyone who works for the John Lewis Partnership is designated as a partner. At the end of the year, instead of a dividend being declared, a proportion of salary is declared as a bonus, which is distributed among all the workers. If that is not a good example of a stakeholding society, I do not know what is.

I clearly remember during debates on the Finance Bill before the last general election Labour Members pledging that if a Labour Government were elected they would restore tax-exempt status to profit-sharing schemes such as that operated by the John Lewis Partnership, which is a bona fide scheme. Now, two years into a Labour Government, what do we see? The stakeholding society is merely another spin. There has been no deed and the Government have not attempted to reinstate that profit-sharing scheme. That is another empty promise—another promise unfulfilled and another group of people who feel betrayed as a consequence.

Will the Minister, who was not in the House prior to the general election, look through the Hansard of our debates on that Finance Bill, see the promises that were made and undertake on her word of honour that bona fide profit-sharing schemes will be reinstated as tax exempt? There is no logic in introducing clause 40 into the Bill without introducing the sort of scheme that I just mentioned.

The Labour Government claim that they are no longer against fat cats. They hope that fat cats will vote for them. They claim that they want a stakeholding society. Yet when companies generate the very conditions that provide such a society, the Government, either through their inaction or action, work against them. That is hypocrisy, betrayal and spin of the worst kind.

Ms Hewitt: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the commitment made in the Budget by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, both to introduce new tax regulations for employee share ownership schemes, which will make it the most generously tax relieved form of employee share ownership in this country and to introduce a new enterprise management incentive, which is directed particularly towards new and start-up companies. We are more than fulfilling our pledge to promote stakeholding by employees.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Hewitt: No. If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I would rather deal with the amendments to clause 40. It is fair to say that he strayed somewhat wide of those.

As the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said, clause 40 adds two new cases to the categories of shares that are specifically excluded from the special tax rules that were introduced in the Finance Act 1998. Those excluded cases are, instead, taxed in line with general tax rules. The amendment would make the change retrospective to last year.

A similar amendment was tabled in Committee and was spoken to by the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). I asked him to withdraw it on the ground that it would be wrong to present an unexpected tax bill to some employees. He agreed to do so on the basis of my statement to the Committee, which he described as "full, frank and helpful". I always seek to be full, frank and helpful.

My concern at that time was that making the changes retrospective, while it would be beneficial for the majority, might result in some employees receiving a larger tax bill. That is because the value of shares can go down as well as up. If an employee had been awarded shares since 17 March 1998 that were subject to a risk of forfeiture that could not last for more than 5 years and the shares had fallen in value, the tax charge would, in the absence of retrospective exemption, be on a lower value than would be the case under general tax rules.

In most cases, however, the opposite would apply: the shares would have increased in value and the employee would be better off with retrospection. Because of the possible risk that a few people might be worse off, it seemed better on balance not to make the clause retrospective.

The debate in Committee was helpful and since then several advisers have shown us examples of cases where ordinary employees will be disadvantaged unfairly by the absence of retrospection. In one case, the directors of a company were offered shares subject to the risk of forfeiture in February 1998, before the special rules in section 140A apply. Any subsequent increase in the value of those shares will therefore be taxed as a capital gain.

However, similar shares were awarded to all the employees of the company in April 1998. Those fall within the special rules of section 140A with the result that when they sell their shares the employees will have to pay income tax on any subsequent increase in their value. For most employees that will mean a real cost as the annual capital gains tax exemption would normally cover their gain.

Therefore, the employees end up being treated far more harshly than the directors of the company who acquired their shares a month earlier. If the employees were awarded the same shares after Royal Assent, they would be covered by the exemption provided by clause 40 and would be treated the same as the directors. Therefore, employees who were awarded shares between 17 March 1998 and when this Bill is enacted would be treated more harshly than any employees receiving exactly the same shares both before and after those dates. We have also reached the conclusion that many of those affected will simply not be aware that they are in that unfortunate position.

Therefore, like the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight), I think that on this occasion there is a convincing argument that we should set aside our normal concerns about retrospective legislation and the problems to which it can give rise. I am therefore happy that we should adopt the common-sense solution which is clearly fairer to most employees. I am grateful to hon. Members and those advisers who have brought those cases to our attention and I am happy to accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 45

PROVISION AND SUPPORT OF BUS SERVICES

Ms Hewitt: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 24, line 21, leave out 'large'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 4 to 12.

Ms Hewitt: These amendments deal with the minimum seating capacity for the works bus exemption and related matters. We had an extremely helpful debate on the subject in Committee and hon. Members raised various matters there on which I promised to reflect further. I have done so and these amendments are a consequence of that further consideration—further proof that this Government do listen and respond.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 4 would reduce the minimum seating capacity requirement for the works bus exemption from 17 to 12. Several of the amendments moved in Committee sought to reduce our initial figure of 17. As I explained in Committee, the reason for a high seating test is simply to prevent the exemption being siphoned off, notably to family companies where husband and wife directors provide themselves with a large family vehicle, via the company, to take the two of them to and from work. There are tens of thousands of such companies. Such vehicles would normally be classed as cars and it is not the aim of the clause to change that in any way.

The provision removes the tax charge where a works bus is used to transport employees between home and work; it is part of our green transport package. However, in order to avoid potential abuse, the bus in question needs to be clearly distinguishable from a car, so the minimum seating requirement needs to be large enough to act as a deterrent against using a larger vehicle to attract a tax break. A fine balance has to be struck between avoiding a perverse incentive on the one hand, and, on the other, meeting the aims of the many employers who genuinely want to provide a bus service that will get a significant number of employees out of their own cars and on to buses.

Since the Committee stage, I have considered whether the 17-seat requirement could be reduced for works buses, and whether we could dispense with any seating capacity requirement for the public bus service exemption. As hon. Members will see from other amendments, we have indeed entirely removed the seating requirement for the public bus exemption. For the works bus, we felt able to come down significantly—by almost one third—to a minimum seating capacity of 12, which, I think, was the figure proposed in Committee by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett).

That does not reduce the minimum quite as far as was proposed in some of the amendments tabled in Committee. However, there would be a real danger of opening the way to avoidance, if a figure lower than 12 were adopted. None the less, the amendment, taken with the other relaxations that we have introduced, will go a very long way towards meeting the points that were made in Committee, and in representations to us.

Amendments Nos. 5 and 6 deal with concerns expressed in Committee that the wording of the conditions about qualifying journeys in a works bus was too restrictive, and that some specific relaxation should also be introduced to enable children of employees to travel on the works bus without prejudicing the exemption. As I explained in Committee, the original wording would already have permitted some non-qualifying journeys, but concern was expressed in Committee about the use of the word "only" in relation to the qualifying conditions. The amendments retain the main thrust of the exemption—to exempt employees on their home-to-work journey from any tax on that benefit—but we have now expressed that, in amendment No. 5, in a main-use test for home-to-work journeys. We have removed the references to "substantial compliance" and to "only" about which some hon.

[Ms Hewitt]

Members were concerned. I hope that makes it clear that, provided the main-use test is met, a certain amount of other use of the service can take place without the exemption being lost—that is the key point.

As regards children, within the main-use test provided by amendment No. 5, amendment No. 6 includes a specific reference to allowing the children of employees to use the bus. However, that does not involve any restriction of the opportunity for a limited amount of other non-home-to-work travel by individuals without the exemption being lost. Together, the amendments introduce a simpler and, I hope, more user-friendly concept of main use.

As I have pointed out, amendments Nos. 7, 8, 9 and 12 remove any seating requirement for the public transport service subsidy, because the avoidance risk in respect of husband and wife directors, to which I referred, does not really apply to a public passenger transport service. We have decided that we can dispense with any minimum seating test.

Amendment No. 10 responds to an issue that was brought to my attention in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey). He wanted to cater for situations in which, for example, bodies with particular experience in the transport sector, such as passenger transport executives, provide an intermediary service—brokering the necessary payment and transport arrangements with transport companies—on behalf of one or more employers. The amendment introduces a relaxation to the road service bus subsidy exemption, by removing the requirement that the subsidy, or other support, for the bus service must be provided directly to the operator of the service.

Finally, amendment No. 11 arises from the consideration that I promised to give to an amendment proposed in Committee by the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). The issue is whether the condition in clause 45—that the service must be substantially used for commuting journeys only—is necessary in relation to the exemption for employer subsidies to public transport services.

As I said in my reply to the Committee, under the transport subsidy exemption, employees have to pay the same fare as other passengers. In those circumstances, there is no need to be concerned about the number of occasions, in addition to the ordinary commuting journey, on which the employee otherwise uses the service. In reconsidering the matter, we see no further risk in making the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. I am happy to introduce an amendment to remove entirely the requirement for employees to use the public bus service substantially for home-to-work journeys.

The amendments simplify and improve the package of measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the Budget to give significant support to the growing number of employers who are introducing green transport schemes and, hence, providing an incentive to other employers to follow that example. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Flight: After I was privileged to be elected as the representative of the citizens of Arundel and South Downs, the first business that I visited was a mushroom farm employing about 500 people. The business was in a rural area and many of the employees did shift work. They went through various business issues with me, and two major political points arose. The first was the subsidisation by the EU of mushroom farmers in Ireland, but the second was the advice from the Revenue that the bus service provided for the workers would be taxed as a benefit in kind to the recipients. In view of the hassle of assessing what the benefit in kind might be, it was felt that the company should stop providing the service.

I wrote to the Treasury once or twice, before the present Economic Secretary was appointed. The responses that I received were not particularly encouraging, but the point of my preamble is to explain why I am delighted that the Government have introduced these measures. They are obviously common sense, if we want to cut down the use of cars in rural areas. The benefit in kind aspect is minimal, while the benefit to the rest of the community is substantial.

My main comment is on amendment No. 6. It struck me that there could be occasional use by children, but not by spouses. I understand the explanation given by the Economic Secretary as to the purpose of that limitation, but it struck me that that might not be adhered to in practice. It might present a problem, if one spouse and the children—for whatever reason—needed a lift to the workplace of the other spouse.

Secondly, such works buses could occasionally provide valuable help in rural communities, by giving a lift to old age pensioners; I am sure that, if there were space on the bus, such people could board it. I trust that such practical anomalies would not undermine the tax advantages of the whole scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My hon. Friend obviously knows his constituency remarkably well. Out of interest—I do not seek to score political points—and given the problems that the company might encounter, or the hassle to which he refers, are there other public service buses to carry out the service?

Mr. Flight: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. The bus services are not adequate; it would be a nightmare for many of those individuals to get to work. There are substantial time gaps in the existing services, and many of the staff would have to stop working for the company. Others would have to travel by car, scooter or other forms of transport. The example that I have given is a high-employment rural industry that is currently prospering and it is a wholly suitable beneficiary of the Government's proposals. There must be many other such cases, especially in rural areas, where labour-intensive employment is sought.

The rest of the amendments strike me as being fairly sensible, if occasionally slightly over-defined. We understand the underlying principle of avoiding exploitation of the concession by family companies, but if a 17-seat minimum is too high for the purposes of defining a bus, 12 seats is well in excess of the number found in a car. However, if a company were to use some form of dormobile, it is debatable whether 12 seats really means 12 seats. Amendment No. 12 appears to remove the definition of how the number of seats is counted, and I assume that that is done to permit a degree of practical flexibility in the matter.

However, the essential point is that the amendments are welcome. It is good news that the Government have modified their original proposals to make them as practical and user friendly as possible. I trust that the general enforcement guidelines issued to the Revenue will reflect common sense.

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): I welcome the amendments, which make a good clause much better. I particularly welcome amendment No. 10, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary for responding so positively to my representations in Committee. Amendment No. 10 removes the restriction whereby tax relief is payable only on subsidies from an employer paid directly to a bus operator for services provided exclusively to employees of that company. Ensuring that that tax exemption may also apply to subsidies paid via a passenger transport authority will strengthen the hand of PTAs to broker new bus services that serve more than one employer.

That is especially relevant to an area such as Rotherham, which I represent. Over two decades, we witnessed the destruction of the coal industry and severe damage done to our engineering, manufacturing and steel base by two deep recessions. The borough contains areas such as the lower Don valley and the Dearne valley which are now regeneration areas; they are strong on inward investment, but weak on public transport. Earlier this month, I met the recruitment manager of Ventura, which is a call centre that is currently investing in the Dearne valley and seeking to recruit about 4,000 employees during the next two years. She told me that the company had identified 200 unemployed people in the Dearne valley to whom it could not offer jobs because they did not have a car and so could not get to work. Good transport has a role to play in job regeneration.

The clause, as amended, will allow PTAs and employers to play their part in achieving the aim that the Government have set for the clause, which is the encouragement of greener transport means.

Dr. Cable: I should like to express my support for the measure and, in the process, thank the Economic Secretary for her response to representations on the previous clause. I was so gobsmacked that the Government had listened carefully to the criticisms, talked to the practitioners and responded sympathetically that I did not rise as quickly and as graciously as I should have done to express my appreciation. That was a positive development.

The season of good will appears to be upon us—we are being showered with presents and concessions. The current group of amendments is especially welcome. My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) asked the Government to examine the definition of a bus. He asked Ministers to consider size—specifically, 12 seats—as a means of introducing greater flexibility; and to consider intermediate means of transport that fall between the full-sized bus and the car. I am glad that the Treasury has considered those matters and has acted positively. I unreservedly welcome this positive development.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington): I, too, welcome the amendments and I shall join my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) in making favourable comments about them.

The measure before us is part of the Treasury's transformation into a much greener Department than it has hitherto been. I recall the Minister in Committee making a good case for actions taken in the Budget, and I recognise the amendment as part of that effort. Anything that encourages green transport plans is wholly welcome. As the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) said, they help in his part of the world, and they certainly help in rural areas. Jobs can depend on transport planning.

May I enter one caveat—or one encouragement, to put it more mildly? The Minister is not only the Economic Secretary but the Green Minister in the Treasury, so she may have noticed that the Environmental Audit Committee, of which I am Chairman, published a report this week in which we pointed out that, Department by Department, the Government were not setting an especially good example in developing Green transport plans. When the Economic Secretary attends the next Green Ministers' meeting, will she make a favourable report on the reception given to the amendments by the House of Commons in this debate, and encourage Green Ministers in other Departments to follow her excellent example?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 47

CYCLES AND CYCLIST'S SAFETY EQUIPMENT

Ms Hewitt: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 27, line 1, leave out from 'to' to end of line 3 and insert

'the condition that the employee must use the cycle or safety equipment mainly for qualifying journeys.'.

While the House is in a happy mood of consensus on environmental objectives—which was far less obvious in our earlier debate on the fuel duty escalator—let us turn to amendment No. 13, which again simplifies the provisions relating to tax relief for cycling, which is another part of our green transport package.

The amendment replaces the requirement that the tax exemption is available only if there is "substantial compliance with the condition that the employee must use the cycle or safety equipment only for qualifying journeys" with the condition that the equipment is used "mainly" for qualifying—that is, home-to-work—journeys. In other words, it does for bicycles what the previous group of amendments did for works buses. As I explained in Committee, there is no intention to withdraw the relief if the employee also uses the bike for private or leisure use. Provided that the bike is mainly used for the commuting journey, the tax exemption will remain. Of course, employers will not be expected to check up on their employees' other cycling journeys.

In Committee, concern was expressed—notably by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), who has since been translated into the Trappist position of Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Leader of the Opposition—about the apparently restrictive nature of the "substantial compliance . . . only" wording. Similar concern was expressed about the works bus exemption in clause 45. In the light of our amendments to clause 45, we thought that it would be helpful and welcome if we made a similar change to clause 47, to replace the "substantial compliance . . . only" formulation with a main-use test. That is what amendment No. 13 would achieve.

On the subject of green transport plans in general, I emphasise that Her Majesty's Treasury does, indeed, have a green transport plan. It encourages employees to use bikes and buses to get to work, and the proof of its success is demonstrated by the number of bike parks used within the Treasury building.

I commend the amendment to the House, in the certainty that it, too, will meet with an unreserved welcome.

7 pm

Mr. Flight: I support the amendment and, indeed, clause 47. As has been pointed out, the amendment applies similar common sense and fairness to cycling as the previous amendments did to bus transport. I cannot resist commenting that my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) could not have spoken on this amendment without declaring an interest as a regular cyclist.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): Does my hon. Friend think that it is rather shocking that, on such an important green issue, not a single Liberal Democrat is present?

Mr. Flight: They have clearly got on their bikes.

Interestingly, this measure will be used mostly in towns, whereas those that apply to buses will be most used in rural areas. It will be interesting to note to what extent the provision encourages bicycle transport in towns, because it amounts to a considerable tax perk. Companies will be able—as a result of the amendment, without too many strings attached—to give people bicycles on which to travel to work and to use privately. That may lead to a substantial increase in cycle transport in cities.

Not having looked up the definition of a cycle, I wonder whether the measure will be wholly limited to pedal-driven vehicles, or whether it will cover any degree of petrol usage, as might pertain to the French velocette. I suspect that the former will be the case. We support the amendment and the clause, and are grateful to the Government for introducing it.

Mr. Healey: I, too, welcome the amendment. It improves a clause that is already innovative and an important departure from the past. The amendment loosens and improves the definition for tax-exemption purposes of what counts as bicycle use. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will be aware that the all-party cycling group, which is so ably chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), has pressed this point. I believe that it will very much welcome the amendment, which represents a more realistic reflection of the way in which people use bicycles, and will do much to encourage more people to take advantage of the tax break.

I spent 10 years working in London without ever using the tube. I went everywhere on an old, sit-up-and-beg, single-speed boneshaker with rod brakes, which was worth a tenner, and would therefore not have benefited from the tax relief on capital cost under the clause. I used that bicycle for many non-standard work journeys—from C to D to E to F throughout central London—rather than just for the A to B, home-to-work journey every day. Will such use be covered by the provision as amended?

I shall leave my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary with a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Mr. Casale) in Committee. If the measure is to have the intended impact, people must know about it. I urge my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary and her colleagues in government to give serious thought to promoting this important and innovative tax change.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I rise not as a dissenting voice in the harmony across the Chamber, but merely to solicit some information.

My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) was, as ever, gracious in the way in which he responded to the Economic Secretary, but he did not ask the question which I thought he was about to ask. I am aware that some pedal bicycles are fitted with a small auxiliary petrol engine, which can be incorporated into the pedal power of the cycle when an adverse gradient is encountered. I do not know whether such a mechanism automatically switches on or whether the rider must activate it.

Mr. Healey rose—

Mr. Winterton: I am very happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman, who knows far more about these things than I.

Mr. Healey: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. He is referring to what in France is called the velosolex, to which the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) referred. It is activated with a lever and a clip. When one wants to lower the engine on to the wheel, one does so manually.

Mr. Winterton: It is at times like this that the House is at its most informative and helpful. I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs, whose knowledge on matters financial I respect, was about to ask whether such a pedal cycle would be included under the amendment. I hope that the Economic Secretary is listening; as ever in this House, I am trying to be helpful. Is the hon. Lady listening?

Ms Hewitt: Yes.

Mr. Winterton: Can the hon. Lady give me an answer to the question whether such cycles will be covered under the amendment which she so articulately and courteously moved? I see that those in the Box have quickly provided the answer—at least I hope they have.

Ms Hewitt: I must confess that I had not anticipated a debate about the meaning of the word bicycle, but clearly I should have done so. Perhaps it would assist if I drew attention to section 192 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, in which a cycle is defined as "a bicycle, a tricycle, or a cycle having four or more wheels, not being in any case a motor vehicle".

Therefore, I must disappoint the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) on the issue of velocettes or whatever. A bicycle that is powered by a motor would not qualify under the definition in the 1988 Act. Should the single market in power-driven bicycles take off, this is no doubt a matter to which we will return in a future Finance Bill debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) raised the question of non-standard journeys. Perhaps I can reassure him that, so long as the journey or any combination or element of it is related to work, the benefit from the cycle will not be taxable and the exemption will indeed apply. My hon. Friend also rightly raised the issue of publicising the tax exemptions that we are giving to green transport plans. We shall certainly be working with green organisations and cycling bodies particularly, as well as with employers' and employees' organisations, to ensure that people receive full information and are encouraged to take advantage of the exemptions.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs referred in our earlier debates to the flourishing mushroom factory in his constituency. Perhaps I may be forgiven for saying that we hope that as a result of this package, green transport plans will also mushroom.

Amendment agreed to.

RELEVANT DISCOUNTED SECURITIES

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 35, line 27, leave out 'sub-paragraph (2)' and insert

'the following provisions of this paragraph'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 16 to 24.

Mrs. Roche: Clause 61 is designed to prevent avoidance of tax through an artificial scheme that exploits a feature of the definition of a discounted security. The effect is that a discount on a security which should be taxed as income over the lifetime of the security is charged only as capital gains tax and only when the security is disposed of or redeemed. The clause changes the definition of a discounted security so that it will no longer be possible to use that device.

The Government received a number of representations expressing concern that the clause went too far and would catch securities for which any discount that arises is small in absolute terms and obtainable only in the case of an event that is outside the control of the parties to the security. We listened carefully to the industry and examined the representations. As I said in Committee, we recognise that clause 61 might catch some securities where it would not be appropriate to do so.

We therefore published, during the Bill's passage through the House, draft amendments for consultation, and we have received comments from practitioners. The amendments before the House are slightly different from those published in draft form and take into account our considerations following the representations that we received.

The amendments would target the clause more closely on the objectionable transactions. They deal with the concerns expressed about the current version of the clause, without reopening the possibility of the avoidance at which the clause is aimed. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Flight: The amendment, which we welcome, is yet another example of the result of over-zealous but somewhat sloppy initial attempts to introduce tax avoidance measures. The original proposals aimed to close a loophole through which bonds had been issued which offered a redemption premium in place of interest payments, and which had previously escaped the relevant discount securities regime. However, the proposals went much further and would trigger what is known as the Spens clause.

I should declare an interest at this point. I have some knowledge of bonds because I ran an investment management business for 25 years. There are unit trusts holding some £12 billion of bonds which, under the original proposals, could have found that their capital gains were assessed under income tax rules, and that would have affected hundreds of thousands of small investors.

As the Financial Secretary pointed out, the amendments serve—as was the original intent—to exempt from the anti-avoidance measure the Spens clause arrangements where redemption premiums can be paid at the issuer's option, in circumstances in which the owner can have no influence over that, except in cases of connected companies.

Various learned tax lawyers and the financial services industry generally take the view that the amendments reflect the Government's original intention. We therefore welcome them. However, although it can be difficult initially to focus anti-avoidance measures so that they will not cause injustices way beyond their intended effects, we should like to think that in future there will be a greater effort to get such measures right first time.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I thank Ministers on the Treasury Bench for finally getting their act together on this complicated issue. Why are they prepared to go to such lengths to make sure that these anti-avoidance provisions are sufficiently finely honed to deal with the mischief about which the Government were originally concerned, when last night, in the case of the sale of trust interests for capital gains tax purposes, they introduced a very crude anti-avoidance measure? It was so ill-thought-out—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not intend to dwell on what happened last night—we have moved on.

Mr. St. Aubyn: No, I do not mean to do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, we need to know why the Government are now making such an effort while in that case they were prepared to breach the terms of their own code for fiscal stability by not adhering to the cardinal principle of tax neutrality.

Mrs. Roche: It always pains me considerably to break the mood of consensus and all-party support, but I must do so. As the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) knows, because this is an anti-avoidance measure and substantial amounts of taxpayers' money are at stake, it would not have been appropriate to issue draft clauses for consultation before the measure came into effect. However, because this Government listen and develop our policies properly, the Finance Bill process allowed us to consult on the details of the measures and to make improvements.

In the gentlest way possible, I say to the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) that the amendments and the clause complete yet more unfinished business left to us by the previous Conservative Administration. They will know and appreciate that we have had to deal with the deficiency of definition in the Finance Act 1996.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roche: No. I say to the hon. Gentleman exactly what I said to him in Committee: in 1996, 200 amendments on this matter were tabled two days before the debate in the House, and the Conservative Government had to vote down a clause. I have great pleasure in commending the amendments to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 16, in page 35, line 32, leave out 'that is capable of' and insert

'of which there may be a'.

No. 17, in page 35, leave out lines 37 to 42 and insert—

'(1A) The occasions that are to be taken into account for the purpose of determining whether a security is a relevant discounted security by virtue of sub-paragraph (1)(b) above shall not include any of the following occasions on which it may be redeemed, that is to say—

(a) any occasion not falling within sub-paragraph (1C) below on which there may be a redemption otherwise than at the option of the person who holds the security;

(b) in a case where a redemption may occur as a result of the exercise of an option that is exercisable—

(i) only on the occurrence of an event adversely affecting the holder, or

(ii) only on the occurrence of a default by any person, any occasion on which that option is unlikely (judged as at the time of the security's issue) to be exercisable;

but nothing in this sub-paragraph shall require an occasion on which a security may be redeemed to be disregarded by reason only that it is or may be an occasion that coincides with an occasion mentioned in this sub-paragraph.

(1B) In sub-paragraph (1A) above 'event adversely affecting the holder', in relation to a security, means an event which (judged as at the time of the security's issue) is such that, if it occurred and there were no provision for redemption, the interests of the person holding the security at the time of the event would be likely to be adversely affected.

(1C) An occasion on which there may be a redemption of a security falls within this sub-paragraph if—

(a) the security is a security issued to a person connected with the issuer; or

(b) the obtaining of a tax advantage by any person is the main benefit, or one of the main benefits, that might have been expected to accrue from the provision in accordance with which it may be redeemed on that occasion.

(1D) In sub-paragraph (1C) above 'tax advantage' has the meaning given by section 709(1) of the Taxes Act 1988.

(1E) Subject to sub-paragraph (1F) below, where a security which is not a relevant discounted security but which would have been such a security if it had been issued to a person connected with the issuer—

(a) is acquired by a person who is so connected, or

(b) is held by a person who becomes so connected,

this Schedule shall have effect, in relation to times falling at or after the time of the acquisition or, as the case may be, the time when that person became so connected, as if the security were a relevant discounted security.

(1F) Where a security which—

(a) is a relevant discounted security, but

(b) would not be such a security but for sub-paragraph (1C)(a) or (1E) above, is acquired by a person who is not connected with the issuer, this Schedule shall have effect, in relation to that person, as if the security ceased to be a relevant discounted security at the time of the acquisition.".'.

No. 18, in page 35, line 42, at end insert—

'( ) After sub-paragraph (2) of that paragraph there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraphs—

"(2A) Nothing in sub-paragraph (2)(c) above shall prevent a security that would have been a relevant discounted security if it had been issued to a person connected with the issuer from being treated as a relevant discounted security by virtue of sub-paragraph (1E) above.

(2B) Nothing in sub-paragraph (2)(f) above shall prevent a security from being treated as a relevant discounted security by virtue of sub-paragraph (1C)(a) or (1E) above.".'.

No. 19, in page 35, line 43, at end insert—

'(2A) After sub-paragraph (6) of that paragraph there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraphs—

"(7) Section 839 of the Taxes Act 1988 (connected persons) applies for the purposes of this paragraph.

(8) In determining for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1C), (1E), (1F) or (2A) above whether a person is or becomes connected with the issuer, no account shall be taken of—

(a) the security mentioned in that sub-paragraph; or

(b) any security issued under the same prospectus as that security."

(2B) In paragraph 10 of that Schedule (issue of securities in separate tranches), after sub-paragraph (3) there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraph—

"(4) For the purpose of determining whether a security held by a person who is not connected with the issuer is a relevant discounted security by virtue of this paragraph, a security which—

(a) is a relevant discounted security, but

(b) would not be such a security but for paragraph 3(1C)(a) or (1E) above, shall be assumed not to be a security falling within sub-paragraph (1)(b) above."

(2C) In paragraph 13 of that Schedule (excluded indexed securities), after sub-paragraph (8) there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraph—

"(9) In this paragraph references to redemption, in relation to a security, do not include references to redemption of the security on any such occasion as, by reason of sub-paragraph (1A) of paragraph 3 above, is not to be taken into account for the purpose of determining whether the security is a relevant discounted security by virtue of sub-paragraph (1)(b) of that paragraph."

(2D) In section 92 of that Act, after subsection (6) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(7) Where an asset representing a creditor relationship of a company—

(a) ceases at any time to be an asset to which this section applies, but

(b) does not cease at that time to represent a creditor relationship of that company, the company shall be deemed for the purposes of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 and this Chapter to have disposed of the asset immediately before that time for the relevant consideration, and to have re-acquired it immediately after that time for the relevant consideration.

(8) Any deemed disposal and re-acquisition under subsection (7) above shall be treated for the purposes of that Act of 1992 as a transaction in the case of which—

(a) sections 127 to 130 of that Act would apply, apart from the provisions of section 116 of that Act, by virtue of any provision of Chapter II of Part IV of that Act;

(b) the asset in question represents both the original shares and the new holding for the purposes of those sections;

(c) the market value of the asset at the time of the transaction is an amount equal to the relevant consideration.

(9) Subject to subsection (10) below, in subsections (7) and (8) above 'the relevant consideration', in relation to an asset, means the amount that would have been taken, in accordance with the relevant accounting method, to be the value of the asset at the time of its deemed disposal if that method had been applied to the asset for tax purposes at all times until then.

(10) Subsection (5) above shall not apply in the case of a deemed disposal and re-acquisition under subsection (7) above; but the amount of the relevant consideration in such a case shall be treated for the purposes of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 as reduced by so much (if any) of the amount mentioned in subsection (9) above as is referable to interest which—

(a) is not paid or payable to the company before the time of the deemed disposal; but

(b) is interest falling to be brought into account under subsections (2) and (3) above as having accrued before that time.

(11) In subsection (9) above 'the relevant accounting method', in relation to an asset representing a creditor relationship of a company, means the accounting method which, for the accounting period of that company in which the deemed re-acquisition takes place, is used as respects that asset and the part of that accounting period beginning with the deemed re-acquisition.'.

No. 21, in page 36, line 3, leave out 'and (2)' and insert 'to (2D)'.

No. 22, in page 36, line 12, leave out 'and (2)' and insert 'to (2D)'.

No. 23, in page 36, line 20, leave out 'and (2)' and insert 'to (2D)'.

Clause 122

ECONOMIC AND MONETARY UNION: TAXES AND DUTIES

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 90, line 6, after '122.', insert '(1)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 32, in page 90, line 10, at end insert—

'(2) The said Commissioners shall make a report to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not later than 31st December 1999 on the exercise of their functions and on the amount and timing of the expenditure incurred in respect of subsection (1), and such report shall be laid before the Commons House of Parliament within a period of one calendar month.

(3) The Commissioners shall make further reports at intervals of six months, which shall similarly be submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and laid before the Commons House of Parliament.'.

Mr. Maude: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary, who is now departing the Chamber, for breaking our spirit of consensus, because that saves me the effort of doing so in this debate. That spirit could not last for ever.

We move the amendments because we regard the clause as profoundly unsatisfactory. The principle that we seek to serve through the amendments is a clear one. It is to ensure proper accountability by the Government in all of their spending. Nowhere is that need clearer than where the Government have pledged to spend an unspecified quantity of taxpayers' money in pursuit of British membership of the single currency, or the euro. That is the proposal that is contained within clause 122. It empowers the Commissioners of the Revenue and of Customs and Excise to spend money to prepare systems in advance of any political decision by the House or apparently even by the Government, let alone by the people, to join the euro and to scrap the pound. Systems can be prepared well before there is any question of there being a referendum, when people will have the choice whether they want to scrap the pound to join the euro.

When there is uncontroversial legislation, Departments will often spend some money in advance of a formal decision being taken by the House. However, there is no comparison between that traditional arrangement and the device that is being proposed in clause 122. Quite simply, the clause allows any amount of public money to be spent in advance of a decision following a national referendum, let alone of Britain actually joining the single currency .

Mr. Healey: How much would the right hon. Gentleman regard it as acceptable for the Inland Revenue to spend before a national referendum?

Mr. Maude: Questions about how much it is acceptable to spend should not be addressed to me. The Opposition have repeatedly asked what sums of taxpayers' money the clause allows the Government to spend. It is a blank cheque because no amount is specified. No estimate has been put before the House. The hon. Gentleman would do better to intervene when the Economic Secretary rises to reply, to ask her how much taxpayers' money she is proposing to shell out on this project without the people having had any chance to adjudicate on whether they want it to be implemented.

As the Government's turmoil over the single currency in the past month shows, the result of any referendum is no foregone conclusion, although that is what the clause is designed to try to achieve. The Government's natural inclinations show through in a measure that is oblivious to public opinion and wasteful of public money and that cocks a snook at democracy. I suppose that it is the natural solution for a Government who hope that the state can steamroller its way through public opposition into a project which few people in Britain seem to want. As the Prime Minister was forced to admit recently, hardly anyone in the country wants the project.

Above all, we see a pretty cowardly attempt to encourage businesses to do the dirty work of persuading people to want to scrap the pound. In what is no more than a charade now, the Government hide behind the five economic tests that they set out nearly two years ago and delay the day when they must make a public decision. The experts are more and more doubtful whether those tests mean anything. Mr. Buiter of the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee has said:

"Except through a fluke, the UK will not join EMU at a time when the business cycles . . . are synchronised."

The requirement or condition that the British economy should be synchronised or converged cyclically with the continental economies is a fundamental condition for Britain joining the euro. Yet here we have a Government-appointed expert saying that that will not happen.

The Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Mervyn King, recently commented:

"You would probably need 200 to 300 years of data. You will never arrive at a point when you will be confident that the cycles have converged."

I am referring to experts who have been appointed by the Government. They make it obvious that any decision to join the single currency that is taken by the Government will not be based on certain economic conditions being fulfilled. On the most important one of all—cyclical convergence of the economies—the Government's experts at the Bank of England say that, effectively, that will never be met. That is the clearest sign that, if they find themselves in the position to do this, the Government will fudge the conditions and move ahead anyway, which is what they want to do. That is why the Government are apparently willing to start spending money on preparations for Britain to join the euro. They wish to soften up the electorate now while maintaining that there is an economic tripwire in relation to the conditions. That tripwire does not exist.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the National Audit Office audits the accounts on an annual basis? What is more, the appropriation accounts focus specifically on areas where there might be difficulties of change. Therefore, the amendment is completely redundant. Can the right hon. Gentleman give any particular reason why the expenditure that we are discussing, which will be transparently reported by the NAO in two sets of accounts, should be the subject of yet another layer of bureaucracy and extra costs for his own party political reasons?

Mr. Maude: If that is all the case, that is a powerful reason for the Government, if they are genuine in their desire to be open about these matters, to accept the amendments. They will then be incorporated in the Act, as it will then be, and the requirement will be there. However, the House is being asked, effectively, to sign a blank cheque. We think that that is wrong. If, as we contend, the process is being handled wrongly, a proper requirement for full auditing and for full transparency on a six-monthly basis would seem to be the least that the House, in pursuit of its historic task of controlling expenditure, should require the Government to agree to. I hope that the Economic Secretary has heard the point made by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) and will be persuaded by him that there is no problem in accepting the amendments.

Mr. Davies: The amendments are about reporting, not limiting, the cost. I am contending that the cost is reported in any event. Therefore, the amendments are unnecessary and we should get on with business.

Mr. Maude: It would be advantageous in those circumstances for the amendment to be included in the Act so that there is an additional form of scrutiny. There is no way otherwise of exercising any control over the amount that the Government spend. The hon. Gentleman may be happy to tell his constituents that, in his great role as a Member of this place, exercising his historic role of controlling the Government and controlling public expenditure, he sat on his hands and thought that it was fine to write a blank cheque for the Government to spend. He may think that, but we do not.

Mr. Davies: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No. The hon. Gentleman has made two silly points already. He may want the opportunity to make a fool of himself again, but the House will wish to proceed.

There is every sign that the Government are happy to pick taxpayers' pockets to fund a measure that taxpayers patently do not support. There is no sign of Ministers being willing to commit themselves publicly either to the single currency or to an early referendum. I suppose that we should not expect an answer from the Prime Minister. He is rather like a first world war general. He is happy to push his colleagues over the top into the line of fire but is pretty reluctant to get tangled up in the barbed wire himself. General Blair is comfortably ensconced in his chateau ordering his faithful troops to clamber over the barbed wire when he blows the whistle. Not a peep from him, be it noted, until it comes to trying to trumpet and spin his new sceptical image on the single currency. Just the other day, he said that it was "daft" to consider entry straight away.

7.30 pm

Should we believe the Prime Minister's official spokesman, who said:

"The Prime Minister does not feel there is any need to persuade people to make a decision that does not yet have to be made"?

That was quite instructive. Why, then, do the Government ask the House to approve expenditure—to sign a blank cheque—in relation to a decision that the Prime Minister says does not have to be made yet? It is extraordinary. How persuasive is the Government's case to allow the Revenue or the Customs to spend public money, if the decision for which they are preparing does not, according to the Prime Minister, have to be made yet?

Perhaps we should turn to the Leader of the House for elucidation. She said recently that the referendum might not be called even in the next Parliament. Is that the official position? It rather looks as though those may turn out to be her famous last words. The confusion might be laughable, if those were not the people supposedly running the country.

A week or so ago, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said about the organisation Britain in Europe, which is campaigning for Britain to join the single currency, that

"because they"—

Britain in Europe—

"have changed their position the Prime Minister can endorse their programme."

That was all part of the web of confusion that the Government were so sedulously spinning, but it turned out not to be the case.

The noble Lord Marshall, the chairman of Britain in Europe, said immediately afterwards:

"We are not backing off the euro at all."

Clearly, the confusion runs far and wide.

Around the same time, the Prime Minister's famous official spokesman commented:

"I don't understand the purpose of Britain in Europe. Is its campaign about Britain in Europe, or is it saying it's the start of the campaign to join the single currency? The two things are entirely different."

He spotted that, anyway. The two things are indeed entirely different. What is puzzling is why he is so confused about the purpose. All that he needs to do is open the pamphlet issued by Britain in Europe and he will see there, as large as life and spelled out in words of very few syllables, that Britain in Europe is the campaign to persuade the British public that they should agree to scrapping the pound and joining the euro.

All the confusion has not impressed people in Britain in Europe. They said:

"We intend to press ahead with our campaign"— for Britain to join the euro—

"and we don't intend to hold back for anyone".

Mr. Leslie: I am grateful to the shadow Chancellor for giving way. He is trading statements, comments and quotes. What is his reaction to the comment

"It would be completely crazy and contrary to the national interest to throw away our option to join the single currency", especially as it was made by the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), his colleague on the Front Bench? What is his reaction to that?

Mr. Maude: A warm endorsement of our policy, which is not to throw away the option. The point that the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) has not got into his head is that the Prime Minister's and the Chancellor's policy of dragging Britain into the euro by stealth at the earliest opportunity is the policy that gives up the option. Once we have scrapped the pound and gone into the euro, we have no options at all, because the decision is irrevocable. As long as we stay out of the euro, we always have the option.

That is why our policy has always been the pragmatic policy. The dogmatic policy is the Chancellor's policy, which states that the Government are dogmatically committed in principle to Britain joining the euro. As soon as Britain joined the euro, if that were allowed to happen, the option would be gone. That is why the statement that the hon. Gentleman feels so clever for having quoted actually supports our policy.

Mr. Love: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. He mentioned the organisation Britain in Europe. Some of the best-known members of his own party are prominent in that organisation, and I note that they are not present in the Chamber this evening. Is not the Conservative party deeply split on the issue?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we should return to the clause and the amendment before us.

Mr. Maude: If that is the best that the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) can do, I suggest that he remains in a sedentary position.

Whichever of those apparently non-committal statements we prefer to believe—or none of them, in my case—the lack of leadership offered by the Government on the issue hardly makes a pressing case for the House to agree to the spending of money—the writing of blank cheques—that we are asked to agree tonight.

The national changeover plan—the handover plan—gives the game away, by showing that what we are being asked to do is not necessary. I refer the House to figure A in the changeover plan at page 18, which sets out a time line or critical path for Britain to scrap the pound and join the euro. It shows the various points: decision; referendum; UK joins; euro cash issued; and the end of the process, when the pound is finally scrapped.

There is a nice blue bar showing which process must start at which point. There is a bar marked "public sector", which I assume includes the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. That blue bar does not start now. It does not even start at the point at which the decision is made. The bar starts when a positive decision is made in a referendum. Even if there were a rock-solid certainty that there would be a decision to join, which there patently is not, we do not need to contemplate the matter now. The Government's own document makes that clear.

[Mr. Maude]

It is not as though there is nothing before the point of decision. There is a nice blue bar showing that there must be legislation before the referendum. The banks would have to make preparations before the referendum, but there is nothing in the figure about the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. It is all there, in the public sector. According to the Government's own document, nothing needs to be done until there is a positive decision in a referendum.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): I remember the right hon. Gentleman saying in 1997 that he would make it clear to his constituents that he would oppose any legislation to adopt the euro. Has he now changed his mind?

Mr. Maude: What I am doing today is opposing legislation to adopt the euro. I do not know how I can make it clearer than that. We think that the measure is wrong. We think that the Government should not be asking the House of Commons to sign blank cheques and to force the taxpayer to spend money. If there is not a decision to join the euro—the Prime Minister himself accepts that hardly anyone believes that we should—that money is wasted money.

We have still had no answers from the Government about how much money is involved. We have still had no answers about how many schools will not get their extensions, and how many wards will have to be closed down to pay for this utterly unproductive expenditure on which the Government are so keen.

When the Economic Secretary replies, I should be interested to hear her explain the fact that the graphic in the Government's document makes it clear that there is no case for the measure that the Government propose. That graphic seems to have escaped the attention of the spin doctors. It lets the cat out of the bag. It makes it clear that there is no basis for the measure.

Not surprisingly, given how distant the Government are trying to make the possibility of a referendum appear, the Prime Minister has been a bit woolly about how much money the Government would spend. In his statement on the national handover plan on 23 February, he referred to the Inland Revenue and the Customs, saying:

"They may need to spend some money prior to a referendum to make their information technology systems euro-compatible".

He moved on to give us an idea of how much "some money" is, saying:

"such expenditures . . . will amount to some tens of millions of pounds spread over a number of years."

Will the Economic Secretary tell us today whether the measure that we are being asked to agree to amounts to tens of millions of pounds? If so, how many tens of millions? She must have some idea.

I cannot believe that Treasury Ministers would ask the House of Commons for approval to spend money without having any idea of how much would be spent, but our questions are met with a deafening silence. The Government are absolutely sure that agreeing to the measure is the right thing to do, but they cannot tell us how much that will cost. They have not quantified the benefits of Britain joining this effort, and they cannot tell us how much that will cost. Not a flicker of an effort has been made to cost the costs and quantify the benefits. How do they expect to persuade anyone that this is a good project for the country when the Government cannot even get to that point?

Mr. Leslie: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. St. Aubyn rose—

Mr. Maude: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn). [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Shipley made such a poor fist of his previous intervention, I am saving him from embarrassment.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Prime Minister's readiness to tell businesses and taxpayers to reach into their pockets to spend money preparing for the euro contrasts starkly with his refusal to spend any of his own time promoting the project?

Mr. Maude: That is an absolutely fair point. The Prime Minister is keen to get other people to make the running because, although he and the Chancellor are absolutely committed to the project, to dragging Britain into the euro and to scrapping the pound by stealth—no one should be under any illusions about that—he is reluctant to put his head above the parapet because he understands that hardly anyone wants the euro. He has admitted that himself.

The Prime Minister makes the large claim that, "It's only tens of millions of pounds. That does not matter, it's just a rounding error." He justifies it by saying:

"The Government will be making active preparations for the euro, in the belief that it will be in this country's interests to join in the future should our economic tests be met."

We have already seen that those tests are bogus because the Government's own experts have accepted that the principal test will never be met. He went on:

"Business should start to do the same."—[Official Report, 23 February 1999; Vol. 326, c. 181.]

He seems to have overlooked the rather important difference between his Government's lavish spending plans and the day-to-day fight that many businesses face to survive against increasing regulation and mounting stealth taxes, which his Government are imposing weekly.

The Prime Minister seems to forget that, while 100 per cent. of small businesses pay the rising taxes that fund those spending plans, only six out of every 100 small businesses said that the euro would affect them a great deal and 46 per cent. said that it would not affect them at all. The big difference is that, although businesses have to budget carefully to remain in business, the Government think that they can throw money at the political problem, because the Prime Minister does not have the courage to take a lead on an issue that he knows is unpopular. He is trying to buy his way out of that with taxpayers' money, which is a case of, "Do as I say, not as I do."

That cannot be right—not when the funds needed to prepare for economic and monetary union may outstrip the cost of dealing with the millennium bug by as much as 5:1. Whereas the millennium is at least foreseeable, the Government seem to be doing their best to spin an opaque web of disinformation around their own position. Why should business spend money to prepare when they refuse to give a coherent lead? Why should the taxpayer and the small business man bankroll a Government who are so unwilling to give a forthright lead?

It has been estimated by Lloyds TSB that those preparations will amount to £2,000 for every small business in the land. For many, that money will not be an investment with any prospect of payback—46 per cent. of small businesses say that the euro would not have any impact on them at all because they are United Kingdom-based. After all, 83 per cent. of Britain's national output is not sold in the eurozone at all—it is sold either here in Britain or elsewhere in the world—but the costs of preparing will fall on 100 per cent. of British capacity.

There is little sign from the plan that the Government understand the demands of business. It talks blithely of how small businesses may have to take on extra staff to help the elderly to meet the challenge of the changeover, but small businesses cannot afford to take on more staff—certainly not with the cost and complexity of employing people increasing so rapidly under this Government. That is one reason why businesses are small.

The document's open advocacy of EMU is unfeigned. Talking, supposedly dispassionately, about the engineering sector, it says that

"50 per cent. of all engineering exports are to the EU. Historically, the sector has been vulnerable to fluctuations in the value of sterling."

What does that have to do with the changeover? The answer is nothing; it is just a party political broadcast on a supposed benefit of EMU. It is quite clear that, if the national changeover plan—which pretends to have foresight of which Nostradamus would have been proud—cannot avoid being political, we have every right to question the latest Government proposal to help to drag the United Kingdom into the single currency.

Mr. Leslie: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No, I shall make some progress now.

It is time that the Government started to tell the truth about the real costs of joining the single currency. According to one survey, the real costs for businesses of changing are turning out to be 10 times higher than the European Commission predicted. That is surprising. We believe that it is absolutely right that the Government should account for their own spending and should come clean about what those costs will amount to and what the money will be spent on. It is also time that the Government came clean about some of the constitutional issues involved in the decision.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I shall give the hon. Gentleman another chance.

Mr. Davies: As I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman's position is to keep his options open and, at some point in the future, he could conceivably put to the British people the question whether to join the single currency. Would it be wise to make some preparations for the contingency of joining or should we put the question to the British people with no hope of business and the public sector being prepared for the tremendous changes that we might see? Would he let the British public down in such a way or would he prepare?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman is clearly the sort of chap who starts building a house before he has even applied for planning permission. It is mad to start spending money on an eventuality that the Prime Minister himself admits people do not want to happen and which cannot happen unless most people agree in a referendum that it should. Even the Government admit that, so it is crazy to start wasting money, which is scarce. The public services and businesses need it to create new products, services, jobs and wealth, but the Government think that it is fine to spend in such a way.

If the hon. Member for Croydon, Central looks at the time lines set out in the document, he will see that there is a considerable period between a decision being made in a referendum and the United Kingdom joining.

Mr. Davies: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No, because plenty of other hon. Members want to speak in the debate. I have given way a great many times and I want to make progress. The fact is—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) to shout across the Chamber.

Mr. Maude: If the Government do not want to call a referendum to test public opinion, they should not be asking the House of Commons to agree to spend taxpayers' money, either on departmental preparations or on the changeover plan. Our proposal offers a simple precaution: the Commissioners of the Revenue and of the Customs should account for every penny that they spend to get ready for EMU every six months, as long as the position remains as it is. On such a controversial political issue, is it not right that taxpayers should have the right to know in detail how much of their money is being spent on the project—in arrears, at any rate? If the Government are not honest enough to set that out in advance—when they are asking for the money to be spent—we should know how much is being spent on this project, which most people do not want. Surely that is part and parcel of proper scrutiny in a parliamentary democracy.

In an age in which it is claimed that government have learned some lessons from business, it is surely right that the Government should set themselves some budgetary limits.

There is a good reason why the Government want to spend so much public money so far in advance of a referendum. They want to prepare to scrap the pound and drag Britain into the euro by stealth. They want to sap opposition to their plans through a vast state-sponsored spendathon, and to spend so much taxpayers' money that a headlong rush into EMU becomes the only plausible option. That is arbitrary government, not parliamentary government. That is why we have opposed, and will continue to oppose, the national changeover plan as a ploy dressed up in the language of prudence.

We shall continue to press the Government to sign up to the Neill report, which is of direct relevance to these provisions. They have shown a remarkable reluctance to sign up to the recommendations of Lord Neill and his committee. We should remind the House of one of his principal conclusions. The committee said:

"The Government of the day in future referendums should, as a Government, remain neutral, and should not distribute at public expense"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The matters that the right hon. Gentleman is raising are wide of his amendment. He should get back to the amendment.

Mr. Maude: I shall move on to my final remarks.

There is a direct parallel with the Neill committee's recommendation. The Government are spending money without parliamentary authority to make the drive towards scrapping the pound inevitable. It is wrong for the Government to be involved in the campaign using taxpayers' money, as they have done. It is wrong from them, in this clause, to spend taxpayers' money, which will be utterly unproductive if the British people decide that they do not want to go into EMU.

The Government want the so-called national changeover plan to be a national handover plan. We oppose the sleight of hand that goads business into spending money on something on which the Government will not risk their popularity. Their leadership on the single currency is leadership from behind. Proper accountability is the responsibility of any democratic Parliament, especially the House of Commons.

The amendment guarantees proper scrutiny, and is in line with the conclusions of the Neill committee, on which the Government have promised they will act. I commend it to the House.

Dr. Cable: I am a little mystified about the purpose of the debate. We have been given a half-baked analysis of EMU—a few throwaway lines about the problems that it presents—and an equally half-baked analysis of the scrutiny process and the constitutional issues. We are not focusing on either subject properly. There is a genuine issue of constitutionality in relation to the preparations, and it should be dealt with openly and transparently.

When we debated this matter in Committee, the shadow Chief Secretary raised some technical points about the constitutional nature of expenditure commitments. As I am not a constitutional lawyer, I do not know whether he was right or wrong. The shadow Chancellor did not persist with those points. I do not know whether it was because they have been answered, but we need to focus on that aspect. We need a proper analysis of the constitutional position, and that is why I surprisingly supported the request of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), among others, for a constitutional White Paper dealing with EMU in general and preparations in particular.

It is quite wrong for the Shadow Chancellor, to say that there is no mechanism for scrutinising this expenditure. As has already been said, the National Audit Office, the Select Committee on the Treasury, European Standing Committees and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's committee on EMU preparation, on which I sit and which has been convened precisely for that matter, exist for that purpose. I hate to remind members of the Conservative Front Bench that they were invited to sit on that committee. They procrastinated for three months: they put forward a name and then withdrew it. That committee is now meeting, and it has been fruitful.

Mr. Maude: Our position has been misrepresented before. When that Committee was being set up, we ascertained that it would not be involved in preparations for Britain to scrap the pound and to join the euro, and would be concerned solely with preparations for Britain to deal with the euro from outside while retaining its own currency. We thought that function wholly appropriate, so we nominated someone for the committee. However, we do not want to be involved in a process that we think quite improper until the British people have decided that they want to join the single currency. That is the time at which preparations should be made. One does not wheel the wagon half way across the river before asking the passengers whether they want to get to the other side.

Dr. Cable: I do not understand what impropriety is being committed, because the euro preparations committee comprises not only people who, like me, believe that Britain should be a member of EMU, but some fairly severe Euro-sceptics from Northern Ireland, who do not feel at all uncomfortable about sitting on that committee. It provides a forum. I have asked the chairman of the committee to prepare documents and to obtain from the Treasury detailed information on this preparatory process so that we can review it critically and perform a scrutiny function. Members of the Conservative Front Bench, whatever their original reasons, are missing a perfect opportunity that Parliament has provided.

To get back to the nub of the point, the objection seems to be that the Government should not engage in contingency planning for something that has not yet been approved by the British people in a referendum. That is irrational. The public and private sectors, in their different ways, engage in contingency planning: often very expensively. The defence budget is a form of contingency planning against events that we hope will never happen but for which we must be prepared.

As I said in Committee, I know from my private sector experience that many companies in the energy and property sectors spend large amounts of money purchasing options on future investments that they may never make. That is good commercial practice. We are confronted with a decision that we all agree—whether we are for or anti—is probably the most important that this country must make, and it should be taken well and in the full knowledge of what is required.

Mr. Swayne: Is not that the thrust of these amendments? They would allow us to scrutinise what is done with full knowledge. The hon. Gentleman seems to suggest that that scrutiny function should be carried out solely by his small committee. It should be undertaken by the whole House, as the amendments require.

Dr. Cable: That small committee would be larger in significance and number if the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues joined it. We could have many other scrutiny mechanisms. There is no justification for stopping sensible forward planning and contingency planning.

Other points, which were thrown into the debate off the cuff and not as part of a coherent theme, related to the economics of EMU. I was surprised that the Conservative spokesman quoted in defence the views of Professor Willem Buiter, whose articles I have read. Professor Buiter is an independent-minded member of the Monetary Policy Committee, and has gone out of his way to argue—as distinct from the Governor of the Bank of England—that Britain should be a member of EMU and, moreover, that it is likely to succeed. That is a different position from the one that the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) has taken, so it is an odd choice of witness.

The other point of substance that the right hon. Gentleman made, with which I partly agree, is that there must be a proper test of economic readiness to join. We all agree on that. I am not arguing for entry tomorrow. It must be on the right terms and conditions, the most important of which is the exchange rate, which is not one of the five tests at present. It is not correct to say that it is absolutely necessary to have complete cyclical convergence. There is no reason why that should be achieved. We should converge at the same low level of inflation, which is broadly what has happened, and our cycles should be broadly compatible, but the myth has been perpetuated that the British cycle is different from that of continental Europe. It has been since 1990, when German reunification created a divergence of our economies, but throughout much of the post-war period the British and German economies have moved in parallel, and there is no reason why that should not resume in a few years' time.

The purpose of the debate is not to discuss the pros and cons of EMU: I am happy to join in that debate at any other time. It is about parliamentary scrutiny. It is right that the Government should make prior preparations, and it is right that that should involve certain expenditure and should be scrutinised, and we have a mechanism for that.

I agree with the Conservative spokesman on one point. He is right to say that the private sector is being invited to take substantial risks. It is being invited to make preparations without being given the clarity that I would expect. It is unfortunate that we have not already had a referendum, although that is water under the bridge. I feel that the Government must be clearer and more forthright about where they are heading, about their commitment to join and about the timing. On that if on nothing else, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman.

Sir Peter Lloyd (Fareham): I strongly support the amendment. My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) put the case for it very well, especially in making the point that there is no real need to rush spending before the referendum. Figure A and the chart on page 35 of the changeover plan seem to endorse his view. Certainly, the amendment does not ask for very much; it simply asks for information, so that Parliament and the public can know how much the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are spending on preparation for our joining the single currency.

The single currency is a matter of growing public interest. In some it generates enthusiasm, as for an exciting new dawn; in others, it generates certain conviction that it will bring us no good. In most, however, it probably generates puzzlement and apprehension, as it becomes plainer that it is they who, in due course, will have to pass judgment, and say yes or no to the question of our actually joining.

The Finance Bill would give the Government authority to spend whatever money they thought fit to prepare the Revenue and Customs and Excise for the possibility that the answer will be yes. Because there is apparently no ceiling to that expenditure, the Government should surely, at the very least, keep a running total of what they spend, and then let the country know at regular intervals how much they are spending and on what.

This is not to deny the desirability of the Government's laying plans for our possible entry into the euro. As it is for the people to decide the matter by way of referendum, however, the Government should so organise themselves that the costs of joining are made clear, and the work that must be done to give effect to a yes vote is thought through well beforehand. The facts concerned are part of the evidence of which the public should be in possession, so that they can weigh them before deciding that the money is needed to put into effect the decision that they make.

I am sure that it is right for the Departments involved, when upgrading their procedures, programmes and equipment in the normal way of good housekeeping, to make certain that the new procedures, programmes and equipment are sufficiently versatile to handle the euro as well as sterling, so that greater expense and unnecessary delay are avoided if the voters eventually decide that joining the single currency would be to the United Kingdom's advantage. I am also sure that the Government ought to make the necessary plans and investment across the public sector to accommodate and facilitate trade in euros, and its use in domestic transactions when companies or individuals choose to make and receive payments in euros. That should be done regardless of whether we join the single currency. If we do not eventually adopt the euro, we shall want to be able to use it whenever it suits us, our businesses, or overseas visitors doing business here.

This country has prospered as a result of its openness and flexibility, dealing happily in any and every currency in which its customers want to trade. My own view has always been that, when the public are finally asked for their verdict, they will say no to a single currency. It is beyond the scope of this debate for me to say why, so I will not; but it is germane for me to say that I am not as worried as some of my colleagues—including, perhaps, my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor—that Government expenditure, assuming our entry into a single currency, will give the public the idea that entry is inevitable, and so cause them to vote yes in the referendum when they would have preferred to vote no.

It may be that some members of the Government who are enthusiasts for the single currency do have such an idea. They may see the unrestricted freedom to spend as a wonderful way of carrying the public psychologically into euroland before they have voted to join. I believe that such thinking, if it exists, is erroneous. I am sure that the public would resent and resist any attempt by the Government to use their money to foreclose on a decision that they, the public, had expected to make in due course—freely, in the light of the experience of other EU countries that have already adopted the euro. I believe that, if the Government really want to take us into the single currency, they will find it counterproductive to give the public the impression that their assent was taken for granted, or the impression that they—the Government—seek to engineer entry in advance by means of a series of faits accomplis, especially if they do that by spending money that would be wasted in the event of a no vote.

Such an action on the Government's part would be of dubious constitutional propriety. I will not expand on that, as the Bill would give the Government the legal right regardless of the proprieties, as my right hon. Friend said earlier. What I will say, however, in an effort to be helpful to the Economic Secretary—although my right hon. Friend may not thank me for revealing this—is that the Government will do themselves a disservice if they reject the amendment, and deny themselves the chance to show that they have nothing to hide and no ulterior motive, but merely wish to be open and frank with Parliament and the electors.

If the Government do reject the amendment, they will leave in the public mind a suspicion that, at the very least, they want to retain the option of not being open and frank. They will also leave my right hon. Friend to argue convincingly that they are not coming clean: that they do have something to hide, and that they are spending money that need not and, indeed, should not be spent at this point. He will be able to argue that money that could usefully be devoted to the real needs of health and education, and spent in many other constructive ways, is being spent to secure the result that the Government want in the coming referendum.

That will not help the Government. It will suggest to the public not that entry to the euro is inev able, but that the Government have no real confidence in the objective case. It will weaken the case for entry by suggesting that that case is not strong enough to stand on its own merits. In their own enlightened self-interest, the Government ought to jump at the amendment with alacrity, saying that as they were planning to do what the amendment requires them to do in any event, they might as well accept it.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): I want to ask the Economic Secretary a brief question. Does clause 122 really apply only to the possibility of expenditure by the Commissioners on taxes that are likely come out of stage 3 of EMU, or is it possible that it could also apply to taxes that are emerging irrespective of stage 3?

We know that a mass of taxation is beginning to emerge in the existing legislation to which we are attached. The Government are conniving and contriving to increase the pace of that taxation at a remarkable rate. Luckily, they have been caught on the hop in regard to, for instance, the withholding tax. Commitments have been made. An answer that I received this week from the Paymaster General stated that not only eurobonds but all other forms of savings would be included, which is good news. Nevertheless, we all know that a mass of taxation is beginning to emerge, irrespective of stage 3.

What does the Economic Secretary think of all the taxation that is beginning to emerge? Is it not right that the amendments should apply, so that at least we know a little more about that taxation and any expenditure that is likely to be incurred by the Commissioners? Is the Bill giving the Government powers to anticipate the panoply of taxation that is beginning to emerge, irrespective of stage 3?

Of course, it is true that, in relation not just to harmonisation, but to increased expenditure, under stage 3 of EMU, there will be a massive increase in taxation, to which the clause and amendments apply. We all know why that is to be. Under EMU, wages will not be flexible, but prices will be very much on the move upwards and there will have to be a massive transfer of funds from the northern, rich parts of Europe to the southern parts and, therefore, an enormous new system of taxation. If we enter EMU, there will be enormous increases in taxation. Therefore, the clause is applicable.

One can perhaps understand, although it is highly unsatisfactory, why the Government want to prepare for the massive increase in taxation that would occur under stage 3. The real issue before Parliament, however, is whether what we are really doing is passing a clause and a Bill that will give the Government power to create expenditure in anticipation not of stage 3, which the Government seem to be running away from anyway—which some of us think is good news—but of other bad news: what Lord Denning called the on-rush of European legislation, the tidal flow down our rivers and estuaries, which goes on and on. That applies to taxation as much as anything else.

Therefore, it is legitimate to ask: will the clause apply well before stage 3 is entered into? Are the Government not conniving, both implicitly in the clause, and explicitly in the Councils of Europe, in a massive taxation regime, to be imposed on this country, irrespective of stage 3 of EMU?

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): It is natural that high emotions should attach to any debate on economic and monetary union, the single currency and any aspect of it, because people feel strongly on the subject. A variety of emotions have already been expressed by Conservative Members.

I declare myself with my right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd), who says that he expects the people of this country eventually to vote no when the referendum is held. I also express the hope that they will vote no, but one does not need to get terribly worked up about the issue to suggest to the Economic Secretary that the amendment is thoroughly pragmatic and sensible and its rejection would be literally incomprehensible.

I agree with much of what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), the shadow Chancellor, but forget all that for a minute. I understand what the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said about the ability of Parliament to scrutinise the matter, but I do not understand why the amendment should do anything other than commend itself to the Government. I am sure that they have nothing to hide, but a rejection of the amendment would certainly suggest that they did.

The job of the House of Commons is to scrutinise the Executive. That would be made easier by the passage of the amendment, whatever other mechanisms already exist. I am sure that the Government have no wish to conceal from us any aspect of their expenditure in preparing to take us into a single currency—a move that is likely to be rejected anyhow by the majority of the British people.

I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker: do you think that any Chief Secretary to the Treasury would conduct negotiations with another Government Department which asked for a few tens of millions of pounds for something as on the basis of a bland assurance, say, "Oh that is fine, Fred. Have a few tens of millions for that"? We know that that is not the way in which such negotiations are conducted, but, so far, a bland assurance is all that the House has been offered. The Treasury notes on clauses simply say:

"the revenue departments may need to spend some tens of millions of pounds on preparations for possible UK entry to the single currency prior to a referendum".

I am against writing blank cheques in the House at any stage, never mind on a matter as controversial and important to the future of the economy and this country's constitution as the single currency. Does the Economic Secretary really think that she could conduct negotiations, if she were ever to be Chief Secretary, on the basis of assurances from her spending Ministers that they would live within their settlement—within the odd tens of millions of pounds here or there?

8.15 pm

My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham said that it was a debate between pragmatism and dogmatism. He is right. The amendment offers the pragmatic view. What is wrong with exposing the information to public scrutiny? It is simple dogmatism to reject it. It will be dogmatism that makes the House and the country suspicious of the Government's motive in seeking to conceal the information from the House and the people.

The Government have laboured mightily to bring forth their freedom of information proposals and they have been widely criticised. Surely, they do not want to hide information, but they are acquiring a reputation for doing so. Rejection of the amendment will enhance public scepticism about the Government's true motives.

I understand the problem for the Government, and for the Prime Minister in particular. On the single currency issue, as on many others, one could never accuse them of sitting on the fence. They come down firmly on both sides of it. The Prime Minister says that he is the friend of the pound, but, privately, he is an enthusiast for the euro. He says both things to different audiences to confuse the enemy and opposition, but the changeover plan shows where the Government's heart really lies. The Government owe it to the House and to the people who put them in office to explain how much money they are spending on trying to persuade the public to vote against their instincts and for membership of the single European currency.

How much money do the Government intend to spend as a result of the clause? A reference to tens of millions is not good enough for the House. No parliamentarian should go through the Lobby tonight to allow the Government, according to some vague estimates, to spend tens of millions of pounds on something as important as the single currency. No parliamentarian worth his salt should even contemplate allowing the clause to go unamended on to the statute book.

Yesterday, the Government rejected tens of millions of pounds of help for pensioners when there was the option to change the taxation of savings. We estimated that the cost would be £85 million, which is backed by independent analysis, but a wild figure of £1 billion was thrown out from the Dispatch Box. A few tens of millions of pounds would have made a great difference to those pensioners. A few tens of millions of pounds would make a great difference to the Worcestershire social services department, which could do with a few tens of hundreds of pounds, never mind tens of millions, to help it out with its difficulties.

I have the great honour to be Chairman of the Select Committee on Agriculture. Last week, we had before us the permanent secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Clearly, MAFF is scratching around for every odd pound that it can find here and there because of the incredibly tight settlement that was imposed on it during the comprehensive spending review.

The Ministry will face some difficult choices. A few tens of millions of pounds would help it considerably. The Government could abandon their plans to scrap harbour grants, and fishing safety grants, to cut research and development in MAFF and a host of other things, so why does the Treasury set one standard for itself on something as important as our membership of the single European currency, and another standard for every other spending Department? Why did we have the comprehensive spending review? Why did they not just say, "The Government are spending a few tens of billions pounds next year" and leave it at that?

It is preposterous, incredible and an affront to the House that the Government should insist on proceeding with the clause unamended. The Economic Secretary shakes her head in disbelief. I shake mine in disbelief at her. Tens of millions of pounds is a lot of money for every man, woman, child and family in this country, particularly when it is being used to prepare the country for something that it does not want.

Mr. Horam: The clause is a relic of the halcyon days, from the Government's point of view, when they thought that life in government was simple. The plan was obvious—they were hoping to win the next election, and if they did, legislation would be introduced to hold a referendum shortly thereafter. They would hope immediately to win a yes vote for entry into the euro. All would follow, so there had to be a national changeover plan.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) made the point that the national changeover plan contains a lovely chart, which sets out clearly where we proceed from one point to the end point, where we end up with notes. I noticed that it also said "end cash", which, in these circumstances—as I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) will agree—is rather symbolic. Nevertheless, a timetable of three and a half years was established.

Sadly, from the Government's point of view, those halcyon days are over—there are no more glad mornings. Since the European elections, the process has become etiolated, and it has been put ever further into the distant future. Should the Government win the next general election, will there even be a referendum in the first half of the next Parliament? Will there be a referendum at all in the next Parliament? How long will the process take? Even the Prime Minister must realise that the process will take much longer, and that it is much vaguer than it was a year ago when the national changeover plan was proposed. The process has become extraordinarily vague, but clause 122 encapsulates the sense of certainty that the Government have lost.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) said, there is also the matter of the blank cheque. How much will be required? The Government have mentioned tens of millions of pounds for the process, although Tim Congdon and other economists have calculated that, if we were to go into the euro, the total changeover cost would be £2.5 billion; and that, even if we do not go into the euro, the cost will be £750 million. Those figures are being bandied about, and they cannot be totally irrelevant to the Government—who purchase 40 per cent. of everything purchased in the United Kingdom. The Government have huge purchasing power. Although they have vouchsafed to the House a potential changeover cost of tens of millions of pounds, the extent of their own procurement ensures that the changeover will have a far greater effect on them than that.

I remember when my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire and I were in government, and we were castigated by the then Opposition for signing an allegedly blank cheque for the private finance initiative; yet the PFI was operated wholly within departmental—in my case, the Department of Health—budgets, which could not be exceeded without the Treasury's agreement. However, clause 122 would go beyond any agreement between the Treasury and a Minister. It deals not with a certain unspecified sum that would have to be agreed between Departments, but, literally, with a blank cheque.

The fact is that we are now so far down the line—it is a year since the changeover plan was proposed—that Ministers must have some estimate, even a guesstimate, of the sort of figures involved in the changeover plan. The House should be told that estimate. I agree with my hon. Friends that we should be failing as parliamentarians, not to mention as Opposition Members, if we did not press for that information.

The hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies), in an intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham, made the fair point that Opposition Members are not attempting to limit the spending provided in clause 122—and we are not. It would be foolish to try to limit the spending, as we do not know—any more than the Government do, apparently—the correct figures. We are simply trying to expose the information that is available. It is a matter of accountability, not simply of disagreeing with the figures proposed. We simply want the House and the public to know what is likely to be spent, what is being spent, and even what will be spent—as my hon. Friends have said—retrospectively on those very important matters.

Mr. Love: I have listened very carefully to the hon. Gentleman's comments, and he has finally got to the nub of amendment No. 31—parliamentary accountability. However, as Labour Members and the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) have said, there is already such parliamentary accountability in debates in this Chamber on the Public Accounts Committee's reports. Opposition Members should tell us why that parliamentary scrutiny is not acceptable.

Mr. Horam: First, that is an annual accounting. The National Audit Office examines matters annually, after which the Public Accounts Committee has to decide whether to deal with a specific expenditure item. The Committee has to choose from a crowded list of matters, and it may not have the time, even annually, to examine a specific subject in depth—as the changeover should be examined.

We are not asking for something that the Government are not already doing. In the Government's own document on the national changeover plan, at the very end they state:

"The Treasury will report on progress on this further work in the euro preparation unit's next six-monthly report and produce a further plan in around a year's time."

We are simply asking for the EPU's six-monthly report to the Treasury to be reported also to the House. In their own document, Ministers state that they believe that six months is the right interval in which to report on that expenditure stream. I therefore think that it is not unreasonable for hon. Members to ask for any progress to be reported to them in a sensible way. I also do not think that the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee are the right forums to deal with that six-monthly report.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): My hon. Friend is making the most interesting speech. Does he agree that—unless we have that canard come back to us from the Minister—there is a third reason for the House to be provided with the information? The National Audit Office could justify the expenditure as wholly effective and proper—as it would be achieving the very result that the Bill was trying to make it achieve—even if huge sums were spent with the sole purpose of driving us into the euro.

Mr. Horam: Indeed. The other point is that, by definition, the National Audit Office will take a non-political view on the matter, but does not always have the access to Government papers that it should. Perhaps it should have further powers. Moreover, the Public Accounts Committee, with a Labour majority, may or may not decide that it wishes to investigate the matter in depth.

We are right to want to consider the matter separately. There should be an audit trail so that we can examine the matter systematically and discover how the expenditure is being used. We need to know not merely the total amounts involved, but how the money is being spent. I assume, from what the Government have said, that the national changeover plan deals not with private sector expenditure but with expenditure by the public sector for its own purposes. It also provides for information to be provided to the private sector so that it may prepare for a putative national changeover to the euro. That is the content of the changeover plan.

Mr. Loughton: What possible confidence can we have in the Government's accountability to this House when every time Opposition Members have asked Treasury Ministers for a rough idea of the sort of amounts involved, they have wholly and utterly evaded any figure, or even a stab at a figure?

Mr. Horam: My hon. Friend is right; we will get no estimate this evening from the Economic Secretary. I give full credit to the hon. Lady for her words on green and environmental matters, but on this matter she will be bound tightly by Treasury rules and will not be able to say anything about possible expenditure. However, we are some way down the track on these matters, and we should by now have some idea of what is likely to be spent.

Mr. Luff: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a question not just of the amount of money but, how the money is actually spent? The lack of any definition of categories of expenditure is extremely worrying and could have wide-ranging implications. The clause, as drafted, is capable of wide interpretation.

Mr. Horam: My hon. Friend is right. I have looked through the reports on the national changeover plan and I can find nothing other than two vague categories in this area—public expenditure on its own purposes, and measures to inform the public of what is happening. We need more definition, clarity and exposure to parliamentary scrutiny.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham that the proposal is simple pragmatism, although I disagree with those who talk about emotion. This is low-key matter of parliamentary scrutiny, so we can take the emotion out of it. Whether one is for or against the euro, this is a matter of simple, pragmatic parliamentary exposure and discussion which should be dealt with on that basis. I hope that, in those terms, the Government can agree to the amendments.

8.30 pm

Mr. Swayne: Were I an evangelical advocate of the abolition of the pound—and, despite the Prime Minister's belief that such a position is daft, I understand that such people exist—I would nevertheless advocate that the Government accept the amendments. The existence of clause 122 demands such scrutiny. The clause states:

"Customs and Excise may incur expenditure".

I am afraid that I did not follow my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) in his assertion that tens of millions of pounds were involved. Any amount of money might be involved over any period of time.

Mr. Luff: For the record, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. That was not my estimate; I was relying on the vaguest estimate that we have from the Government, which is in the notes on clauses. The amount could be hundreds of millions of pounds.

Mr. Swayne: I thank my hon. Friend for that clarification. That begs the question: on what might those amounts, whatever they might be, be spent? The clause states that Customs and Excise may incur expenditure

"to exercise their functions relating to taxes and duties (including agricultural levies of the European Community)."

Despite racking my brains, I am unaware of how those concerned might properly spend any sum of money, never mind the unspecified amounts suggested by the clause. Therefore, the clause demands the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude). It demands scrutiny and accountability. The lack of accountability and any proper answer to our questions adds to the requirement for such scrutiny.

I will listen with interest to the Economic Secretary when she tells us precisely how she anticipates these funds will be spent. I hope that she will do so when she gets up to tell us that she will accept the amendments. Any reticence on her part, or any decision not to accept the amendments, will only reinforce the sense of suspicion and concern that something is being stitched up behind people's backs in precisely the same way as in 1975, when the people were duped, and one campaign, the "Britain in Europe" campaign, outspent the 'No" campaign by 10:1.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) has left the Chamber. He asked in what way the amendments provided any control over expenditure. In one sense, he was right: they do not give us the ability to control expenditure—which, if I may say so to the Economic Secretary, is a good reason why she should accept the amendments. They do not give us the ability to control whatever it is that she wishes to spend on whatever it is that she wishes to spend it on. They merely give us the right to know what she has spent and what she has spent it on, which would at least provide some constraint on the expenditure.

Not only do we not know what will be spent and what it will be spent on, but we do not know for how long it might be spent. I suggest that it could be a very long time indeed. The Government have made it clear that the event that the expenditures are designed to achieve—the abolition of the pound—cannot happen until there is sustained convergence.

I did not agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) that convergence had already taken place and that the British economy had moved closer to the European economies in the late 1980s. If the British economy is moving in an orbit around the European economies, it is an elliptical orbit, because it would appear that over the past 25 years it has diverged rather than converged.

The key question is: what has caused that? I suggest that the principal cause is the volume of British trade that takes place with the United States and elsewhere and the consequentially large volume of assets and asset income. Because of those long-term changes, it is highly unlikely that the Government's timetable will be realised. The time scale for the expenditure is in fact very long, so it is highly pertinent for us to have the scrutiny that the amendments offer, which would preserve Parliament's ability to hold the Government to account.

Mr. Loughton: Conservative Members have made some powerful points. It was clear that the debate was not going the Government's way when the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) was summoned away by pager and the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) wafted in. I fear, though, that the heat has been too intense even for him and he has slunk away because even he knows that it is a losing battle. He has gone off, officially or unofficially, to represent the No. 10 view with yet another anonymous foreign diplomat.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd) put his finger on it: the debate is not about whether and when we want to join the euro or what damage or good it may do to the economies here or in Europe, but about transparency and democratic accountability.

Today, the Economic Secretary has been in Committee debating the Financial Services and Markets Bill, which is all about accountability, cost to consumers and industry and the guarantee that we are seeking that everything will be up front, which I hope the Government will go along with. This afternoon, the Secretary of State for Health said that of course all the costs of his new-fangled health plan would be made public—so it is ironic that this evening, on an open-ended and potentially enormous issue, the Government are asking for our authority for an entirely blank cheque. As my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor said, that cocks a snook at the whole democratic process.

It was only on 23 February that the Prime Minister—uncharacteristically—came to the House and devoted all of 67 minutes to announcing the changeover plan and answering questions on it. That has been the House's sole opportunity to question a member of Her Majesty's Government on the changeover plan. Attempts to secure other appearances have been evaded and wafted aside. Yet within a month of that statement, the Bill was published, with this provision hidden deep among the latter clauses. It gives the Government the most enormous blank cheque which, as my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) said, is not even time dated.

I am not in the business of writing blank cheques. No Conservative Member is. When I receive a tax bill from the Inland Revenue I expect to pay the amount stipulated at the bottom. I do not expect to pay an amount that may be thousands—or even tens—of pounds more. Similarly, when I get my council tax bill I expect to pay the amount stated, not some amount that may be much higher, of which I may—or may not—be informed at a later date, for added expenditure whose details may—or may not—be revealed.

It is ironic that the Government should go on about all their proposals being fully costed. They have done so since before the election. They constantly go on about measures that will be paid for by taxation elsewhere.

Earlier this afternoon, the Economic Secretary used a well-worn phrase when she spoke about the "black hole" that would be left by Opposition proposals, but this clause makes a black hole look like a vicarage tea party. The Government should never again have the temerity to ask Conservative Members how much our amendments to legislation might cost. That remark displayed nerve beyond belief.

The clause is about the inevitability of gradualism, by means of which Britain will be driven into the euro behind everyone's back. It is about membership of the euro by stealth. If the Government stick to their promise of holding a referendum on the matter, the balance of probabilities is that the British public will vote resolutely against entry into the euro. That was true a year ago and remains true now. It will still be true in two years, and in the dim and distant future.

The latest opinion poll showed opposition at a record level, with more than two thirds of the public against joining the euro. The Governor of the Bank of England has said that going into the euro would be the most enormous leap of faith. Just two weeks ago, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, on his not terribly successful visit to China, admitted that Britain's economy was large enough to merit having its own currency. So why are the Government asking for funds to go completely against that statement of fact?

The Government's policy ignores the fact that 80 per cent. of the world's financial trade, and 60 per cent. of commercial trade, is transacted in dollars. So what are the Government doing about preparing to ensure the stability of the dollar? That is a far more important currency for our financial and commercial markets, and is likely to remain so for some years, but the Government are doing nothing to ensure its stability.

What are the Government doing to plan for what the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) called the contingencies of a no vote in a referendum? Everything is geared to a yes vote being secured. Nothing is being done to prepare for a no vote, or to protect our more important trade conducted in dollars.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that, unless our amendments are passed, the situation will be perilous indeed? The president of the Bundesbank has said that within a single European currency it is an illusion to think that member states can retain their autonomy over taxation policy, but the Government have always rejected that view. Does not my hon. Friend think it peculiar that clause 122 provides for the exercise of functions relating to taxes attendant on entry to European monetary union, when previously the Government have insisted that the prospect of income tax control through EMU was a nonsense? Is there not a contradiction in the Government's position? Have the Government not slipped out the truth, so to speak, by stealth?

8.45 pm

Mr. Loughton: My hon. Friend puts his finger precisely on the point. So great, in fact, is the emergency before us that the Chancellor has joined us for the first time tonight. The right hon. Member for Hartlepool plainly pressed all the panic buttons when he left the Chamber.

Mr. Maude: He would not have phoned the Chancellor.

Mr. Loughton: Wonders will never cease. There has been yet another shift in alliances within the Government.

Only 18 per cent. of the United Kingdom economy is involved in Europe, but 100 per cent. of British business, industry, shareholders and taxpayers will have to pay the cost of a highly expensive, but uncosted, contingency changeover plan. We are always promised cost assessments, but the absence of one for the plan is stark. It is amazing that, before they deal with any of our EU problems—the common agricultural policy, fraud in the Commission, our rebate, the withholding tax, unfair tax competition that penalises our enterprises, and much more expensive social costs—the Government are trying to commit the British people to enormous and unlimited expenditure, although even the Prime Minister has doubts about which side of the fence to come down on.

It is bad enough to be asked to write a blank cheque and to open up a funding black hole. It is worse still that the bank account holders—the British people—are not allowed to know the amount to be written on that cheque, when it will be written or for what it will pay. I do not share the confidence of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) because I think that the Government are hiding something. Transparency is the best regulator.

Mr. Luff: I know that it is not the custom of Hansard to put "irony" in brackets after our comments, but I hope that mine were heavy with it.

Mr. Loughton: My hon. Friend spoke so subtly that I did not wish to disrupt the bonhomie that he engendered across the House.

Transparency is the best regulation and the best measure of accountability. The amendment does not deal with the whole issue of the euro, but simply seeks accountability and the ability to hold Labour Members and the Government democratically to account on behalf of our constituents. The changeover plan is purely a contingency plan, but potentially the most expensive contingency in history. We should have none of it.

Ms Hewitt: It is fair to begin by saying that Conservative Members have livened up somewhat during this debate. Indeed, we have heard from almost every Conservative Member present, except of course the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). It is hardly surprising that he has remained completely silent on the issue.

Once again, the debate has shown that the Conservatives are indeed a single-issue party. It would appear, at least this evening, that they are a single-sex party too. We have heard a great deal of nonsense this evening in an attempt to whip up some excitement on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Luff: At least we Conservatives are here in numbers to discuss one of the most important issues that faces the United Kingdom, unlike Labour Members.

Ms Hewitt: I do not think that we need to worry about the numbers this evening.

The nonsense that we have heard from Conservative Members started with the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), who accused the Government of asking Parliament to give us a blank cheque to spend—a phrase with which Conservative Members were clearly so impressed that several of them repeated it. That is complete rubbish. Clause 122 establishes the propriety of expenditure by Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue on preparations for the possibility that the United Kingdom might join the single currency. It does not remove Parliament's right to scrutinise the expenditure, or the requirement for Parliament to give legal authority for such expenditure each year through the annual supply estimates and the Appropriation Act.

It might be helpful if I remind hon. Members that statutory authority for the payment of expenditure out of moneys provided by Parliament must be given each year and can only be given each year by the supply estimates and confirming Appropriation Act. Any expenditure by the Government on euro preparations, like any other expenditure out of moneys provided by Parliament, will have to be authorised each year by Parliament in the annual Appropriation Act, which provides the legal authority for the expenditure.

Mr. Maude: If that is the case, will the Minister undertake that the House will have the opportunity to debate separately the sums allocated for that line in the Budget?

Ms Hewitt: We will treat it like every other line in the Budget. I am surprised at the right hon. Gentleman. He did not refer to the constitutional practice that was enshrined in the 1932 concordat between the Treasury and the Public Accounts Committee. I assume that as a former Treasury Minister he is familiar with that concordat. It is a rule of propriety that continuing functions of Government, in particular when they involve financial liabilities that extend beyond a given financial year, should also be defined and covered by specific statutes. It is in accordance with that rule of propriety that clause 122 provides specific statutory authority for expenditure on euro preparations.

Mr. Maude: I take it from what the hon. Lady says that the answer to my question is no, the House will not have such an opportunity. If she cannot supply that and as she claims that this is not a blank cheque for the Government, will she tell us what number will be on the cheque? How much money is she proposing to spend? If she does not know, she has the Chancellor at her side—he seems to have come to life—and she should ask him.

Ms Hewitt: I shall come to the figures for expenditure in a minute. As I said, expenditure on that matter will be treated in exactly the same way as any other expenditure from moneys authorised by Parliament. Perhaps it is not surprising that the right hon. Gentleman, who is Maastricht man—the man who signed the Maastricht treaty on behalf of the previous Government—wants to divert attention from his record by his obsession with clause 122.

I shall spell out the procedures once again because the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues seem to have forgotten them. As with all expenditure incurred by revenue Departments, Parliament votes through estimates. Forecasts of euro preparation expenditure would be included in those estimates. The annual appropriation accounts report the actual outturn against the figures projected in the estimate and those are laid before Parliament in the January following the end of each financial year to which they relate. Moreover, the annual departmental reports, which are laid before Parliament around the end of March, provide a backward look to the previous financial year as well as a forward look to the coming financial year and expand on the detail contained in the estimate and appropriation account. I remind the House of that because so many right hon. and hon. Conservative Members seem to have forgotten it.

There are three main reasons for pre-referendum spending in the Revenue Departments.

First, unless we undertake the necessary practical preparations, the United Kingdom will not be in a practical position to join—even if that were in the national economic interest. That is especially true of the Revenue departments, whose computer systems are among the largest and most complex in Europe.

[Ms Hewitt]

Secondly, if the UK were to join the single currency, our Revenue departments would come under pressure from UK businesses to allow taxes to be assessed, reported and paid in euro. That would be no more than was offered by countries which participated in the first wave. We have allowed taxes to be paid in euro from 1 January this year. So far, the investment that we have made in IT and other systems to enable that to take place has been small—about £150,000. We considered that to be commensurate with a relatively low take-up. Even without extending the euro options for UK businesses, increased take-up of existing options would require significant investment to ensure cost-effective and accurate services. I am sure that hon. Members would want that.

Thirdly, by making relatively small and well-targeted expenditure now, we can save substantial sums if the UK were to join. That is effective public sector planning, to deliver best value for money, of the kind that any sensible organisation or business would undertake.

The right hon. Member for Horsham and several other hon. Members asked me for detailed figures as to expenditure. I shall set out exactly what was spent up until the end of February 1999. The public sector spent £27 million on ensuring that the City of London and many businesses and departments were able to deal with the euro from its introduction on 1 January. The Bank of England, the euro preparations unit in the Treasury, Revenue departments and the Department of Social Security accounted for most of that preparatory spending. Less than £2 million has been spent on preparing for the possibility of UK entry. The Bank of England spent about £16.6 million preparing for 1999—£17 million in total. The euro preparations unit spent £8.5 million, of which only about £50,000 was related to possible UK entry.

Customs and Excise spent £0.8 million on 1999 preparations—£0.2 million on planning for possible UK entry. The Inland Revenue spent £0.15 million on 1999 preparations—£0.35 million on planning for possible UK entry. In both cases, the spending on preparations for 1999 was to ensure that firms could pay taxes in euro from its launch. The DSS has spent about £0.5 million in total—almost all of which was geared towards possible UK entry, including £0.3 million on set-up and staff costs and £0.2 million on IT analysis. I hope that no Conservative Member will accuse me of lack of detail in these matters.

I point out to the House that the extraordinary concern of Conservative Members over the relatively small amounts involved in this matter sits ill with their complete indifference to the £5 billion hole in their own spending plans, arising from their resistance to the fuel duty escalator and other matters that we discussed earlier.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): The hon. Lady has given precise figures, broken down between departments and functions, for moneys spent up until the end of February. Will she give us the Budget figures for prospective expenditure under the same headings? To return the phrase that she used, any well-managed—or half well-managed—business or organisation would have a budget with precise figures. If the organisation for which she is responsible is at least half well-managed, she will have forward budgetary figures. Will she give them to the House?

Ms Hewitt: In the current financial year, the Inland Revenue plans to spend about £5 million, and Customs and Excise plans to spend about £10 million in total. As for the years beyond that, the planning that we are undertaking at present, following the publication of the outline national changeover plan, will enable us to produce detailed figures. They will be dealt with in the normal way, through the procedures that I have described.

Mr. Letwin: I am most interested in the figures the Economic Secretary has just given. She has told us the spending that is planned for this year—figures of £5 million and £10 million. In which estimates were those approved, and which debate that occurred in this House inspected the validity and propriety of that expenditure?

Ms Hewitt: They are part of the normal estimates, dealt with in the proper way. If the hon. Gentleman did not notice them at the time, that is his problem.

It is absolutely fascinating to have heard from the two sides of the Conservative Treasury team. The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford said in 1996:

"It would be completely crazy and contrary to the national interest to throw away our option to join the single currency. The British people would not respect a Government that did such a thing."

He went on to say:

"Taking irrevocable decisions before you have to and before all the essential facts are available is bizarre and indefensible"

He is describing the policy of his own party, on whose Front Bench he now sits, as "crazy", "bizarre and indefensible" and

"contrary to the national interest".

Mr. Davies: I had better state it quite explicitly, so as to remove any doubt from the hon. Lady's mind. The quotation she has just delivered describes precisely the Conservative party's position on this issue, which I have the honour to defend from the Front Bench.

Ms Hewitt: That is the entirely bizarre explanation that was offered by the right hon. Member for Horsham when he opened the debate. If I understood him correctly—it was difficult to follow his arguments—it is now the Conservative party's position to keep open the option of joining the single currency by ensuring that the British people are never given a chance to join. It is impossible for the Conservatives to square their policy of keeping open the option of joining with their other policy of establishing a constitutional principle that rules out the possibility of joining for five years, 10 years or for ever, depending on who is speaking.

Mr. Bercow: Will such expenditure be undertaken only upon the assumption of continued direct taxation sovereignty, and rejected without it?

Ms Hewitt: We have made it clear on numerous occasions in the House and elsewhere that tax harmonisation—harmonisation of direct taxation—is not required by possible entry into the single currency.

The House knows well the Government's position on the question of taxation, specifically the withholding tax, which has been mentioned.

The fact is that there are three possible positions on the question of the single currency. The first is to rule it out, even if joining a successful single currency would be good for Britain. That is the position of the Conservative party, which has now become the anti-European party of British politics.

Mr. Davies indicated dissent.

Ms Hewitt: Apparently, that is not the Conservatives' position any longer. Perhaps the right hon. Member for Horsham—Maastricht man—will clarify the position once again. We have heard many different policies this evening, so the right hon. Gentleman, who signed the Maastricht treaty, should tell us what the Conservative policy is.

That is one possible policy: to rule out joining a single currency on principle, even if it would be good for Britain. That policy was described, correctly, by the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford as "crazy", "bizarre" and

"contrary to the national interest."

The second position is that we should join the single currency as quickly as possible, even if doing so were bad for this country. That indeed would be "crazy", "bizarre" and even though it is supported by some hon. Members.

"contrary to the national interest",

The third policy position—the position of this Government—is to join a successful single currency if it is good for Britain. If the economic benefits of joining a successful single currency are clear and unambiguous, then of course it is right that we should join. That is the only policy in the national interest, and it is of course the Government's policy.

We have made it clear, in the statements in October 1997 by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and earlier this year by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when he launched the national draft outline changeover plan, that the decision on possible entry to a successful single currency should be made by Government, Parliament and then the British people in a referendum. It is in pursuit of that policy of "prepare and decide" that we have published the changeover plan.

The hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), a member of the previous Conservative Government and, indeed, a Front Bencher before he resigned in disgust at the anti-European position that his party has adopted, made the position clear when he welcomed the publication of the changeover plan. He said:

"Anyone who opposes a national changeover plan must not want to have a referendum, because it can be held only if the British people are prepared."—[Official Report, 23 February 1999; Vol. 326, c. 194.]

Our changeover plan has been prepared in very close consultation with business associations in this country. It is further illustration of how completely out of touch the Conservative party is with British business and the British national interest that it has opposed the sensible planning of the changeover plan, which was welcomed by, among others, the president of the CBI. The changeover plan is a sensible and necessary step to enable this country to have the option of joining a successful single currency if that would be in the interests of our country.

Under clause 122, as I have explained in considerable detail, we have ensured that the proper rules of propriety and the convention with the Public Accounts Committee are observed. We are extremely supportive of the important role that Parliament plays in the proper scrutiny of public expenditure, but there is a set procedure for reporting on expenditure to the House. The procedure works well, and the Opposition were quite happy to follow it during their 18 years in government. Euro preparations expenditure will continue to be included in the annual estimates, appropriation accounts and departmental reports, along with all the other spending by revenue Departments.

I am astonished that the Opposition seek to impose an extra bureaucratic burden on our tax authorities—one that has nothing whatever to offer in improving real accountability and scrutiny of public expenditure. I hope very much that the right hon. Member for Horsham will have the wisdom to withdraw his amendment. If not, I shall certainly urge my hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mr. Maude: I knew that it would be fascinating to hear how the Economic Secretary would make the case to resist the amendments. Now we have the answer. She did not make the case; she just ignored the case, which became stronger and stronger as each hon. Member rose to their feet. The Economic Secretary has insulted the House of Commons by refusing to address the actual issues and by making a pathetic attempt to sow dissention. She was dismayed by the fact that Conservative Front Benchers have been resolutely united in this approach. It is very upsetting for her, but it is a fact that the whole House ought to be concerned about this issue.

I said when I moved the amendment that the Government were asking for a blank cheque. Having heard what the Economic Secretary has had to say, that remains so. This is an extraordinary clause. As far as I can see, no other clause is a spending clause.

It has been claimed that the National Audit Office already has the power to scrutinise the accounts, but if the expenditure is proper according to the terms of the clause—we have no reason to suppose that it will not be—the NAO will not scrutinise the accounts in detail but simply report on the global sum. The Public Accounts Committee will not get close to the accounts because the NAO will sign off that sum as having been effective spending.

That spending may be effective according to the terms of the clause, but it is effective spending to achieve the wrong outcome. The Government will spend unspecified amounts of taxpayers' money on something that even the Prime Minister has accepted hardly anyone wants. The Economic Secretary has mentioned several figures, but she cannot say in which estimates those figures are contained. She cannot tell us in which National Audit Office report they are scrutinised. There is no proper mechanism by which the House can fulfil its historic function of scrutiny for such extraordinary expenditure.

Coming from a Government who prate about and use the language of prudence and competence, this is a disgrace. The Treasury, which admits to having negotiations to agree hard and fast budgets with other Departments, will simply say, "We shall spend as much as we think right." The Prime Minister says, "We shall spend tens of millions of pounds over a number of years." That is airy-fairy, and it is intolerable that the House of Commons should not have the ability properly to scrutinise that expenditure. For that reason, I ask the House to support the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Schedule 1

RATES OF VEHICLE EXCISE DUTY FOR GOODS VEHICLES ETC

Ms Hewitt: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 97, line 29, column 4, leave out '2,320' and insert '2,230'.

I hope that this amendment will not cause anything like the controversy caused by the previous amendment. It amends schedule 1, which concerns vehicle excise duty for goods vehicles, and corrects a typographical error in the tabled rate for three-axle rigid goods vehicles weighing between 23 and 25 tonnes. The provision should have remained unchanged at 2,230 lbs rather than the 2,320 lbs set out in the schedule.

This corrective amendment reflects Government policy: rates for all goods vehicles, apart from the more heavily loaded vehicles that became available from 1 January, should be frozen, as they were last year. Lorries relicensed since the Budget have of course been charged at the correct rate. I trust that there will be no opposition to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 2

VAT: GROUPS OF COMPANIES

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 102, line 15, at end insert—

'(5) For the purposes of subsection (2) above the Commissioners may only give notice in the circumstances specified in subsection (2) above if it appears to the Commissioners that—

(a) a company is engaged in a VAT avoidance scheme,

(b) membership of the group threatens the collectability of tax, or

(c) the revenue loss associated with its membership of the group goes beyond the natural consequences of grouping.'.

Although the amendment will be spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), I am moving it because of the rules of advocacy. My hon. Friend may conceivably have an indirect interest, which he will doubtless describe to the House.

Mr. Letwin: I declare a possible interest in that there may be clients of the bank of which I am a director who could be affected by the amendment.

The amendment protects not so much against a Henry VIII clause—we have done much of that in this Parliament—as against a Charles I clause of the kind that has also become all too familiar. Such a clause would give Customs and Excise tyrannical powers over those who are unlucky enough to fall into its clutches. When the issue was raised in Committee, a great many organisations were quoted—organisations that are not politically partial, but rather, are bound by the rules of looking after the interests of their members and, indeed, the public interest. The Institute of Indirect Taxation said:

"Under all of these provisions"— to which the amendment relates—

"the trigger for Customs powers is subjective."

The Law Society said that

"it would be possible for the Commissioners retrospectively to degroup a company . . . that . . . ignores the possibility of a mistake being made by the Commissioners".

The Institute of Directors said:

"The powers given by new section 43C (1) and (2),"—

to which the amendment relates—

"to remove companies from groups where that is necessary is far too wide."

The Institute of Indirect Taxation had more to say, as did many other bodies, including the Institute of Chartered Accountants.

The interesting point, which gave rise to our amendment, is that the Paymaster General—not the Financial Secretary, whom I excuse from blame entirely—remarked to the Committee, no doubt with the consent and acquiescence of the Financial Secretary:

"It is right that Customs has broad powers and some discretion, as has long been provided in our legislation. That is to ensure that abuse is dealt with adequately . . . That approach . . . is the conventional way to proceed."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 13 May 1999; c. 174-182.]

There is some truth in the hon. Lady's observations. Alas, we find that the conventional way to proceed, under Governments of both colours over many years, has been to give quite excessive and undue powers to Customs and Excise, and it is about time that something was done to correct that.

Finding a means of restricting the excessive, arbitrary powers of Customs and Excise—in order to protect legitimate businesses from the exercise of those arbitrary powers in ways that cause significant dislocation for many of our constituents—will be a major plank of the Conservative party's policies for going forward. That is particularly the case in respect of people with small and medium-sized businesses which cannot afford to employ legions of highly paid advisers to protect them against the exercise of those powers.

9.30 pm

Amendment No. 1 is astonishingly modest: I am amazed by our moderation. It would merely specify a little more closely how the commissioners must go about their actions. It says that commissioners can give notice of degrouping only if it appears to them that membership of the group threatens the collectability of tax, or . . .

"a company is engaged in a VAT avoidance scheme . . .

the revenue loss associated with its membership of the group goes beyond the natural consequences of grouping."

Straightforwardly, that amounts to saying that the commissioners must satisfy themselves that there is a genuine abuse.

It is a perfectly reasonable proposition that the commissioners, before taking action that could be highly deleterious to the companies against which they are taking it, should at least satisfy themselves that there is a real abuse, and that it is not an honest and innocent scheme.

I note that the Financial Secretary has closed her mind to this proposal, because she is happily engaged in badinage with her colleagues on the Front Bench. I am afraid to say that that surprises us not in the least. We have just debated a proposal from my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor that was so eminently reasonable that the Economic Secretary was unable to find the slightest rationale for defeating it. We now have another such reasonable proposal, and I am sure that it will meet the same fate. Her Majesty's Government are unfortunately unwilling even to listen to the argument. The time will come when amendments such as amendment No. 1 will be seen for what they are: modest, perhaps even pusillanimous. In due course, we will need far more protection for the ordinary and innocent business man against the exercise of arbitrary power.

This is a test case. If the Government insist on rejecting amendment No. 1, it will show that even the most modest constraints on that arbitrary power, such as the requirement that commissioners should satisfy themselves of an abuse, is too much for the Government. The Financial Secretary should bear in mind the fact that—if she is lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I am sure she will be—what she says in her usual mellifluous and elegant fashion will be recorded in Hansard, and will ring down the ages as a statement of the Government's intention, which is that things should be done in the conventional way. That is what the Government will stand for: the proposition that the conventional way should be followed, and Customs and Excise should be given wholly arbitrary powers.

Some slight purpose will have been fulfilled by this debate if we at least get it on record that that is the Government's intention and design. It would, of course, be far better if, having heard these words, the Financial Secretary had a damascene conversion and accepted amendment No. 1, but that will not happen. We could then get on with the serious business of trying to put to rights something of which Governments of both colours—this is not a party point—have been culpable for the past 50 or 100 years, and which the Opposition at least intend to do something about.

Mr. Fabricant: I support the amendment, primarily because I have experienced the abuse that my hon. Friend has described. He referred to the badinage among hon. Members on the Treasury Bench. I suspect that the reason for that badinage is that they have not been abused as I have, because none of them have run a business. None of them have had the experience of Customs and Excise officers descending on them in the early hours. They have not heard the kick of the jackboot on the door—perhaps I exaggerate—and have not endured an inspection of their books lasting a week or two.

Customs and Excise has a long history. The revenue men have powers that go back 300 or 400 years. Their powers exceed and have existed for longer than the powers of the police.

I hasten to add for the record that I was abused, and my company was abused, because the company—although it was a new company—had started from scratch, and ended up exporting all over the world. As a consequence, we incurred a lot of input tax—because we were purchasing items and paying VAT—but very little output tax, because we were exporting at zero rates. Most of our VAT returns, therefore, related to claims rather than payments.

There we were, a small company, trying to trade and trying to build up a reasonable base not only of suppliers, but of English—British—employees. Then the jackboot came: Customs and Excise arrived, and for two or three weeks we experienced complete disruption. No sales could take place, and while Customs and Excise went through our books with a fine-toothed comb—this was long before the days of computers—we were in cashflow difficulties, and were barely surviving as a result. Fortunately we got through that, and my career culminated on the Back Benches in the House of Commons.

The amendment is reasonable. My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) described it as a test case; I would go further, and say that I consider it to be an acid test of the Government's good intent. Is it unreasonable to expect the Government, Customs and Excise and the commissioners to pay a little attention, and exercise some caution, before kicking down the gates of a small business and examining its books?

The amendment is also simple. The commissioners need to satisfy themselves that in other words, not engaged in its lawful business. Is that unreasonable, I ask the Financial Secretary? I do not see how she can say that it is.

"a company is engaged in a VAT avoidance scheme"—

The commissioners also need to satisfy themselves that

"membership of the group threatens the collectability of tax"—

in other words, that the group has not been formed as a natural consequence of the functions of the company. Is that unreasonable, I ask the Financial Secretary?

Finally, the commissioners must satisfy themselves that

"the revenue loss associated with its membership of the group goes beyond the natural consequences of grouping."

Mr. Letwin: Let me make it clear, for the avoidance of doubt, that these are alternatives. The commissioners need to satisfy themselves of either the first, the second or the third. The amendment is even more modest than my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend is right. Reasonableness is the essence of the amendment. The question—the acid test—is this: are the Government going to be reasonable, and do they want the commissioners to be reasonable?

I know that the Financial Secretary is a reasonable lady, although she and her bedfellows—perhaps I should not say that; she and her colleagues—lack business experience. I therefore hope that they will accept the amendment.

Mrs. Roche: I find myself in a quandary. To misquote Oscar Wilde, I can resist everything but flattery. I have heard two flattering speeches, from the hon. Members for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant); however, I must disappoint them this evening. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I know: it almost brings tears to my eyes as well.

I was rather surprised by the speech of the hon. Member for Lichfield. He will know of the many hard-working men and women in our Customs and Excise service who do such sterling work for us on a number of issues—not just on VAT, but on combating drugs and smuggling. It is incumbent on hon. Members on both sides of the House to pay tribute to those brave men and women.

Mr. Letwin: I hope that the Minister might recognise the following point. It is the only defence of those hard-working and conscientious individuals that there should be rules that ensure that they do not have to fulfil their function by acting arbitrarily to squeeze every last penny out of every rock. I hope that she will recognise that the intention is precisely to protect those individuals, not to attack them.

Mrs. Roche: I am grateful for that clarification, because I had thought for a moment that the all-party consensus on law and order issues was in danger of breaking down. If the hon. Gentleman is a little patient, I think I can reassure him.

The one thing that the hon. Members for West Dorset and for Lichfield did not mention was that, if one looks at the whole package, of which the measure is a very small part, the Government's proposals on the sector have been welcomed by business as a whole. The proposals are the result of a long period of consultation and have gone down well.

The power to remove companies is necessary, as customs currently has powers to refuse applications to groups on revenue protection grounds, but no powers to remove companies when the same revenue concerns arise involving an existing group member. The inability of customs to remove companies from groups facilitates abuse and can lead to distortions of competition. Anyone who believes that having a level playing field is good will not support the amendment.

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roche: I am anxious to make a little progress. I want to say something that might help the hon. Gentleman. I will be nice to him, so will he take his seat for a moment?

I am sure that it is not the intention of those who have tabled the amendment to facilitate abuse, especially in light of the successive years of legislation—the hon. Member for West Dorset was generous enough to say, unlike some of his hon. and hon. Friends, that Conservative Governments have gone down exactly the same route—that have been necessary to counter some of the abuse of what is an important business facilitation measure. That includes legislation that was passed by the Opposition when they were in power.

Members who have read the Hansard—the hon. Member for West Dorset has already referred to it—of the Standing Committee debate will know that the criterion in the amendment is the same criterion that my hon. Friend the Paymaster General said would be applied by customs to all the revenue protection powers in the clause.

Mr. Letwin: Now the hon. Lady is absolutely right. All we are trying to do is to enshrine in law what her colleague said would be a matter of practice. How can she possibly object to that? Is not that the ultimate reasonable activity of Parliament—to enshrine in law what is regarded as reasonable practice?

Mrs. Roche: I know that the hon. Gentleman is anxious about the matter, but, if he contains himself for a little longer, I will deal with that.

The amendment seeks to set that criterion in law in respect of the new powers to remove companies from groups for the protection of revenue, but the amendment is defective. I have had to take Conservative Members to task before when they have tabled amendments that are technically defective because my right hon. and hon. Friends might be tempted by such amendments, which would put them on a path that could not be said to be one of righteousness. There is no mention of the approach that should be taken over refusing applications on the same grounds. Rather than creating more certainty for business, this limited amendment would create more uncertainty and reintroduce distortions—precisely what the Bill is meant to overcome.

Although the amendment may be superficially attractive, when we look at its detail, it raises more questions than it solves. Customs will apply, as it always does, those good principles, but there are sound—

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roche: No, I will not.

There are sound reasons why those principles should not be defined in law. That is why the Paymaster General stated in the Standing Committee that she had asked customs to provide a business brief. Tomorrow, that brief will be published and placed in the Library. It will state the circumstances in which all the revenue protection powers in schedule 2 are likely to be used, thereby providing assurance to business that customs will not use revenue protection powers merely to raise revenue.

9.45 pm

Amendment No. 1 deals with a very important matter. I am sorry that, today, Opposition Members have not sought to talk—as they were generous enough to do in Committee—about the great benefits for business that the Bill will provide.

Amendment No. 1 would only confuse the issue, and I urge the House to reject it.

Amendment negatived.

Order for Third Reading read.

9.46 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alan Milburn): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Finance Bill reforms and strengthens the British economy by rewarding work, enterprise and families. Quite rightly, it has been subjected to detailed scrutiny, both on Report and in Committee. I thank all right hon. and hon. Members, some of whom are in the Chamber, who contributed to our consideration of the Bill in Committee. I particularly thank my hon. Friends for the excellence of their work on the Bill, but also thank Opposition Members for their work—not least because it has given us some profound insights into where they stand on so many key issues of tax policy, spending policy and economic policy.

The Bill helps to lock in the economic stability that the Government have been creating since we entered office, and introduces new measures to improve—for the long term—the productivity and performance of the British economy. The Bill contains measures to improve investment, to strengthen links between business and education, and to improve the tax position of growing firms.

The Bill's measures give Britain the lowest rates of company taxation in our history. Indeed, the measures give us the lowest tax rates of any major industrialised country anywhere in the world. Moreover, those rates will not apply for only one year, but will remain at that level, or below, for the remainder of this Parliament. They are evidence of the Government's determination to make Britain the very best place for businesses to invest, and the very best place for businesses to do business.

The Finance Bill helps put in place the building blocks not only for an enterprise economy, but for a fair society—the current Government, unlike the previous one, recognise that the two go together. In our two previous Budgets, we helped people move from welfare to work. We are now taking that fundamental reform a step further, by ensuring that, when people go into work, it pays.

For years, successive Governments have taken too much tax from those who work hard but are by no means wealthy. All too often, the working poor have paid the price for that failure. Some people have faced marginal tax rates of as much as 100 per cent. or more when trying simply to move off benefit and into work.

The Finance Bill, with the minimum wage and the working families tax credit, begins to end the perverse incentives that have encouraged benefit dependency. We do so in recognition, first, that work is the best way out of poverty; and, secondly, that—for too many people, for far too long—financial uncertainty has acted as a real barrier.

The Bill ensures that we now have the lowest starting income tax rate in 35 years. Next year, we will have the lowest basic rate of income tax in some 70 years. On any count, those are major reforms to the tax system. They will make working families better off. They will cut the tax burden on the average family to below 20 per cent. for the first time in more than 20 years.

In contrast to the practice of the Conservative party when it was in power, those tax cuts honour the pledges that we made at the last election. [Interruption.] Before the shadow Chancellor starts to chunter too much, I say to him that the cuts are a reminder—if reminder were needed—that, while this Government keep our tax promises, the previous Government failed to do keep theirs. We said that we would cut VAT on fuel and that we would introduce a 10p rate of income tax. We have done so.

We said that we would do something else—we promised more support for families. This Finance Bill delivers that promise. The new children's tax credit will provide more help to those who need it most, when they need it most—families bringing up children. By the end of this Parliament, we will be spending £6 billion more on children than we were at the beginning. In total, as a result of the measures that we have taken to date, some 700,000 children will be lifted out of poverty.

All those measures are opposed by the Conservative party. Frankly, the Opposition have done the House and the country a favour during the passage of the Bill. They have helped put clear blue water between us and them. While this Labour Government's policies are helping the poorest families in the land, it is now clear from the passage of the Bill that the Tories' policies would penalise the poorest families in the land.

The Tories' pledge to abolish the working families tax credit would land 1.5 million families—many of them the poorest in the land—with an extra £24 a week on their tax bills. Their opposition to the minimum wage, to the 10p starting rate of income tax and to the children's tax credit would mean less help for hard-working families, middle and low income alike.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Where in the Labour manifesto did it say that the Labour Government would raise taxes to the tune of £40 billion over the lifetime of this Parliament? Where did it say that newly retired couples who will reach the age of 65 after next April will lose £500 of income that they had expected to have at retirement?

Mr. Milburn: I will come to that £40 billion in a moment because the hon. Gentleman, before he was moved on, helped contribute to the £40 billion black hole in the Tories' spending plans. The Bill and previous measures will help to cut taxes and will ensure that tax plans for this year, next year and the year after are all lower than if the Conservative party had been returned to power at the last general election.

By reversing policies that are designed to make work pay, the Opposition would reinvent the spiral of benefit dependency that they now say they want to eradicate. However, the Opposition have revealed something else, too, during the passage of the Bill. They have revealed that they cannot be trusted with our country's public finances or with our country's key public services.

In the last two years, the state of the public finances has been transformed. We have cut public sector borrowing by some £32 billion. The approach that we have taken has been prudent and disciplined, and this Finance Bill continues that process. It locks in the stability that we have been creating by keeping the public finances under control.

Over the next five years, there will be a current budget surplus of £34 billion. The Government are now living within our means, and yet we have been able to invest extra money in our key public services—an extra £40 billion for our schools and hospitals alone over the next three years.

Mr. Maude rose—

Mr. Milburn: When the right hon. Gentleman comes to the Dispatch Box, perhaps he will say how he intends to match those plans.

Mr. Maude: I shall say for the umpteenth time that we support those increases in health and education spending. However, let the Chief Secretary answer this. Before the last election, the Prime Minister said in clear terms that Labour had no plans to increase taxes at all. What does the Chief Secretary think that he meant by that?

Mr. Milburn: What we said before the general election is contained in our manifesto. We said that we would not increase income tax rates, and we have not; indeed, we have reduced them. We said that we would not extend VAT to children's clothes, food, books and newspapers and public transport fares, and we have not. We said that we would introduce a 10p rate of income tax, and we have.

If the shadow Chancellor wants to compare and contrast the tax promises that we made at the general election with those that his party manifesto made at the 1992 election, I am happy to go through that charade. He might have come to the Dispatch Box and explained how it is that one moment he describes our spending plans as reckless—and the Leader of the Opposition accuses my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of embarking on a spending spree—and the next he says that he wants to match our spending on health and education.

[Mr. Milburn]

It is no good willing the end without being prepared to will the means. The Conservatives have failed to put their money where their mouth is. Worse, they have tabled proposals that would take money away from the very services that they say they support.

Mr. Maude: As the Chief Secretary seems unwilling to defend the Prime Minister on his clear statement before the general election, will he say what he understood the Prime Minister to mean when he said just after the election that the Government would cut social security bills? Did he believe that the Prime Minister meant that he would increase those bills by £38 billion?

Mr. Milburn: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware of what has happened under this Government as compared to what happened under the previous Government. He must know that social security spending is rising at half the rate under this Government, so we will take no lectures from him.

During our proceedings on the Bill, the Conservative party tabled amendments that would rob the public purse of almost £25 billion over the next three years and Conservative amendments to last year's Finance Bill would add another £15 billion to that total. [Interruption.] If the shadow Chancellor would stop chuntering and start listening, he might learn something. His party lost the trust of the British people at the general election because it broke its promises and it continues to make promises that it cannot keep.

Our proceedings have highlighted all too clearly the contrast between the Government and the Opposition: £40 billion extra for our key public services with the Government or £40 billion less with the Conservatives; more help for families with the Government or less with the Opposition; more help to get people into work and to help them to stay there with the Government or less for both with the Conservatives; economic stability with the Government or a return to stop-go, boom-bust with the Conservatives.

We have seen that today's Conservative party is not only out of touch and out of date but out of the political mainstream; it is no wonder that people say that it is the most extreme in living memory. The Bill will help to build a stronger economic future for our country and ensure that there is opportunity for the many and not only the few. It provides the right incentives for people to work and for business to invest. In short, it offers a better deal for both British business and the British people. It deserves the support of the House.

9.59 pm

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In March, the Chancellor introduced a tax-raising Budget, followed in short order by a tax-raising Finance Bill. Even more recently, we have been faced with a tax-raising Report stage. Unusually—it is certainly unprecedented in my experience—the Government only yesterday tabled eight additional money resolutions, each of which was, by definition, tax-raising. We have had a series of Budgets, each of them tax-raising, and a series of provisions this year whose object has also been to raise taxation.

This is a bad Bill. However, in the debates during its progress through the House, we have managed to puncture the Chancellor's self-satisfied arrogance and complacency. Instead of strengthening the British economy, as the Chief Secretary claimed, he has put at risk the golden economic legacy that he inherited from the previous Conservative Government at the general election.

The Chief Secretary made the truly remarkable claim that social security expenditure was rising less sharply now than under the previous Government. That is flatly untrue, as statistics from the ever-helpful House of Commons Library show. In the three years to 1998–99—in other words, the Conservative Government's last year of office and the years for which Conservative planning was taken over by the Labour Government—social security spending fell by 0.2 per cent. per year, in real terms. Conversely, the Library figures show that, from 1998–99 onwards, when the Labour Government have been on their own, social security spending is set to rise by 3.2 per cent. each year, in real terms.

That is a graphic illustration of how the Government have turned a satisfactory plateau of real-terms social security expenditure into a steep rise. That is where the money is being spent. Instead of taking money from the social security budget and spending it on other desirable areas of social expenditure, the Government are wasting it on an acceleration of social security expenditure. That is documented in the figures that I have given.

Mr. Leslie: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. I am correcting the facts and figures misrepresented to the House only a few moments ago by the Chief Secretary.

The Bill, and the Budget before it, contain some gimmicky handouts. Interestingly, however, some of the handouts announced in the Budget speech are not to be found in the Bill. For example, in his Budget speech, the Chancellor proudly announced research and development tax credits. Business looked forward to them, but the Bill says nothing about them. The proposal is a fraud. Conversely, the Bill contains some tax increases that were not announced in the Budget speech. That is all so appropriate for a stealth-tax Government.

On Budget day, the Government published a leaflet called "Budget '99", which purports to be a summary of the Budget measures. In the section entitled "Raising Productivity", the research and development tax credit is said to be an item that will be "delivered" in the 1999 Budget. Yet, as I have explained, it was not delivered, in either the Budget or the Bill.

The leaflet does not mention something that is in the Bill—the sharp and damaging increase in stamp duty. That is set to raise £300 million a year, mostly from the business sector. The research and development tax credit may come into effect in the year 2001, and will benefit business by a maximum of £100 million.

The leaflet is nothing short of state-sponsored propaganda. It is biased, partial and a disgrace. The taxpayer was expected to finance a leaflet—at a cost of more than £100,000—that gives a distorted and misleading account of the Budget measures.

The Finance Bill has been criticised for making the system more complicated. Every Finance Bill introduces more rates, more tax bands and more complex relief. Last year, the capital gains tax system—again unreformed this year—set up all sorts of perverse incentives, additional rates and multiple allowances. The Government say that they are trying to make the tax system simpler to aid self-assessment, but it is becoming more difficult for individual taxpayers and more expensive for businesses. The Government have begun a regulation drive to make everything more complicated and expensive, and that—just as surely as tax increases—is undermining the competitiveness of the British economy.

The Bill abolished married couples allowance, but there was another trick. The Chancellor announced that, although the allowance was being abolished, it would be replaced by children's tax credit. The trick is that married couples allowance is abolished immediately, saving the Government over £1.5 billion a year, but children's tax credit will not come in until 2001, and will cost less than the amount saved.

We have debated fuel duties again today, so I shall say only that the Government no longer seriously deny the damage to the road haulage industry. Fuel represents a third of the industry's running costs, and making our fuel the most expensive in Europe obviously makes the industry uncompetitive in Europe. Road haulage, by definition a mobile industry, will lose out in the single market. Those blindingly obvious truths are beginning to register with the Government, but it is too late for many in the haulage industry who have already suffered, and too late for British manufacturing industry, which has been made uncompetitive. I hope that it is not too late to persuade the Government to end the damaging fuel escalator in next year's Budget.

Mr. Geraint Davies rose—

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I cannot resist giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Davies: Having mentioned stealth tax, would you agree that, when you add up the reversal of your policy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman must use the correct parliamentary language.

Mr. Davies: When the right hon. Gentleman adds up the effect of his policies on the fuel escalator, elimination of the tobacco escalator and the married couples allowance, does he not find that the Conservative party will offer the electorate a bill amounting to tens of billions of pounds at the next election? How will he pay it?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am glad to give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he is always helpful. He has given me the chance to state that we are trying to chip away at the extra taxes that the Government are levying on British industry and individual taxpayers in defiance of their manifesto and election promises. The hon. Gentleman should thank us for trying to return the Government to the platform on which he was elected.

On savings, the Government do not seem to understand that it is no good exhorting people to save more, or trying to get people off welfare and on to depending on their own savings, if savings are being made more expensive and less attractive. They have done it in every Budget since the general election. In the first one, they carried out a £5 billion a year raid on pension funds. No one will trust the Government on pensions again.

Then we had the quite unnecessary vandalism against personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts—two successful and established savings vehicles that were trusted by the saving public. The Government introduced the wholly unknown, untried and untested individual savings accounts, with which they are having so much difficulty. We confidently expect that they will in due course produce amendments to try to retrieve the situation. Why put the saving public to all the expense and difficulty of changing from a product that they understand to one that they do not?

In this Finance Bill, the 10p starting rate of income tax was announced. However, the Government deliberately did not make it applicable to savings. What sort of a message does that send? Do not bother to save; the Labour Government do not believe that it is necessary.

Exactly the same is true of the continuing scandal over dividend tax credits and the Government's failure to repay those credits, or an equivalent sum, to non-taxpayers. They have compensated everyone else—the better-off—for the withdrawal of dividend tax credits, but despite being asked, they have deliberately refused to compensate the poorest non-tax paying savers. They are operating a sort of means test. They have looked after the better-off savers, but they are refusing to compensate the poorest category of saver—those who are below the tax threshold. That is a continuing scandal and it goes some way to explain why the Government are losing touch with their traditional supporters and why those ex-supporters have been making known their views in the recent local government and European elections. It is not surprising that the savings ratio has fallen and continues to fall.

Before I conclude, I must touch on another extraordinary fact that we unearthed from the Government despite all their efforts to keep the information to themselves: the fact that at least three of the provisions in the Bill may be incompatible with the requirements of the European Union and may in due course have to be withdrawn or repealed. One such provision is the measure to help the film industry. The second is the 40 per cent. first-year allowance for small and medium-sized companies and the third is the 100 per cent. first year allowance for small and medium-sized companies in Northern Ireland.

We have discovered that each of those measures, which were all introduced by the Government, are under investigation by the European Union business tax committee, which is chaired by the Paymaster General. We did not know that when we debated those measures in Committee. The Government did not tell us that they might all have to be withdrawn if that committee concludes that they represent unfair tax competition. They may have to be repealed because that committee is not advisory but mandatory. The Government have voluntarily agreed in advance to honour its conclusions. In a debate in Committee in November 1997, the Paymaster General said that, if the Government agreed to the code of conduct on unfair tax competition in Europe, they would honour the committee's conclusions and abide by its recommendations.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

So, there we have it. The House of Commons and this Chamber this evening may think that they are regulating tax matters on which they are sovereign, but I am afraid that that is no longer the case. The Government have admitted—the information had to be extracted from them—that at least three of the measures that we are being invited to pass this evening are vulnerable to being withdrawn because of the conclusions of a European Union committee. If that is not the case, the Government still have time to reassure us to the contrary. When we debated the matter yesterday, they not only gave us no assurances on that, but they appeared to confirm that it was indeed the case.

A recent example is provided by the debate on amendment No. 31, introduced by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor. The House is being asked to give the Government authority to spend unspecified amounts, during an unspecified period, on unspecified items in respect of the national changeover plan. That is a disgrace, and, in her response to that debate, the Economic Secretary made matters worse by refusing to give the House the details that it reasonably requires.

In conclusion, the Bill remains a bad Bill; it is a tax-raising and stealth-taxing Bill. It is interfering and damaging; we shall vote against it.

10.16 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): Sometimes our debates generate a great deal of heat, and sometimes they shed a great deal of light. Unfortunately, the former is true of this Third Reading debate. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), failed to mention the two most historic tax changes in the Bill. Those truly historic changes are the abolition of mortgage interest tax relief—[Interruption.]—and of the married couples allowance. From a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) cheers the abolition of mortgage interest tax relief; he is right to do so. That relief needed to be abolished, and I am surprised that the Chief Secretary failed to mention it in his speech.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: If I must.

Mr. Davies: Can it be true that the spokesperson for the Liberal Democrats has written his speech on Third Reading on the back of an envelope?

Mr. Davey: Although the hon. Gentleman may need to print out the full text of his own speeches, some of us have only a few notes—to which we often do not even need to refer.

I was making a rather more serious point: there are some major tax changes in the Finance Bill, which one would have thought the Chief Secretary would mention. Perhaps he is rather embarrassed by them, and is not prepared to advocate them to the public—therein lies the truth. Perhaps the shadow Chief Secretary failed to mention them because he realises that the Conservative Government began those reforms. He does not want to admit that the measures are the logical conclusion of Conservative tax policies.

The Liberal Democrats support those two historic tax changes. However, we do not support the way in which the money freed by the changes has been spent. The Government have spent the money in several ways, none of which will promote full social justice and fairness—as should have been done. They have followed the Tory route of cutting marginal tax rates. In taking that approach, they are making the same mistakes as the Tory Government made in the past; they are not targeting those freed-up resources on the working poor. That is an historic mistake.

The 10p tax rate will not help the poorest in society; it will be worth just as much to those on higher incomes. We could have taken hundreds of thousands of the working poor out of tax altogether, if the money saved by abolishing mortgage interest tax relief and the married couples tax allowance had been used to raise personal allowances. The Government failed to do that.

There was an extremely Tory policy in the Budget: cutting the marginal rate of income tax by a penny in the pound. That money could have been spent on public services; we could have improved our health and education services, using the money squandered by the Government in an unnecessary tax cut. Alternatively, the money could have been used to raise personal allowances. Unfortunately, the Government failed to take that opportunity. The Finance Bill fails to promote social justice.

To be fair to the Government, on Report, there were one or two concessions—on buses, bicycles and employee share ownership. We welcome that and we are grateful that constructive opposition occasionally bears fruit. Indeed, in Committee, we managed to delete the word "other" from one schedule. That clarified the law, for which I am sure the tax lawyers outside this place will be grateful.

However, those minor improvements have not improved the fundamental quality of the Bill. As the right hon. Member for Wells said, the Bill increases the complexity of the tax system. An allowance and a relief have been abolished, but in their place has come a 10p tax rate, which creates huge complexities because it means that we now have a multiplicity of tax rates on different sorts of income. People filling in their self-assessment tax returns will suffer headaches as they try to work it all out; many of them will have to pay hundreds of pounds for professional advice. As we enter an era in which we ask the average citizen to fill out a tax return, we ought to make the tax system more simple, especially for elderly people. As the Financial Secretary will recall, we debated that point early this morning.

Not only does the Bill fail the test of improving the tax system by promoting simplicity: it fails to enhance the fairness of the tax system. The Chief Secretary said that fairness was the Government's aim and that, through the working families tax credit and the 10p rate, they were achieving that. However, there are many other ways in which they could have achieved it, specifically, by raising personal allowances. In next year's Budget, the Liberal Democrats want a massive increase in personal income allowances that takes hundreds of thousands—even millions—of people out of the tax system altogether. It is nonsense that people on low earnings pay income tax. We should return to a fairer tax system that does not trouble many low income earners with the attentions of the Inland Revenue. I hope that the Government will learn the error of their ways and that next year we will have a Finance Bill that increases simplicity and promotes fairness.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I shall concentrate on only one clause—clause 27—and the children's tax credit. In his Budget speech this year, the Chancellor made much of fairness. When introducing the children's tax credit, he said:

"In the Budget last year, I set down the two principles that govern my approach: we must substantially increase support for families with children and we must do so in the fairest way. It is in fulfilment of those two principles that the children's tax credit will be tapered away for the higher-earning family where there is a top-rate taxpayer."—[Official Report, 9 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 183.]

Fair enough—if the Chancellor intends to introduce a new children's tax credit in a fair way, there is nothing wrong with that. However, if we look at the Finance Bill, we find that that is not going to happen: the way in which the tax credit is to be implemented is not fair.

A couple in which one partner stays at home to look after the children or an elderly or dependent relative will find that their children's tax credit starts to taper away once the earnings of the partner in work exceed £32,000 a year, and that once that partner's earnings exceed £38,000 a year, no credit will be due. At first sight, that might appear to be perfectly fair—after all, we want to concentrate resources on those who are most in need. However, it is not fair, because a couple in which both partners are in paid work will continue to draw the credit in full until their joint income exceeds £64,000 a year, if each of them earns broadly the same amount as the other and they are not higher-rate taxpayers. What is fair about a system that pays a credit in full to one couple who together earn £64,000 a year, but withdraws it completely from another couple whose income is only £38,000 a year? I cannot perceive the fairness in that.

The children's tax credit is not to be introduced until April 2001. We cannot change this year's Finance Bill, because it is too late, so, looking ahead to 2001, my plea to Treasury Ministers is that they should reconsider that single aspect of the Bill and try to ensure that there is greater fairness in the system. All I am asking is that the Government treat each couple fairly. Surely, as a matter of principle, the Government should allow couples if they so wish—there is no compulsion—to live their lives in the way in which they want to. The Government should allow couples to pool their income and allowances for the purposes of calculating their entitlement to credit. That seems entirely fair.

In that case, the make-up of couples' incomes would be immaterial. It would make no difference whether it was wholly earned by one partner or earned by both—or in what proportion it was split between them. They are a couple, living together and pooling their earnings. If they choose to live their life in a certain way, why should they be penalised so heavily by the state? That is unfair and cannot be just. All couples should be given the opportunity to be treated exactly the same.

There is an even stronger case for my argument. The Government cannot reasonably argue that couples with higher incomes should not be given the opportunity to pool their incomes for the purposes of CTC, since at the very same time under the working families tax credit, they are requiring people at the bottom end of the income scale to disclose to each other their incomes, savings and other details.

The CTC is seen by the Government as part of the benefits system. It is designed to help couples with children. In effect, it is a benefit, although it is termed as a tax credit. Indeed, it was introduced instead of further increasing child benefit. The Government are also considering integrating the CTC with the child premiums in income support and the working families tax credit. All that is fair enough; I do not have any argument with any of it. Does it not show that the Government view the children's tax credit as part of the benefit system?

We know that the basic unit in the benefits system is not the individual but the family—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) must not keep passing to and fro in front of hon. Members who are addressing the House.

Mr. Leigh: I am sure that the Whip was trying to be helpful.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not the point. It should not be done.

Mr. Leigh: If the benefits system views the family as a unit, and the CTC is in effect a benefit, why cannot it be treated as such?

Are we to try to build a society that is fair, allows couples to live their lives and does not penalise a couple in which a wife, or possibly a husband, wants—I stress that there is no compulsion—to stay at home to look after the children? Such penalties are unfair and I plead with those on the Treasury Bench to reconsider.

Mr. Fabricant: This Finance Bill and the Budget statement are typified by the leaflet that was produced by the Treasury at a cost of more than £100,000 and distributed to more than 1.5 million people. This little leaflet is a distortion of the truth; the entire Finance Bill is a distortion of the truth.

The Budget statement made on the day by the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave all the good news and none of the bad news. It took journalists at least three or four days to read the Finance Bill and all the attendant literature in order to extract the truth. This has been one of the most dishonest Finance Bills before Parliament this century.

The Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have claimed that this Bill would reduce taxes. Yet the House of Commons Library, after detailed analysis, stated unequivocally that this Budget will raise £40.7 billion of extra funds from taxpayers. That figure is equivalent to £1,500 per taxpayer over the course of this Parliament. I am astonished that during the proceedings on the Finance Bill and at Treasury questions, Ministers have consistently denied that. At the end of the day, they are claiming that they are right and the independent

[Mr. Fabricant]

House of Commons Library is wrong. The Labour party is endeavouring to fiddle the figures, and that must be wrong.

Labour claims that it is in favour of hard-working families, but the Finance Bill has hit families by scrapping the married couples allowance. The abolition of the tax relief on mortgage payments will cost home owners more than £200 a year, and that is wrong.

The Budget has resulted in Labour taxing motorists off the road. We now have the highest petrol charges in Europe. The Government trumpet that they are in favour of green policies and have introduced the tax break of lower vehicle excise duty for vehicles below 1100 cc, but that is a joke. We all know that even a Fiat Punto's engine is over 1100 cc. That makes a mockery of all the Government's claims. Of course, we do not expect the Labour party to know about such matters. We all know that the Deputy Prime Minister owns two Jaguars, so what would he know about Fiat Puntos?

The Chief Secretary claimed that 10p was the lowest rate of tax, but we know that scrapping the 20p income tax band will result in a tax rise of £60 a year for most people. That is yet another distortion.

In conclusion, this Budget has been driven solely by the Government's desire to disguise the fact that they are raising taxes by stealth and by their desire to win the next election for the Labour party, but the Government underestimate the electorate if they think that they will be fooled indefinitely. The Finance Bill destroys the golden legacy inherited from the previous Government and sows the seeds of economic decline.

Mr. Loughton: If, after the long haul on this Finance Bill, there is one word that encapsulates what the Bill is all about, that word is stealth. Uncharacteristically, it was the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) who put his finger on that. This is the stealth tax Budget.

Throughout the proceedings on the Finance Bill, including this evening's debates, Ministers have boasted of the headline rates of income tax and corporation tax. Never once have they tackled the most important issue of the overall tax burden. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) rightly pointed out, the Library explicitly said that the overall tax burden—not the tax rates—of the Government's three Budgets will, over the lifetime of this Parliament, add £40.7 billion to the tax bill. According to the president of the CBI, there will be £20 billion of extra taxes on industry alone. That is from a Government who, in opposition, had no plans to raise taxes.

The British people are wising up to taxation by stealth. The fuel duty and so-called environmental taxes are the biggest red herring, painted green, in the Finance Bill. As we heard earlier, the Bill will destroy large swathes of this country's freight industry. The measures are counterproductive in terms of the revenue coming into the Treasury and in their effect on the environment. It took a great deal of questioning and requestioning to drag out, at long last, the admission from the Economic Secretary that the price of fuel under the Labour Government has increased by 13p per litre in excise duty. People who live in the country will feel the brunt of that. The disabled who rely on their vehicles will also feel the brunt of that. Those who rely on community bus transport, who have no exemption from this tax, will feel the brunt of the increase in excise duty more than anyone else, through no fault of their own.

Environmental measures in the Budget that we applaud, like the 29 per cent. reduction in local gas charges, pale into insignificance without the kick-start that is needed through the capital tax reliefs for which we called. As a result, the reduction becomes meaningless.

The public are waking up to the highest fuel duty in Europe. It is all the making of the Government, when 85 per cent. of the cost of a litre or gallon of fuel is down to tax as per Government instructions in the Bill.

There is the stealth tax of the 10p rate of which we learn with great fanfares while nothing is said about the 20p rate that will be abolished, to be increased to 23p. There is stealth in that the 10 per cent. rate does not apply to people's savings. There is the stealth of the fact that the married couples' tax allowance is to be abolished, to be replaced two years later by the children's tax credit, which is no good if one's children happen to be older than 14. That is no good for prospective pensioners born after a certain date.

With the Finance Bill, the Government are all about giving with one hand with great fanfares and taking by stealth with the other. We have heard this evening about the biggest black hole of them all. There will be unlimited, unaccounted for and unaudited expenditure on the euro handover plan. So much power is being delegated through the Bill to secondary legislation, let alone what may be delegated to the superior powers of the code of conduct group, about which we hear so little.

This is government by stealth. It is government by presentation and headline rather than by practical implications and detail. It is a thoroughly dishonest Budget from a Government who are obsessed by spin, and we should vote against it.

Mr. Quentin Davies: We have had some very effective contributions in this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) spoke extremely persuasively about the stealth tax policy of the Government. That is the hallmark of the Government, of the Budget and of the Finance Bill, which I hope the House will shortly be rejecting.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) spoke with his usual vigour about how disingenuous the presentation of fiscal and economic policy has become under the Government. The Budget speech is no longer a serious occasion when the light and the shade, the pluses and the minuses are presented. All the unpleasant news is either entirely passed over in silence or is hidden with a few glib phrases supplied by a spin doctor from Millbank. Such has been the decline in our proceedings and in the standards of parliamentary presentation that the Government have sadly brought about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) spoke extremely well about the children's tax credit. He is a recognised authority in this country on social security matters. I add only that the children's tax credit brings with it the extremely negative historic achievement in our tax policy that it destroys the principle of independent taxation. That principle was introduced under a Conservative Administration in the 1980s by Lord Lawson, as he now is. That great achievement is the pillar of a fair and just tax system in a modern society. It is now being destroyed as a by-product of this ill-thought-through policy.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) made a good speech, but confirmed that the Liberals are to the left even of the Labour party. They are the highest tax-raising party in the country. They are welcome to that position, and I hope that they enjoy it.

The most striking feature of the debate this evening was not the effective and often interesting speeches to which I referred, but the complete silence from the Government Benches. The most revealing—because it is entirely objective—aspect of the debate has been the utter failure of the Government to generate the slightest enthusiasm among their own supporters for their taxation measures and fiscal policy.

I remember that when I entered the House in the 1980s, I looked forward to intervening from the Back Benches in support of the momentous Budgets of the time. I was proud to do so. Not a single hon. Lady or hon. Gentleman spoke this evening from the Government Back Benches, and my goodness, we all know that there are far too many hon. Ladies and hon. Gentlemen on those Benches. We shall have to wait a couple of years to get rid of most of them. Not a single one could muster the slightest enthusiasm for the Government's proposals. Many of them must have had the greatest difficulty in hiding their deep embarrassment.

The cracks are appearing in the apparently bright facade of the new Labour Government. They are appearing in the areas of tax policy and economic management as much as, or more than, in any other field. Let us consider the growing rift in public expenditure between the Government's promises, to which my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor rightly referred—promises to spend more money on desirable public services such as health and education—and their total failure to deliver the other half of that commitment: to make savings in social security expenditure.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman has had plenty of opportunity to take part in the debate. He knows that I like taking interventions, including those from him, and I often take them, but it is a pretty poor show that Labour could not muster a single speaker tonight. Now, because Labour Members are so pained by my strictures, they put up the hon. Gentleman to try at the last minute—and after time—to remedy the obvious deficiency of the parliamentary Labour party in the debate. That will not wash. The hon. Gentleman will have to do better next time and get in during the debate, as he could so easily have done.

If a rift is appearing in the Government's public expenditure policies and the facade of new Labour, that facade is crumbling to dust on the revenue side of the Government's tax policies. We all know that their behaviour has been characterised by a series of stealth taxes. They started right away with the dividend tax credit. We have lost count, but I am sure that someone in Conservative central office is keeping a record—he or she must be employed full-time adding the number of stealth taxes introduced by the Government.

Several of those stealth taxes were revealed in this evening's debate, not least that nasty little trick of bringing to an end the married couples allowance one year, then waiting a full year before introducing its supposed replacement, the children's tax credit, thereby taking hundreds of pounds surreptitiously out of families' pockets. What a sickening thing to do, when the Government continue with their rhetoric about supporting the family. They are doing no such thing. They are making an entirely cynical and opportunistic attempt to take money out of households with children while pretending to do nothing of the kind.

Many Government policies are in shreds.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I have already explained why I will not—[Interruption.] I am sorry, but if Labour Members lack either the courage or the conviction to take part in debates on these important budgetary matters, and if they do not have a good word to say about the Finance Bill or the Government's tax proposals, I am afraid that I shall rub it in by deliberately not taking interventions from them. As the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) knows, I am making an exception by not taking interventions, but tonight's events have been striking. Although no hon. Member will have missed the significance of the silence of Labour Members on the Finance Bill, it is important that the public realise what is going on and how little conviction Government policy carries even among Labour Back Benchers.

The Government's taxation policies are already unravelling and many are in shreds. Only pigheaded obstinacy—or a desperate desire to save face at any price, including the national interest—is holding up the concessions that everybody knows are required and must be delivered. The Opposition have pressed for them during proceedings on the Bill. We must have a change in the annuity rule to get rid of the 75-year rule so that people's pension savings are not thrown away on an annuity that will accrue hardly more interest than that which they would receive from putting their money on deposit or in the gilt market. We must allow draw-down indefinitely and the Government must think again about our proposal to abolish the 75-year rule.

The situation in respect of personal equity plans and individual savings accounts has made the Government a laughing stock in every section of our society that follows financial matters. Every independent financial adviser in this country would endorse that. The Government came to power and destructively decided to get rid of extremely successful policies only to replace them with a colossal failure. The sooner they recognise that, and get rid of the mini ISAs in particular, the better.

As my hon. Friends have said so clearly throughout proceedings on the Bill, the Government have come to the end of the road on the fuel duty escalator as well. Increasing the rate to 6 per cent. was extremely foolish and unsustainable, and the escalator must go. Above all, they have come to the point at which they can no longer defend what they are doing on personal tax. I made that point yesterday, and it is going to be made again tonight, but we have had not a single response.

What is the justification for taking hundreds of pounds out of the pocket of someone who has only £5,000 a year to live on? Last night, I referred to a case involving someone who had £1,000 taken out of his pocket and he has only £4,000 a year to live on because people below the income tax threshold are being made to pay tax on their dividend income. What is the justification for introducing a 10 per cent. lower rate of tax and not applying it to savings income? There is no justification in terms of economics or of basic good or evil. Nor is there a common-sense justification for what the Government are doing. They must think again, and it is obvious that their Back-Bench supporters think that they should do so as well.

Mrs. Roche: After that performance, let me assure the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) that I managed to hear his every word. I remember his record on Finance Bills from when I was in opposition, and it was very helpful to us. Given his views on Europe, he will continue to be of use to us.

I thank my hon. Friends on the Back Benches who so ably supported us and spoke so frequently in Committee—unlike Conservative Members, who, during their years in power, never spoke on Bills.

I want to correct a few of the comments made by Conservative Members. The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) alleged that social security spending is out of control. How wrong can he be? The forecast of real growth is 1.9 per cent. a year over this Parliament, compared with 4.1 per cent. during the previous Parliament. The rate has halved, but we are still providing extra resources for the poorest in society. Once again, that is absolute proof that a Labour Government are much better managers of the economy.

The right hon. Gentleman had the cheek to allege that savings were less attractive under a Labour Government. The real enemies of savers are instability and high inflation. The Government have no intention of returning to the sky-high inflation rates of the Tory Administration. The savings ratio fell to 3 per cent. in 1988 under the Tories, and we will not let them forget that.

The hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) poked fun at the 1100 cc cut-off for vehicle excise duty. He had the temerity to call it a joke. Drivers of 1.8 million cars will benefit from a £55 cut in the annual VED, and they will not regard it as a joke—and neither will members of the public in the hon. Gentleman's constituency when he goes into the Lobby tonight to vote against the Bill.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the road haulage industry. The total tax burden on UK hauliers is lower than that in other major EU states, and is below the EU average. The Government have been able to achieve that because we support business. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may mock, but we remember what happened to businesses when they were in power. Under the previous Government, a business went bust every three minutes.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) referred to the child tax credit and the taper. The taper works according to an individual's income, so if one person in a couple is a 40 per cent. taxpayer, the taper will bite, but if neither of them is, they can each earn about £32,000 and the taper will not bite. During that debate, there was a split between the hon. Member for Gainsborough, who made a plea to abolish independent taxation, and the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford who, only a couple of minutes later, made an even more passionate plea to save it. That is why we like the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford.

The Budget builds on a strong foundation of economic stability, advances a modern framework of efficient public services and encourages a dynamic Britain of enterprise and fairness. That is what the country said when people heard the Budget proposed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The Budget and the Finance Bill that implements it are about building a better Britain and a better economy for all our people. I commend the Bill to the House.

Religious Minorities (Middle East)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hill.]

11.6 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I am pleased to have the opportunity of raising the important subject of toleration for religious minorities in the middle east, and shall deal with two particularly important issues affecting Iran: toleration of people of the Bahai faith, and toleration of the people of Iran's Jewish community. However, the subject goes wider than Iran, and I appreciate that there are also alarming reports of events in Iraq.

Before dealing with those specific concerns, however, I should like to make it clear that, when I speak of toleration, I am in no sense trying to lecture other countries or to assert that one set of religious or cultural values is superior to another. I should like simply to assert the importance of tolerating the religious beliefs of any minority in any society, whatever that society's political, cultural or religious basis.

In the United Kingdom, such toleration has been hard won over many centuries. Even today, sometimes, that toleration is not as complete as we should wish. I am certainly aware, not of persecution by the state, but of cases in which members of the Muslim community, for example, have suffered from harassment, intolerance and even physical attack, simply because of their religious faith. Therefore, I should like simply to assert the importance of religious toleration.

Many of my constituents are interested in the subject of religious tolerance. On a number of occasions, I have been approached by constituents of mine who are members of the Bahai faith. I know that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) is anxious to mention the case of the Bahais, and that my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) is also very interested in the Bahai community. When Bahais in my constituency have come to see me, I have been impressed both by their character and by their gentle faith. However, in the middle east, especially in Iran, Bahais have faced particular problems of persecution.

Since 1979, more than 200 Iranian Bahais have been killed.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): Does my hon. Friend agree that there are difficult decisions for Bahais, who often have had to keep quiet about their problems for fear of recriminations and reprisals against their families in Iran?

Mr. Clappison: Yes—my hon. Friend makes an excellent point, which has been made also by Bahais to whom I have spoken. Her comment also underlines a report, in September 1998, by the special representative of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which detailed wide-ranging violations of the basic human rights of the Bahai community. The United Kingdom Foreign Minister who was dealing with the matter—the late Derek Fatchett, taking a characteristically robust stand in defending human rights—made appropriately robust statements on those violations. I am hoping for a similarly robust approach this evening.

I should like to draw particular attention to another immediate issue of persecution in Iran—the arrest of 13 members of the Jewish community in Iran on charges of espionage. This is a complex story. There have been changes in Iran since 1979, and the picture today is by no means a simple one. It must be said that members of the Jewish community in Iran are allowed to practice Judaism. They enjoy universal suffrage, and there is a representative of the Jewish community in the Iranian Parliament. There are elements in Iranian society and politics who take an enlightened view. It is important to give a balanced picture.

None the less, the background to this particular case is worrying. There has been persecution of members of the Jewish community in Iran since 1979 and the revolution in that country. At least 17 members of the Jewish community have been executed since then. Some of those executions have taken place recently—one in 1994 and two in 1996.

The 13 now under arrest are facing charges of espionage, a charge that carries the death penalty. There have been reports in some quarters that, at first, they faced charges relating to the sale of alcohol. Those are somewhat strange reports. Espionage has been linked to the consumption of alcohol in individual cases, but not to the sale of alcohol. Today, those people face the serious charge of espionage.

It is necessary to look at the character of those who have been charged with this serious offence to assess the credibility of the charge. That credibility is undermined when one takes into account that among the 13 people are rabbis and religious and community leaders—people of great standing in their community. That says something about the nature of the charges and the background to them. We should not give too much of a cloak of respectability to those charges.

I appreciate that those who are charged with the offences will face the Iranian judicial process, and I know that our Government have made certain representations about that process. We would want the people to receive fair and proper treatment under that process. However, I should like our concern to be expressed even more robustly, and I should like us to express concern at the fact that those people are being placed upon trial at all.

There has been a robust international reaction to the subject from France and Australia, among others. In Britain, Ministers are aware of the issues involved, and one Minister has met a delegation from the all-party inter-parliamentary council against anti-semitism. I appreciate that Ministers have taken an interest in that important subject.

I appreciate that this is a complex subject, and there is a complex background to it. I appreciate also that the Government will want a certain amount of flexibility in how they approach this matter. I urge the Minister to give an assurance that the Government will work in every possible way to protect the 13 people facing those most serious charges, and that they will do everything they possibly can, with their discretion, to bring about their release at the earliest possible opportunity. I hope that our Government will assert the need for toleration of this religious minority, and others, in Iran and throughout the middle east.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): First, I thank the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) and the Minister for allowing me to contribute to the debate.

I am not a Bahai myself, but I have come to know and deeply respect their values and traditions. As the hon. Member for Hertsmere said, they have a gentle character which is distinct and defines the nature of their faith.

With 300,000 members, the Bahais are Iran's largest religious minority. Unlike the Christian, Jewish and Zoroastrian minorities, they are not recognised as a religion by the Iranian constitution; as such, they are classified as unprotected infidels, and have no legal rights, even though Iran is a signatory to the international convention on civil and political rights.

The UN special representative to Iran, Maurice Copthorne, reported:

"the situation of the Bahais has not improved; in some respects it has deteriorated".

In July 1998, Ruhullah Rawhani was executed for being a Bahai. Even now, 14 Bahais languish in Iranian prisons, four of them facing death sentences. Iranian Bahais are barred from taking degrees; they cannot hold state sector jobs; their marriages are not respected; and many have even had their businesses repossessed by the state. It seems that their burial sites have even been desecrated.

Iran has yet to honour in full the recommendations of the special rapporteur on religious intolerance, Abdelfattah Amor. His proposals would emancipate all Iran's religious minorities. If they were introduced in phases, as the Bahais have suggested, there would be no need for any changes in the Iranian constitution.

Britain has been a good friend to the Bahais. It backed the resolution condemning Iran at the 55th session of the UN Commission on Human Rights. It is my view that past action by our Government has helped considerably in the fight for decent human rights for Iranian Bahais. I ask the Minister to give an assurance that the Government will continue actively to help Iranian Bahais in both word and deed—thereby, we hope, putting an end to this terrible persecution.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) for raising this important subject, which concerns a fundamental matter of human rights. I want to place on record the Government's policy on religious minorities in the middle east, whose plight has been highlighted recently by the detention on espionage charges of members of the Iranian Jewish community. Promotion of human rights is central to our foreign policy and religious freedom is a fundamental human right. All hon. Members would share that view.

We take every opportunity, working with our European Union partners, to urge all states to pursue laws and practices that foster tolerance and mutual respect and to protect religious minorities against discrimination and intimidation, wherever it happens and whatever the religion of the individual or group concerned. We also regularly raise with the Governments concerned specific cases of religious persecution.

[Mr. Tony Lloyd]

The human rights instruments of the United Nations set clear principles to be applied by states to protect the rights of everyone to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion. We are right to press all states, without exception, to adhere to those principles. Wherever possible, we aim to work with officials, religious leaders and non-governmental organisations at international and local level to promote mutual understanding and tolerance. Where the possibility of meaningful dialogue on human rights issues exists, I believe that it is the best way of achieving lasting improvements.

The human rights policy department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has recently started an informal consultation group to bring together a number of non-governmental organisations working for religious freedom. We use the group to exchange information not only about instances of abuse but about practical ways of tackling abuse and promoting tolerance. That is the longer-term agenda, but it is every bit as important as the necessary action that is taken in response to particular moments of persecution.

The hon. Members for Hertsmere, for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) and for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) all spoke about Iran. However, I recognise the point made by the hon. Member for Hertsmere. There have been some especially positive developments in Iran over the past two years, which should not be ignored and which bode well for the future.

The Iranian Government under President Khatami have undertaken a programme of significant change, which includes the enforcement of the rule of law, full facilitation of freedom of expression and a more open and co-operative foreign policy. Those steps should help to create an environment more conducive to the protection of individual rights and freedoms.

The Iranian Government have made significant progress with the programme. In particular, there is now an unprecedented freedom of debate in Iran, as most impartial observers recognise. The role of the press is increasingly prominent: it is becoming more open and critical and is having an impact, especially on the use of torture. We welcome and recognise those changes.

The effort to establish a civil society based on the rule of law has made progress as well. Democracy has been extended. The first local elections were held on 26 February, and showed overwhelming popular support for the reforms taking place in Iran. The Iranian Government are also steadily improving their relations with their neighbours, especially in the Persian gulf. That is a particularly welcome development. Iranian co-operation is vital for future stability in the region, but we must look at the country's record in the round, and I take on board what has been said about the two groups that hon. Members have mentioned.

I shall turn first to the question of the Jewish detainees. I hope that I can demonstrate that the Government have been active, bilaterally and through our multilateral arrangements and partnerships. Specifically, we and our European Union partners remain especially concerned about the recent detention of members of the Iranian Jewish community. We first became aware some weeks ago that a number of Jews had been detained without charge in Iran, but some time had passed since the detentions took place.

It was not easy initially to establish the truth amid the rumours circulating about what had happened. We have been in regular contact with the Agudas Israel organisation, both in the UK and, through our mission in New York, in the United States. We have also been in touch with the Board of Deputies of British Jews and with the other bodies and organisations that have drawn attention to these cases. The more reliable accounts now seem to indicate that 13 Iranian Jews have been detained. On 7 June, it became apparent, first through media reports from Iran and then officially, that they had been accused of espionage.

Before that news broke on 7 June, the German European Union presidency—representing all EU Governments—on a visit to Tehran on 20 May had already expressed the concern of member states at these detentions. That was followed up by a formal EU demarche in Tehran on 30 June. The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) made a statement on 10 June expressing the Government's strong concern about those detained. The Iranian ambassador was summoned on 1 July, when my hon. Friend pressed for a fair trial and access for visitors.

Many of our EU partners have taken similar action. Our ambassador in Tehran has also raised our concerns bilaterally with the Iranian authorities. We welcome one positive step—the Iranian Government's recent confirmation, following the arrests, that they accept responsibility for individuals of every religious persuasion in Iran, including specifically the Jewish community, which is officially recognised under the Iranian constitution. The constitution thereby guarantees them a fair trial. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has said:

"The Government condemn anti-semitism wherever it occurs"—[Official Report, 22 June 1999; Vol. 333, c. 915.].

That applies as much to Iran as to anywhere, and we shall continue to monitor the situation, and take further action as necessary.

Our priority will be action most likely to help those detained. This is more than a simple human rights issue, as it goes to the heart of president Khatami's declared objective of fully establishing the rule of law in Iran.

Mr. Clappison: The Minister will be aware that the Government have received a representation from, among others, Mr. Netanyahu, the former Prime Minister of Israel. The shadow Foreign Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), has asked the Government to make public their response to that contact. Will the Minister tell us something about that?

Mr. Lloyd: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a response about the Government's position. Normal practice is that representations from individuals, of whatever background, are treated as confidential, and it is for individuals to make their representations known if they wish to. I shall, however, look into the matter, and may write or speak to the hon. Gentleman in due course.

I can confirm what was said by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire about the plight of the Bahai community in Iran. Unlike the Christian community, the Jewish community and the Zoroastrian community, which have special protection under the Iranian constitution, the rights of the Bahai have no such protection. Their plight has been of serious concern for some time, and it remains so. We and our EU partners have raised our concerns with the Iranian authorities on many occasions. I was grateful for the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the role played by our deceased colleague Derek Fatchett, who made his extremely forthright views on human rights known to the Iranian authorities.

Persecution of individuals on religious grounds is totally unacceptable, whether or not a group is recognised by the constitution. The United Nations Commission on Human Rights resolution on Iran, sponsored by the EU and adopted on 23 April, reaffirmed international concern about the situation. We supported the resolution, which clearly signals the concerns of the entire international community.

We and our EU partners have also raised individual cases of concern with the Iranian authorities, most recently the cases of Mr. Najafabadi and Mr. Dhabihi-Mugaddam, both of whom face the death sentence. We were told on 4 October that their cases were subject to review by the Iranian supreme court. To date the sentences have not been carried out, and we have been led to believe that they will not be. That is welcome, but we await certainty on that point.

We also raised our concerns about the arrests at the end of last year of members of the Bahai institute of higher education, which relates particularly to the point made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire about access to education. The concern of successive British Governments has been marked and continuous, and we shall continue to press it.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere referred to Iraq, and I can put religious tolerance into a wider regional context. Religious minorities in Iraq have long been subject to discrimination and oppression. Simple expressions of belief lead to fear of arrest or imprisonment, as has been recognised by the UN Commission on Human Rights which, in its resolution on Iraq earlier this year, called on the Government of Iraq to respect and ensure the rights of all individuals, irrespective of their origin, ethnicity, gender or religion.

One interesting feature is that the majority Shia community, which amounts to about two thirds of the population, is the most persecuted group in Iraq. Reports from the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Human Rights, Max van der Stoel, whose specific brief is Iraq, show a systematic policy of intimidation against the Shi'ite religious community. Amnesty International has drawn attention to reports from June 1998 when hundreds of Shia Muslims were arrested by security forces in Karbala during processions to celebrate a religious anniversary. Scores of others were shot dead when Iraqi forces opened fire indiscriminately.

Mr. van der Stoel described the systematic attacks and assassinations of Shia clerics, such as the murder of Ayatollah al-Sadr in February, as part of a planned policy aimed at discouraging religious leaders from freely expressing their opinions and religious beliefs. Amnesty International believes that more than 100 Shi'ite clerics have disappeared since 1991.

The regime treats other religious minorities similarly, for example the Assyrian Christians, Turkomen and Yazidis, who all face ill treatment and repression. The fate of 33 members of the Yazidi community, for example, who were arrested in July 1996 remains unknown. Iraqi opposition groups have released documents that detail on-going ethnic cleansing of the Kirkuk region of its Kurdish and Turkomen residents. Similarly, in December, Iraqi tanks and troops entered an Assyrian village near Mosul, causing the inhabitants to flee.

I could continue at length, but time prevents the full record being established. As Max van der Stoel stated, the current regime has effectively eliminated freedom of thought, expression, association and assembly, in addition to the civil rights to life, liberty and physical integrity. There can be no doubt that, for the foreseeable future, the people of Iraq will not enjoy respect for their religious beliefs or their other human rights.

I thought that it was worth while establishing that contrast, not because we are sanguine about intolerance of religious minorities in Iran—of course we are not—but to point out that in the Iranian context we at least believe that we have the possibility of constructive dialogue. It is a dialogue that we will use forcefully. Sadly, I cannot tell the House that similar dialogue is possible with Iraq.

I reiterate to all hon. Members the central point that the Government are committed to a foreign policy that has human rights as its very essence. Of course, religious freedom must be one of the essentials. It is enshrined in international law and covenant and it is something that we as a Government will continue to pursue because we have a duty to do so.

I will contact the hon. Gentleman about Mr. Netanyahu and I am grateful to him for giving us the opportunity to have this important debate. While the House is not packed, its voice will be heard in Iran and Iraq and the message of concern and condemnation will spread much more widely than the small number of hon. Members here tonight would suggest.

Question put and agreed to.

Wildlife Protection

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

9.33 am

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I am delighted to have the opportunity to raise this important issue today, as 7 July is the 50th anniversary of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949—now known as the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981—which established the existing framework for wildlife protection and access to the countryside. I know that wildlife protection is a matter of great concern to hon. Members, especially on the Labour Benches, and I hope that a number of others will be able to participate in the debate.

I hope that, in the debate, we will succeed in persuading the Government to include a new wildlife and countryside Bill in the 1999 Queen's Speech, to cover the many issues that need to be addressed—the measures that would not only increase the protection of wildlife but increase people's enjoyment of the countryside. That would not only benefit us today, but would be an inheritance that we could leave for future generations.

The past 50 years have brought marked changes to our environment and countryside, some of them good, but many of them destructive and regressive. Many of our best wildlife sites have been lost and species that were once common are now endangered. That is a matter of great concern to my constituents and, sadly, sites in my constituency, are among those that have suffered as a result of inadequate protection.

The challenge to protect our natural heritage is greater than ever. That is emphasised by the shocking figures that starkly illustrate the threats to our countryside. At a rate of almost one a day, more than 300 of the United Kingdom's best wildlife sites are lost or damaged every year. We have seen a huge decline in wild flower meadows, lowland heathland, hedgerows and ancient woodlands in Britain.

Over the past 50 years, more than 25 species have become extinct in the wild in the UK, and more are heading that way. The World Wid Fund for Nature has projected that if no action is taken, water voles will become extinct in 2003, skylarks in 2009, and the song thrush will vanish from farmland by 2006.

Many have welcomed the Government's Green Paper on sites of special scientific interest, which I shall call special sites. It outlined how such sites could be better protected. However, it is critical that those proposals are translated into action at the earliest opportunity. Delay simply means more damage and destruction to our countryside. The Government could do more than they have outlined in the Green Paper by examining the needs of species outside those special sites, where there are also serious threats to wildlife.

More than half of all hon. Members—343 in all—have signed early-day motion 11, which calls for a wildlife Bill based on the wildlife charter. The level of support that it has received sends the strongest signal to the Government that there is a firm belief right across the political spectrum that early action is essential.

The Wildlife and Countryside Act was revised in 1981, but it is out of date and is not working. Landowners and managers are not legally obliged to manage special sites for the benefit of the wildlife for which they were declared. There have been no prosecutions for destroying listed plants, and only a handful of prosecutions for harming animals, other than bats.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I participated in the Committee stage, which was 100 hours, of the 1981 Act. One of the troubles is not the Act, but the reluctance of authorities to go to the courts to prosecute. I wish my hon. Friend well with all my heart in her efforts to persuade the Government to introduce another Bill, but something must be done to persuade authorities to go to law, when that is justified.

Ms Drown: I agree with my hon. Friend. The improvements to the legislation must include clearer statutory duties for landowners and managers, as well as better enforcement, strengthened powers to enter land, and stiffer penalties that would act as a real deterrent. There should be improved powers for statutory nature conservation agencies, so that they can fulfil an effective watchdog role. Landowners also need advice on how they can protect wildlife and which practices will cause damage.

The objective is not anti-farmer or anti-landowner legislation. Farmers in my constituency have made clear to me their commitment to wildlife and the environment, and how they want to co-operate with the Government and environmental groups to get the best for the countryside.

That brings me to incentives. I ask the Government to consider incentives to encourage landowners to invest in the proper management and protection of wildlife. In 1996–97, management payments on special sites amounted to £12 million. Those were typically compensation payments for not carrying out an activity, rather than an incentive for positive management. Compensation payments can be far less than an owner could get for rearing sheep or cattle, or for growing flax, so better directed incentives may reap better rewards for wildlife in the UK.

I urge the Government to take a broader look at how policies across Departments impact on the success of wildlife and countryside legislation. For instance, agricultural intensification has led to a reduction in the quantity and quality of habitats such as heather moorland, chalk grassland and lowland wet grassland. Species are lost because of overgrazing of pastures, undergrazing of marginal land, the use of chemical fertilisers and pesticides, and the loss of traditional crop rotations. Water abstraction can lead to the drying out of important wetland sites, and planning decisions made years ago continue to cause harm to sites—for example, through mineral extraction. Revising planning policy could help in that respect. The Department for Education and Employment could also have a part to play in improving education in our schools on the environment and protection of wildlife and encouraging initiatives among children to help to protect their local wildlife.

A coalition of 22 wildlife organisations, including the National Trust, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, Friends of the Earth and the Wildlife Trusts, is supported by more than 5.5 million people in the United Kingdom. Most political parties would be glad of such a membership. It is campaigning for better legal protection for wildlife. Specifically, it wants legislation to be introduced that will deliver the Government's manifesto commitment to "ensure better protection for wildlife".

Such a Bill will also provide an ideal opportunity to introduce the Government's proposals for improved access to open countryside, and I know that ramblers in South Swindon are anxious for it to be enacted at the earliest opportunity. I therefore urge the Government to announce a comprehensive wildlife and countryside Bill in the 1999 Queen's Speech to back up their determination to halt further environmental degradation and to bring many of their good intentions to fruition.

In many cases, we cannot replace the wildlife habitats that we are losing without legislation to protect them. We certainly cannot bring back species that become extinct. There is a consensus on the need for action. For the sake of wildlife, the enjoyment that our countryside brings and the wonderful inheritance that we could leave for future generations, I urge the Government to listen to the calls made by my hon. Friends and by me today.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I support much of what the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) has said and I am sure that the Bill for which she asks will enjoy broad cross-party support. Indeed, I have expressed my support for it by signing early-day motion 11 and a number of similar ones.

For the benefit of the Minister, I want to air a parochial concern that, because of the nature of the New forest and the fact that it is the most important wildlife and ecological sanctuary in western Europe, is also a concern for the nation. I do not want him to take the opportunity presented by the introduction of a wildlife protection Bill in the next Session to slip through a new national park status for the New forest. My concern is that changes made to the existing management structure of the New forest will be for the worse and to the detriment of wildlife protection and that sensitive ecological area.

I estimate that no modern legislation would afford the powers that the existing structures enjoy, although those structures are undemocratic. It would not give them the power to stand against so-called progress and development. If hon. Members consider the issues of development versus conservation as they have arisen over the past 30 years in the New forest, they will find that, on every occasion, one or other of the local authorities—be it Hampshire county council or New Forest district council or its forebears—has stood on the side of development, democratically representing the wishes of the people.

To take the cause celebre—the great Lyndhurst bypass—there was a democratic call for the private Member's Bill on it which was considered in this Parliament. By sponsoring it, Hampshire county council was responding quite legitimately to the democratic concerns expressed by the people of Lyndhurst and of Lymington. We know the history of bypasses at Newbury and in the west midlands. We also know of the attendant legitimate concern of people who are interested in the protection of wildlife habitats and we have witnessed the public disorder that may arise from that concern. But we should bear in mind the fact that the people of Lyndhurst and of Lymington sought that bypass.

The bypass would have taken up an enormous swathe of the New forest. My concern is that, had there been a park authority—loaded, as it inevitably would have been, with representatives of the democratically accountable district and county councils—it would have said, "On people versus ponies, because of the development of the fast-growing, economically viable southern coastal strip below the New forest, people are more important that ponies, so we ought to let the bypass go through." I believe that that would not have been in the interests of the New forest or the nation.

It is the job of legislation to protect the interests of the New forest. The Minister will no doubt assure me, as he has done in the past, that the existing structures will not be constrained by any change in status that he might envisage. In other words, the existing laws, which govern the New forest and give the verderers court the power that it now enjoys to thwart development, will not be changed. I understand that, but there is a difficulty and it will arise merely because of the existence of a national park authority or quasi-authority.

I quote the experience of Anthony Passmore, one of the senior and most experienced verderers, as he told it to me. He said, "Mr. Swayne, a national park body may not constrain or change the existing verderers court and its authority, but suppose that there had been a national park authority, representing the strategic view of the future of the New forest and all that that implies, when the Lyndhurst bypass Bill was going through Parliament. Suppose that it had said that there should be a Lyndhurst bypass. Would the verderers court, irrespective of its ability and power to say no, have had—to put it bluntly—the guts to say no when the whole thrust of the strategic authority, which is charged with drawing up the strategy for the future of the New forest, had been that the bypass should go ahead?"

With respect to any changes that the Minister might envisage that would not necessarily change the power of the verderers, who are the guardians of conservation in the New forest, I warn him that there may be unforeseen effects. I would counsel him that any legislation that he might introduce that would change the status of the New forest or alter the balance of the powers within it would be highly likely to be a hybrid Bill, given the existence of the commoners and their rights. That might introduce all sorts of difficulties for a wildlife protection Bill, which the hon. Member for South Swindon would not welcome.

Mr. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on securing an Adjournment debate on this most important topic. My constituency is at the core of the new 200 sq miles national forest. It is developing rapidly and transforming the landscape in several different counties. I shall speak about the mirror image of our expanding forest: the contracting ancient woodlands and the continuing threats that they face.

In England and Wales, ancient woods are areas where there has been continuous woodland cover since at least 1600. Planting was uncommon before that date, so woods were likely to have developed naturally. In Scotland, ancient woods date from 1750, because the best historical maps available are from a military survey carried out at about that time.

It is particularly relevant in the context of this debate to address the protection of ancient woodland, which is one of the great irreplaceable glories of our natural heritage. As the habitat most representative of original, natural, stable conditions, it is home to more threatened species than any other habitat in the United Kingdom. That is underlined by the United Kingdom biodiversity action plan, which suggests that broadleaf woodland supports nearly twice as many BAP species as any other habitat. It supports more than twice as many species as chalk grassland, and nearly three times as many as lowland heathland. It must be a key element in any Government strategy aiming to provide better protection for wildlife.

Ancient woodlands are the last bastion of a good deal of our wildlife heritage. They deserve proper protection, and there could be no more appropriate time than the millennium to consider that. The problem is that 85 per cent. of ancient woodland, including five of the 12 largest ancient woodland sites in the United Kingdom, lacks the designation of site of special scientific interest, or, indeed, any other designation. More than half of Britain's semi-natural ancient woodland has been lost since the first world war, mainly through conversion to conifer woodland and clearance for agriculture. In England, Wales and Scotland, just 300,000 hectares of ancient semi-natural woodland survive—an area roughly the size of Leicestershire. In Northern Ireland, there are no accurate records of the amount of ancient woodland, as far as I am aware.

Ancient woodland remains constantly under threat, especially from development pressures. The Government forecast that, in the next 20 years, 1.44 million more homes will be needed in south-east England; but that is the richest area that we have for ancient woodland. Kent, Hampshire, East and West Sussex and Surrey hold nearly 30 per cent. of such ecological treasures. The Channel tunnel rail link, the Newbury bypass and countless less well-known road schemes have threatened or destroyed areas of ancient woodland. Increasingly, ancient woodland is now to be found in small fragments: islands of biodiversity surrounded by a hostile landscape of intensive agriculture and urban sprawl.

More than 80 per cent. of individual ancient woods in the inventory of England and Wales are less than 20 hectares in size. Just 500 exceed 100 hectares—1 sq km—and only 12 ancient semi-natural woods are larger than 300 hectares. These fragments are often too small to sustain healthy populations of many woodland species, and too isolated to allow migration. As global warming becomes a reality, many species, unable to relocate, face the likelihood of extinction. The bleak picture is considerably worsened by the degradation of our ancient woods through inappropriate use, poor management and repeated replanting with non-native species.

Although, in some ancient woodlands, endangered species, such as the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), hang on, in the past 100 years more species have become nationally extinct in broadleaf woodland than in any other habitat—46 species—and it also contains the most globally threatened and rapidly declining species—78. The Institute of Terrestrial Ecology's "Countryside Survey 90" showed that, between 1978 and 1990, there was a 14 per cent. loss of "species richness" in such woodlands, a higher figure than in any other semi-natural habitat.

What action should the Government take to staunch the worrying losses of ancient woodland? There are some encouraging signs that the need to protect these crucial sites is being recognised, but words must be matched by actions. The "England Forestry Strategy", published by the Government at the end of last year, contains a commitment to review the effectiveness of existing measures to protect ancient semi-natural woodlands, and to provide added protection if that is shown to be necessary. Organisations such as the Woodland Trusts, in its recently launched millennium challenges to Government—I believe that the Minister was present at the launch—have said how crucial it is to deliver on that core commitment. A similar commitment was given in the "United Kingdom Sustainable Development Strategy", along with a statement of the Government's aim to halt the trend of ancient woodland loss and fragmentation. It is crucial for those commitments to be acted on quickly.

Hon. Members sometimes speak of the need for protective mechanisms targeted at land adjacent to SSSIs, and of the importance of empowering Government agencies to fulfil an effective watchdog role. I agree: SSSIs certainly need to withstand environmental change, and the measures suggested would be helpful. Agencies have a key protective role, but I believe that similar measures for our ancient woodlands are needed even more urgently. There must be no further loss of ancient woodland. The time really has come to say, "Enough is enough."

I support environmental organisations that are pressing for a fully maintained, up-to-date inventory of ancient woodland covering the whole of the United Kingdom, with regular assessments to confirm the extent and quality of the nation's ancient woods. We must also provide better protection of ancient woodlands such as Gracedieu woods in north-west Leicestershire through legislation and the planning system. I believe that, in the longer term, a special designation for them will be needed to toughen up those controls.

We must also encourage owners of ancient woodland to understand its importance and manage it appropriately, and provide better guidelines and incentives to help them to do so. We must assist appropriate groups to continue to acquire ancient woods, and bring them under sensitive management. Finally, in providing new native woodland cover, we must target it to link and buffer existing ancient woodland sites that should be seen as the key resource in enhancing people's enjoyment of woodland.

I believe that we should treat ancient woodlands, those timeless places of great tranquillity and beauty, as the foundation of our approach to improving biodiversity. I should very much like to hear the Minister's comments.

9.57 am

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I join others in congratulating the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on securing this important debate. I support her call for the inclusion of a wildlife Bill in the next Queen's Speech, and would be happy to facilitate the swift passage of such a Bill.

As has been said, the debate is timely. Fifty years after the post-war Government's landmark legislation, new measures are needed to protect our wildlife. The House is well versed in the arguments: we debated them in an Adjournment debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on 14 April, and, only last week, a linked issue—the protection of areas of outstanding natural beauty—was discussed in an Adjournment debate called by the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Caton).

Early-day motion 11, tabled by the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper), continues to attract increasing support. As of yesterday, when I checked, it had the support of no fewer than 343 hon. Members. In the last Session, a similar early-day motion received the support of 302 hon. Members, so progress is clearly being made. A clear majority not just of Back Benchers, but of the House as a whole, now favours legislation. I hope that the Minister will note that.

Threatened species were mentioned in those earlier debates, and have been mentioned again today. I have obtained a few new examples. One is the nail fungus, which lives in the dung of horses, mainly in the New forest in Hampshire. The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) may well be familiar with such species. The nail fungus is internationally threatened, but has been refused protection because the threats that it faces are not intentional. That is a key point, which the Minister should consider. The Wildlife Trusts tell me that it can only advise on the need; there is no law to back it up.

There are other examples that are more local to my constituency. As a Member whose constituency is in Greater London, I am particularly concerned about the future of the Erith marshes in south London, which support breeding skylarks, grass snakes and the hugely important population of water voles. They are threatened by the proposed development of a supermarket distribution depot. Currently, the law can do nothing to stop that development.

I could mention many other wildlife species or habitats whose days are numbered. In Surrey and across south-east England, where the pressure to build is greatest, acres of ancient woodland are under threat. The Deptford pink, the sandy stilt puffball and dormice are all under threat somewhere in the United Kingdom.

Today's debate is timely not only because we are marking the anniversary of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, but for another reason, because the Government seem to be starting to wobble in their commitment to require that 60 per cent. of new build should be on brown-field sites. As the current rate of such build—1996 is the most recent year for which figures are available—is 56 per cent., a target of 60 per cent. can hardly be thought to be challenging. The Government have to be bolder both on that issue and on wildlife protection.

The debate is also timely because a revised planning policy guidance note 3 has just been issued, although it has relatively little to say about the biodiversity implications of new housing development. The PPG also provides no guidance whatsoever on minimising the indirect environmental impact of housing development.

I should like to deal with a couple of wildlife reform matters that I have not dealt with before. First, it is—at best—unclear whether the United Kingdom biodiversity action plan is adequate to fulfil the requirements of the 1979 European Union birds directive and the 1982 habitats directive, both of which require restoration of protected habitats. As the biodiversity action plan has not been implemented statutorily, many of its prescribed actions have no Government funding and can be undertaken only by voluntary bodies. I shall be grateful if the Minister will tell us whether such provision fulfils the function of habitat restoration required by the EU directives.

The second matter also concerns EU law. The EU birds directive requires the United Kingdom Government to designate as special protection areas sites that support internationally important concentrations of particular bird species. However, certain species listed for protection under the directive are not covered by the existing SPA network, as their populations are dispersed over a much wider area. Some heathlands in England—the Thames basin heaths, Wealdon heaths and Breckland—for example, support important populations or rare species, such as the stone curlew, woodlark, nightjar, and the Dartford warbler, but are still not protected by SPA status. Although that issue is slightly different from that of sites of special scientific interest, it is certainly relevant to today's debate, and illustrates the general crisis facing United Kingdom wildlife.

We should be in no doubt that time is running out for our wildlife. Here are a few facts: every day, another SSSI is destroyed or damaged; in the past six years, there have been more than 2,000 cases of damage to SSSIs; and 45 per cent. of all SSSIs are deemed to be in an unfavourable condition. Time is, therefore, of the essence—as I said in our most recent debate on the issue, in April. Since then, unfortunately, nothing much has changed—except that two more months have elapsed, and, undoubtedly, another 50 or 60 cases of damage to SSSIs will have been recorded.

In 1997, Labour was elected with a pledge to ensure better protection for wildlife. As we approach 2000, it is time to deliver on that pledge. In 1949, the Attlee Government had the foresight to introduce their legislation; now, the Government should show similar foresight. As other hon. Members have said, adequate legislation must be introduced in the next Queen's Speech. The House of Commons wants such legislation. I think that Ministers at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions also want legislation, and I know that the country wants it. Now, it is time for the Prime Minister to deliver it.

10.4 am

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I am very happy to contribute to this very important debate on wildlife conservation. I shall keep my remarks brief, as I know that many colleagues wish to speak.

A moment ago, my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Taylor) spoke about the importance of ancient woodlands, and said that we should help people to understand the importance of maintaining them. As he was speaking, I allowed myself a wry smile, because it was only a few years ago, in 1995, when the warden of Windsor great park ordered the felling of 65 ancient oak trees that dated back to Queen Anne's days. The warden of Windsor great park is, of course, the Duke of Edinburgh. If he does not know the importance of ancient woodland, what hope is there for us?

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) spoke about the nail fungus living in the dung of New Forest ponies. Tragically, that is not the only species that has gone in recent years. I received a briefing from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, stating that the Essex emerald moth has gone—it is extinct. The mouse-eared bat, which sounds like an endearing creature, is gone for ever—extinct. As for plant life, alpine butterwort is gone, as is the purple spurge. I do not know what the purple spurge looks like—I have probably never seen it in my life—but I feel that it is a tragedy for all of us that it is gone.

We need to act, and to act quickly. This morning, on the "Today" programme, I heard the Minister for the Environment tell us that action would be taken. He was good; he is always good. If I had a vote for Ministers—tragically, I do not—he would have my vote. I hope that he keeps his job.

Mr. David Taylor: Kiss of death.

Mr. Prentice: We all want my right hon. Friend to keep his job. We do not want him to be moved, to placate some lobby saying, "The Government are too green. We've gotta get rid of him." I want him to stay where he is.

The countryside Minister told John Humphrys that we need legislation to protect sites of special scientific interest, and that it was not a question of if, but when—which had a familiar ring to it. This year, in March, when I withdrew my Right to Roam Bill, he told me that the Government were in favour of opening up the countryside—4 million acres of mountain, moorland, heath and common land—and that that would be done as soon as parliamentary time permits. This November, we want to see that parliamentary time permitted.

This Session, we have dealt with the City of London (Ward Elections) Bill. No one asked me whether we should consider that Bill. Mysteriously—magically—we discovered ourselves debating it in the Chamber. That Bill has never been debated in the parliamentary Labour party, and no one in the wider Labour party knows about it. Personally, I feel quite hostile to it; but we debated it. In the same breath, however, we are told that we cannot introduce wildlife and habitat legislation because of a problem with parliamentary time. There is lots of parliamentary time.

Mr. Brake: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman would be prepared, as I would, to extend our stay in this place a little into our rather generous summer recess to address the issue?

Mr. Prentice: The hon. Gentleman's comments would carry more force if he had a few Liberal Democrat colleagues sitting behind him. I should say, just for the record, that one Liberal Democrat Member—from a party that waxes lyrical about its concern for wildlife and habitat—is in the Chamber. It is a pity that, today, he could not get a few more Liberal Democrats Members to come and support his request.

This morning—to get back to the point—the countryside Minister said that he was seeking the earliest legislative slot for the relevant Bill. Listening to him, I started running around trying to find a pen, as I thought that he was going to say something of great moment, which he did. He said that there was a very good chance of obtaining that legislative slot, and then he played his trump card: "Tony Blair is strongly in support of this."

So what is the problem? The Prime Minister apparently supports strongly the need for early legislation. The problem is that too many people just do not believe it. Philip Rothwell, head of policy operation at the Royal Society for the Prevention of Birds [HON. MEMBERS: "Protection."] I am obviously too fired up today. Let me call it the RSPB. Mr. Rothwell was quoted in The Express as saying:

> "Tony Blair is not interested in the environment and he has surrounded himself with advisers who are not interested either."

The RSPB is not some fringe organisation that can be dismissed with a wave of the hand. There are 3 million members of the RSPB and other organisations dedicated to the protection of wildlife.

If the RSPB holds that view, we can imagine the millions more who feel the same. The perception exists that the Government are dragging their feet, and much that has happened has reinforced that idea. I was given a commitment in March that there would be legislation on the right to roam, but the papers tell us that the idea has been shelved in case it alienates landowning interests. Fox hunting is immensely important, particularly to our younger constituents, but the Government give the impression of being unwilling to take on the blood sports lobby.

Despite what my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment said on the radio this morning, there is a feeling that wildlife is another area that may fall off the end of the plank. If we are governed by focus groups that tell us that health and education are the top priorities—as they must be—it is inevitable that wildlife protection will be regarded as less important in the great scheme of things. But that is a mistake.

Our attitude to wildlife boils down to trust. Do the people trust the Government to deliver? If we do not deliver on wildlife, it will be impossible to make promises about legislation at the next election. We have an enormous majority, and we control the legislative agenda. We could sit here for 12 months to pass a wildlife Bill if we wanted to.

The Government must recognise that SSSIs are being damaged and that more must be done to protect habitats. There is huge support for legislation, and a Bill would immensely cheer up my colleagues in the parliamentary Labour party. A fortnight ago, we held a debate—no vote of course—on what we should like in the Queen's Speech, and there was overwhelming support for legislation on access to the countryside and on wildlife. To coin perhaps the wrong phrase, we could kill two birds with one stone by yoking the two areas together in a comprehensive Bill. The legislation would have no cost, or at most a very low cost. I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to do all in his power to persuade the decision makers to introduce such a Bill in November.

10.15 am

Mrs. Helen Brinton (Peterborough): I am delighted to add my voice to those calling for greater protection for wildlife, and particularly to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) who spoke with great passion. It is fitting that we should mark the 50th anniversary of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, which was, as so many have said, ground-breaking legislation introduced by a great Labour Government, by returning to the issue of wildlife protection and asking what improvements we can make.

We must accept that improvements are now needed to that legislation. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment knows that, and I commend him on his hard work in this area. However, to make improvements that we all want for the protection of sites of special scientific interest, we need new legislation, and I hope that the next Queens Speech will include a Bill.

The need for improvements is illustrated by Government figures showing that more than 300 SSSIs are damaged every year. The effect of even just one more year's delay is absolutely clear. A year's delay would mean another 300 of our finest and most treasured wildlife sites being destroyed or ruined. We cannot allow that to happen.

My constituents have raised this matter with me. The protection of wildlife sites and SSSIs has real resonance with members of the public who want our countryside to be preserved and the wild animals and wild flowers that make the countryside such a special place to be protected. I have received many letters from constituents, and many hon. Members will have received, in the form of an enormous daisy chain, a novel and very large petition from their constituents.

It is easy to see why the issue has such resonance with the public. Many beautiful places known to our constituents are being damaged. In Northamptonshire alone, two SSSIs have been all but destroyed. A tiny fraction of Harleston heath remains; despite its SSSI status, the rules to protect it from development and forestry were too weak. Likewise, only a fragment of the Oakley purlieus SSSI remains, its having been destroyed by quarrying.

On top of the loss of those beautiful places, the public recognise the loss of important and well-loved species. I was staggered to see in today's report from the wildlife and countryside link that 25 species have become extinct in the UK since the passage of Clem Attlee's 1949 Act. We think of extinction as something that happens in countries struck by poverty, or as a relic of the last century. We think of it happening when people destroy habitats in a desperate attempt to grow food or scrape out a living. We do not think of it happening in a prosperous country such as the United Kingdom, where there are laws to protect the countryside.

Other species have suffered dramatic declines. The grey partridge has declined by 78 per cent. since 1972, and the tree sparrow by 87 per cent. Even among birds as common as starlings—once positively a pest because of their enormous flocks—numbers have dropped dramatically. People notice these changes, and the introduction of a Bill to halt the decline would be extremely popular and effective politics.

As I said earlier, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment has taken a superb, excellent and dynamic lead on the issue. The coalition of wildlife groups, with a total membership of some 6 million people—a heavy voting body there—welcomed the positive spirit of co-operation that he has shown and gave him an excellent reception at a public rally here at the House of Commons. Now is the time to build on the support and good will for the Government's work so far, but we need to maintain that momentum by introducing the necessary legislation to protect our wildlife.

Along with many other right hon. and hon. Members, I would be delighted if new legislation provided greater access for people to enjoy the countryside. This is how our Labour Government should celebrate the 50th anniversary of Clem Attlee's last Bill; it is how we should welcome the next century and it would delight the many millions of people who would welcome such protection.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on her initiative in introducing today's excellent debate. I very much support the call from my hon. Friend and others for new countryside and wildlife law. I do so as a committed environmentalist and as a Londoner.

Despite the common perception here and elsewhere, London's wildlife encompasses rather more than the pigeons in Trafalgar square. Londoners have always very much supported and valued the city's elegant parks and municipal flowerbeds. There is increasing recognition of the precious diversity of our wildlife. We have urban habitats, railway corridors, private gardens and wasteland, all of which support valued wildlife.

The London Wildlife Trust has a membership of 7,000 and I am proud to be one of them. We are engaged in a great fight to try to preserve our precious wildlife against the on-going and unrelenting pressures of development. It is not that the development is unwelcome—indeed, in my run-down and deprived constituency rehabilitation and regeneration are critical to our economic life and employment opportunities. Although I support building homes on brown-field sites and protecting the green belt, the pressure on those sites means that Londoners may be deprived of their wildlife and that is clearly not acceptable.

Our quality of life in London depends on getting the balance right between appropriate development and respect for ecology and the recognition that biodiversity matters. A surprisingly wide range of animals and plants are found in London. Many of them are thriving, but others are only just surviving. We cannot take that natural wealth for granted. In London, as elsewhere, there has been a haemorrhage of wildlife sites over the past 30 years. Unless we have stronger wildlife laws, the process will continue inexorably.

My constituency is no exception. Although its border is just five miles from here and it is a dense urban area, just 200 years ago it was an area of market gardens.

A nationally rare species of plant known as the Deptford Pink dates from that time. Another rare species is found in Deptford creek. The black redstart, which is rarer than the golden eagle, first bred in London in the 1920s. Seven per cent. of the national population and 40 per cent. of the London population of black redstarts are found in Deptford creek. However, Deptford creek is now a silted up part of the river. It is bordered on all sides by dereliction and it is prime land for redevelopment. The creekside project in my constituency, led by Jill Goddard, has undertaken a mapping exercise to ensure that we understand what wildlife is there so that the development that we welcome will preserve wildlife habitats. Amazingly, the Environment Agency has constructed new flood defences from old wood and in a way that protects the wildlife habitats.

Given all that, why do we need new laws? The black redstart is listed in schedule 1 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Its nests are protected; its eggs are protected; breeding adults are protected and so are the young birds. However, for the rest of the year it is possible to destroy its habitat and, as we all know, if the habitat is destroyed, the species cannot breed.

There are many similar cases in other parts of London. Water voles are under threat in many areas such as the Erith, Crayford and Rainham marshes that were mentioned by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake).

Many other sites are being targeted for development, including those occupied by skylarks, stag beetles and other wildlife. I have not time to mention them all, but they are extremely numerous and precious. They are important not only to Londoners, but regionally and nationally. Without new laws, the quality of life in our great city will be undermined and so will our biodiversity. I very much support today's debate.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on securing today's debate. I should like to concentrate on peat lands and the Thorne and Hatfield moors that are in my constituency and the constituencies of my hon. Friends the Members for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) and for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey). They form one of the United Kingdom's rarest and most vulnerable habitats and are all that is left of a vast wetland that once existed around the Humber estuary 4000 years ago. Over time, layer upon layer of mosses accumulated and became compacted in the waterlogged conditions. Plants and insects colonised the surfaces and rare or even extinct bog plant, dragonflies, butterflies and beetles were commonplace many years ago.

Today, 94 per cent. of the United Kingdom's peat bogs have been lost and fewer than 6,000 hectares remain in near natural condition. Thorne and Hatfield moors are part of this and today they represent England's largest raised peat bog site. They support more than 3,000 insects, 800 flowering plants and hundreds of liver-worts, lichens and fungi. They are vital for breeding, migrating and wintering birds including golden plovers, hen harriers and nightjars. People have worked on the moors for 500 years and the incredible archaeological record contained within the peat was, until relatively recently, undisturbed.

Such a site should be managed for its incredible wealth of bog vegetation and associated wildlife, yet, instead, I am sad to say, it is being threatened by commercial peat extraction. Instead of being treasured, protected and nurtured, it is being plundered for its peat.

Peat extraction threatens many important sites in the United Kingdom. Of the 14 extraction sites in England, nine have SSSI status. Thorne and Hatfield, along with Wedholme Flow—all three proposed EU Natura 2000 designations—account for more than 50 per cent. of UK production. The fact that extraction of peat is permitted on SSSIs highlights the major weaknesses in protecting those sites.

The problem dates back to 1951 when planning permission was granted for peat extraction. Then, as for hundreds of years previously, hand-digging was the norm, but industrialisation of the process has ravaged the land. In the 1960s, the process was mechanised and now, since milling methods were introduced in the 1980s—with little complaint from the Opposition—extraction involves the almost complete removal of surface vegetation along with the top layer of peat. That has occurred on large tracts of Thorne and Hatfield and the huge areas of stripped, bare earth, where once were beautiful moors, are a very sad sight indeed.

The vast majority of peat that has taken many, many years to be created, has been lost in only the past decade. That has heightened the sense of the urgent need for Government action. Each day that extraction continues and the land is stripped and drained, with the removal of tons of peat, nature's foothold on the Thorne and Hatfield moors weakens.

Locally, there is immense concern that such an important site is being lost. I get more letters from constituents on that issue than on any other. When English Nature proposed removing the SSSI status there was an amazing campaign, which we won. I was pleased to attend a meeting in Thorne where more than 400 local residents came along to make their feelings known. I know that my hon. Friends the Members for Doncaster, North and for Brigg and Goole have had the same experience.

Environmental matters are often said to be the concern of the middle classes—eco-warriors shut away in their leafy suburbs—but the letters that I get are from people in the former coal mining villages that surround the moors, who are witnessing the disappearance of a national treasure. They understand only too well that the extractors' economic arguments do not add up.

Extraction is not and never was a long-term employment option; it will result only in the permanent destruction of the moors. We believe that there is an alternative: a sustainable tourist industry on the site, protecting it while providing enjoyment and long-term economic stability for the local population.

There is such concern that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning has established a peat working group that includes representatives of the industry and of the environmental lobby. Labour Members are keen that, wherever possible, business interests should be married with the public interest, but my worry is that, on this issue, there is no common ground that can be established between the extractors, who see money in peat, and the public, who want the moors to be preserved.

[Caroline Flint]

I am not surprised that the peat working group has so far failed to produce any report, but I am very concerned and I call on the Government to bite the bullet and take the long-term environmental view that is so clearly in the national interest. Many solutions are available. In the long term, my constituents want a complete end to peat extraction. That could be phased to avoid any major impact on jobs. We can work with the industry to develop alternatives to peat. I am sure that many hon. Members are keen gardeners and viewers of "Ground Force". We want a "Ground Force" team of our own in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. I leave it to Ministers to decide who should be Alan, Tommy and Charlie, but if the Government can find a solution that will preserve the moors for all time, they will receive great credit.

The longer we spend without a clear policy, the more events will take their own course, and the moors will simply be worked to death; with them will go much of the precious wildlife that they support.

10.32 am

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) has done the House a service in securing this debate.

I want to express my support for the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), who has waged an unrelenting campaign to secure the right to roam. I agree that it is essential to ensure that access to open countryside is built into comprehensive wildlife and countryside legislation.

Such legislation also provides the opportunity to settle once and for all the contentious issue of fox hunting. No other issue has aroused such interest, especially in young voters. Our manifesto made it clear that our position was not to legislate against fox hunting but to provide the opportunity for a free vote, although there is huge public support for a ban.

I endorse the work of the Government and the previous Government in developing biodiversity policies. It is important to understand that wildlife protection is not only about furry creatures but goes far deeper: it is about environmental survival. The variety of species that survive is an indicator of the health of the planet on which we all depend. This is not an add-on extra: it goes to the heart of our survival on this planet.

I commend the previous Government's biodiversity action plan, and especially the recently published volume 4, on invertebrates. For those with any interest in creepy crawlies, it is a treasure house of fascinating information. I look forward to volume 5.

Whatever legislation we pass, the protection will be limited if we do not tackle the root causes of environmental degradation. In most cases, those are the deregulated economic processes, both industrial and agricultural, that have disfigured our society and environment for so many years. We must set this debate in the wider context of the reform of the common agricultural policy and the implementation of the Kyoto directive on climate change.

Whatever an individual Government may do, this is a matter on which the limitations of the nation state are most evident. We must work internationally. The European Union has an important role and it is crucial that we play a full part in the various international treaties and protocols that have been and will continue to be established to secure biodiversity.

The Government and the previous Government have an enviable record in not only signing international treaties but ratifying them quickly. I urge the Government to continue that process, especially with the Kyoto protocol and the Århus protocol on access to environmental information. There are two important protocols that we have signed, but not yet ratified: the heavy metals protocol and the one on persistent organic pollutants. Those protocols are crucial to biodiversity and I urge the Government to ratify them swiftly.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I welcome this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) has given everyone an opportunity to express their views and feelings, which is very important. There is nothing more important to people in this country than looking after wildlife, habitats and countryside. There is more pressure as more people want to enjoy the countryside, and we must make it more accessible.

All our mailbags are filled with letters from people who want an end to fox hunting. Sooner or later, it must be tackled. The majority of the House and of the country support a ban. It is time to legislate. Let me describe what happens in conservation areas that are supposed to protect wildlife. In Rivington, a beautiful part of my constituency—I am lucky to have a mainly rural constituency where we can enjoy the pleasure of the countryside—the hunt comes along, and the fox hunters, having had no luck that day, dig out a fox. They do not kill it instantly. Oh, no. We cannot have fun without cruelty. They release the fox and chase it and chase it before killing it. Is that how we should treat our wildlife? I say not. The time has to come to end such cruelty.

In the southern lakeland, gamekeepers use traps on badgers. In their view, killing them instantly is obviously wrong. They believe in cruel traps and it takes a long time for the badgers to die. We have found half-skeletons of badgers. What a terrible end for such a beautiful animal. Badgers are protected, but such practices continue.

Protected species of birds have their nests robbed and their chicks stolen. There is no true protection. Fines are not enough: if it takes mandatory prison sentences to protect the birds, let us do that. Hen harriers—beautiful birds—are shot by gamekeepers because they do not fit in with what they think a grouse moor should be. The countryside is not about that; it is about balance. We must ensure that species are protected for everyone to see and enjoy, because they are not for the few to destroy. It is time for us to change our views about wildlife, habitats and countryside. If we work together, we can ensure our future.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on securing the debate. She will be either cheered up or worried when I say that I agree with about 90 per cent. of what she said. The Minister and I are getting used to each other: this is the second Wednesday morning in a row that we have discussed countryside protection. If we go around the same course again next Wednesday, I hope that he will still be with us in his post.

It is clear that we broadly agree on many of the aims of wildlife and habitat protection, although I am slightly worried by the means that many Labour Members have discussed. There is an inclination to reach for the stick rather than the carrot, and I hope that the Minister will not go too far down that route.

I shall deal with the various details in a moment, but the question at the heart of the debate is not whether there should legislation, but why there has been none so far. Like the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), I listened to the "Today" programme this morning with great interest. However, when the hon. Gentleman said that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, with its 3 million members, had written off the Prime Minister as uninterested in the environment, he added a plea that the Minister for the Environment should retain his job. If I were that Minister, I am not sure that I would consider that the most helpful intervention in the debate this morning.

The "Today" programme item was instructive for several reasons. I was delighted to hear the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) repeat what she said on the programme—that the reason for introducing wildlife legislation was that the Labour party was worried about losing rural seats. That is a terrible reason for wanting to protect the environment, and anyway it will not wash, because of other factors that I shall describe later. However, I am happy to assure the hon. Lady that, even if she is right about the reason for introducing legislation to protect wildlife and endangered habitats, Conservative Members would still support it, because we consider the underlying issue so important.

The contribution to the programme this morning by the Minister for the Environment was equally instructive, although I am not sure that I am as optimistic about what the right hon. Gentleman said as the hon. Member for Pendle. To me, taking to the air waves to fight for a place in the legislative programme is a sign of desperation, not of confidence. I hope that I am wrong, that the matter is all stitched up and that the Minister was simply making a lap of honour in public. However, I suspect that I am not wrong.

The Minister for the Environment also said that the Prime Minister, and the whole Government, were very much in favour of the legislation. Perhaps that is so, but we are coming up to what may be the final full legislative session before an election in which the Government can guarantee taking a Bill through the House, and we are still unsure about whether such a Bill will be introduced, despite the manifesto commitment to do so. St. Augustine famously said:

"Oh Lord, make me chaste, but not yet."

The updated, modernised, new Labour version would be:

"Oh Lord, make me green—but only with the agreement of colleagues across Whitehall."

That will not do. If the Minister cannot give a positive commitment to early legislation, fears will arise that delay is turning into inaction, and that another broken promise is on the way.

What specific measures should any new legislation contain? The first point to be made is that it would be much more sensible if the Bill were confined to updating the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. We would support a Bill with that general aim. Various hon. Members have spoken this morning about how a Bill should be extended to include much more controversial matters such as access and the right to roam, and some have even proposed that it be used to bring back anti-hunting measures. Anyone observing the debate will have noticed that the latter possibility, more than any other, set the juices flowing among Labour Members. It was instructive to see so strong a desire to oppress minority interests.

We all agree that there is an urgent need to promote wildlife and habitat protection, and Conservative Members would support and seek to improve any legislation to that end. However, including in a Bill other, much more controversial measures would impede its passage through the House, and might even prevent it altogether. That would be a tragedy for our wildlife and countryside. I hope that the Minister will resist the siren calls from Labour Back-Bench Members.

Any legislation would cover those areas already designated as sites of special scientific interest, but it could go further. The RSPB has proposed some helpful principles for the contents of a wildlife Bill, and I hope that the Minister will consider them seriously. The RSPB proposes that such a Bill should include a statutory purpose for individual SSSIs and the whole SSSI network. It should also contain provisions to give a legal underpinning to the bio-diversity action plan, to improve the powers of the statutory nature conservation agencies, and to impose a duty on all public bodies to protect and manage SSSIs.

However, we need a comprehensive strategy for all green land, whether it be part of an SSSI or not. Friends of the Earth rightly wants greater protection for species that are outside SSSIs, and a related problem involves land adjoining an existing site. If that land is developed unsympathetically, the knock-on effects can be very damaging to the neighbouring SSSI. We hope that any legislation to be introduced will be wider and more comprehensive. It should include incentives for better management and adopt a partnership approach.

I said that I was worried that Labour Members shared a tendency to reach for the stick rather than the carrot. In the long term, without the partnership approach advocated by responsible bodies such as the Country Landowners Association and the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, the effects on the countryside will be less beneficial. We need to engender support for the measures in a new Bill among people who live and work in the countryside. A permanent state of war between visiting regulators and people who live in an area every day would not be helpful.

I am sure that the hon. Member for South Swindon would agree that merely establishing a strict police force is not enough and will not work. Strict policing is necessary, but there must be a mixture of regulation and incentives.

In addition, there must be radical reform of the common agricultural policy. I was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) say that one of the problems was that farming was too deregulated. Has he ever met a farmer? He said that industrial and agricultural deregulation was bad for the countryside. The problem with the CAP is not that it is deregulatory, but that it pours billions of pounds into encouraging farmers to produce intensively in ways that may damage the environment. It pours only a few million pounds into encouraging them to farm less intensively.

Mr. Chaytor: That is not what I said. In fact, I agree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis: the problem with the CAP is that the resources have been wrongly directed, not the degree of regulation associated with it.

Mr. Green: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has made that clarification.

There is much to be discussed in the detail, but all hon. Members clearly agree that the need for action is urgent. We have heard this morning about the various species that have been made extinct already, or are in danger. The doomsday list of the World Wide Fund for Nature is alarming, as the hon. Member for South Swindon noted. She mentioned some of the species in danger, but the WWF has warned that the high brown fritillary butterfly and the pipistrelle bat may be extinct by 2007, and that even the skylark may have vanished by 2009. Clearly, those would be large-scale ecological disasters.

Therefore, as long as he sticks to what is sensible and gets on with it, the Minister has a chance to lead a wide consensus among all the parties, including even landowners and the many environmental non-governmental organisations. If he does that, Conservative Members will seek to give him a fair wind when the legislation is introduced.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Alan Meale): I thank the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) for his kind remarks and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on using her parliamentary time to obtain a debate on such an important issue, especially at this historic time. She is a worthy champion on the issue, as she is on a number of others.

That is not surprising as my hon. Friend's constituency is fortunate to include several nationally important nature conservation sites, including three geological sites of special scientific interest at Great quarry, Okus quarry and Old Town railway cutting, and a further four biological SSSIs at Coate water, Burderop wood, Clouts wood and the Coombes, Hinton Parva. Included within those sites are open water, woodland bird communities and chalk grassland. They all contribute to the overall value of the national SSSI series and to protecting our natural heritage for our children and grandchildren.

The Government share the view of many of the hon. Members who have spoken that the UK's nature conservation heritage should be given effective protection. Indeed, I welcome the opportunity that is provided by the debate to reaffirm the commitments in the Labour party's manifesto to affording better protection to wildlife, and the priority that the Government are giving to implementing those manifesto commitments.

At this point, I should like to answer queries that several hon. Members have raised that may not be answered in my brief. That is important because it is always an easy option just to go on and not to give replies to specific queries in a debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon raised incentives for management. I confirm that the Government propose to move from a compensatory scheme of payments to landowners to positive agreements. Even now, in advance of any changes in legislation, a substantial number of payments for support action are under way, rather than cash compensation payments.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) never misses an opportunity to raise questions on the area that he represents. I repeat my assurances to him that, within the present consultation, there is no thought within Government for any changes that would affect the status of the verderers. I say it every time. To his credit, he always raises a range of issues on the New forest. On that particular one, I reconfirm our position.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) mentioned widely dispersed bird species, which pose a particular difficulty for boundary definition. We are committed to effective and full implementation of obligations under the birds and habitats directives. My Department is discussing with English Nature the best way in which to protect such wide-ranging species. I will write to him to give further information on the matter, and try to get an answer to the point that he raised on restoration.

The hon. Member also asked me to acknowledge the tide of support for early-day motion 11. There is no doubt that that can and, indeed, should be done from the Government side of the Chamber. We are aware of the support and greatly impressed by it. It is very large—one of the largest gatherings of support on an issue since the last election. The Government are reassured by the level of interest and the swell of opinion on the need for legislation. We are aware of that and keep it in mind in all our considerations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster raised the question of peat working on SSSIs. [Interruption.] Sorry—my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint). We support moves to encourage alternatives to the use of peat. Where sites have Natura 2000 status, there will be obligations to review extant planning permissions. We are considering the options for other sites. All the issues that she raised in respect of that will be considered.

The Government's approach to wildlife conservation must blend a strong statutory framework for the protection of species and their habitats with positive measures through biodiversity action plans and environmental education. In that respect, we have encouraged a participative approach to conservation through partnerships between the public and private sectors and involvement of voluntary conservation organisations and the public. We believe that each element is important in ensuring that we protect and enhance the value of our countryside.

I take first the protection of habitats. We continue to make good progress in implementing Natura 2000, the network of special sites that are recognised at European level. The United Kingdom has now classified 200 sites as special protection areas for their ornithological interest under the birds directive, and submitted 340 sites as candidate special areas of conservation to the European Commission under the habitats directive, giving recognition and enhanced protection to the cream of our nature conservation heritage.

The UK Government are committed to full implementation of the requirements of the habitats directive. Our SAC list has been selected through a rigorous and iterative scientific process, which has applied the directive's criteria consistently throughout the UK. What is more, there has been full consultation on all the proposals, which, in a number of cases, incorporated changes in the light of comments from the voluntary conservation movement and other consultees. I acknowledge criticisms of our list, but those have been based on unscientific comparisons and misunderstandings of the directive's requirements.

Natura 2000 sites—together with sites listed under the Ramsar convention on the conservation of wetlands of international importance—are all sites of special scientific interest, all of which are designated for their national importance and constitute some of our most precious areas for wildlife, hosting rare or endangered species and providing habitats where they can flourish and—I hope—multiply. Although many are well managed and in good condition, and landowners and managers enjoy a constructive relationship with the conservation agencies, the Government agree with hon. Members who have expressed concern about special sites that have been damaged, or whose interest is declining as a result of both human activities and natural processes.

English Nature is already aiming to increase the percentage of sites in England that are being positively managed for conservation and to reduce the proportion that are in an unfavourable condition. The comprehensive proposals that we announced in last year's Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions consultation paper on SSSIs will also help to deliver real improvements in the immediate future and will substantially strengthen English Nature's hand as steward of the most valuable examples of our natural heritage. Those proposals covered a range of options and looked at ways in which enhanced protection could be delivered quickly without new legislation, as well as the case for legislative change.

The Government believe that it is important to foster the constructive relationship that has already been established with the owners of SSSIs, many of whom are sympathetic to conservation aims and work actively alongside statutory agencies to conserve the interest of their land. On SSSIs, the consultation paper emphasised the need for a variety of partnerships with owners and occupiers, with local communities and voluntary conservation organisations and with Government Departments, some of which are major landholders and custodians of our wildlife heritage. We accept the responsibility that that places on us. We will help and encourage others who similarly accept their responsibilities for the nation's wildlife.

The paper acknowledged—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We now come to the next debate.

Police Funding

11 am

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): May I say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how grateful I am to have secured this debate. I thank the Minister of State for visiting the National Missing Persons Helpline, of which I am a trustee. Those who work for the helpline very much enjoyed the visit and hope that something constructive will come out of it.

Since my election to Beckenham, the subject of police numbers and the link with police funding has come up constantly. I am sure that many of my hon. Friends and Labour Members also get a lot of complaints from people who say that they do not see enough police on the beat. Often, constituents do not link that subject with reduced crime figures or the sophisticated arguments about how intelligence-led policing is changing the nature of policing.

In Bromley, of which Beckenham is a part, we have an active police consultative committee and sector working parties, which constantly discuss police numbers and funding. In the annual report for last year, which was published in June, the committee chairman states:

"During the last three years, I cannot recall a year when there has not been underfunding to cover the cost of maintaining the existing strength of the police with inevitable cuts in the service in one way or another. This year the increase in the annual budget for the Metropolitan Police is to be 1.7 per cent. which is below the national average increase of 2.7 per cent. It again falls short of what is needed to cover the increase in police pay and pensions and the rise in inflation. In past years there has been a steady reduction in the number of uniformed officers in the Bromley area to cope with inadequate funding."

His comments are backed up by Bromley division's own figures. Its manpower target strengths, to use the jargon, have gone from 497 police in the borough and the division—the two are co-terminus—in November 1994 to 440 this year. Civilianisation has not replaced the uniformed copper. In November 1994, there were 121 civilian staff. This year, the figure is down to 113, so the numbers of both groups have dropped.

Penge, which is in my constituency, has been identified by Bromley police in a much-admired document on crime and disorder, as a high-risk area. Last April, the inspector in charge told the Penge sector working party:

"we have 9 Community Action Team Officers for community policing between Crystal Palace and Coney Hall"— another area of my constituency—

"with several having 2/3 council wards to patrol on foot."

As hon. Members know, in particular those who represent cities, that is a large area to cover. The inspector continued:

"There are 3 high street patrols, in Penge, Beckenham and West Wickham."

Some people may think that leafy Bromley borough and Beckenham should reduce their police numbers to help in other parts of the Greater London area where crime levels are higher. However, the authentic voice of the Beckenham resident wrote to the Home Secretary and to me at the end of 1998. He pointed out that "there has been growing disquiet among members of the public concerning the near-absence of uniformed officers patrolling the streets on a routine basis. . . During the past two or three years there appears to have been a reduction in real terms".

[Mrs. Jacqui Lait]

He is absolutely right. Figures provided by the Metropolitan police show that, since 1995, that force has reduced from 27,945 to 26,563 this year. Indeed, when I was on the Metropolitan police parliamentary scheme along with two Labour Members, one of whom is here today, the story everywhere was the same and I am sure that the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will agree. The police are concerned about cuts in manpower, old equipment and buildings that need refurbishment.

The pattern is repeated nationally. It is happening not merely in Bromley or in the Met, but throughout the country. Just last week, on 30 June, a Home Office press release stated:

"Numbers of police officers have fallen by 793 to 123,922 in the year ending March 1999—a reduction of less than 1 per cent."

The first sentence of that press release shows the Home Office's sensitivity about linking police funding with police numbers. That sentence reads:

"The number of police officers has fallen despite increased police spending".

I can understand and appreciate why the Home Office is going to such lengths to decouple funding and police numbers. Linked with that issue is the reduction in crime. We all congratulate the police on reducing crime, but most of us would agree that other issues have contributed to that reduction. When employment is high, there tends to be a reduction in crime.

The Audit Commission has backed up the Home Office and I can understand where it is coming from. It says that some forces have higher clear-up rates and lower numbers of police relatively and/or smaller budgets—

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): The Audit Commission supports the view that there is no direct correlation between numbers of officers and amounts of crime. On the last occasion on which we debated the matter in the House, 18 March, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) said, unusually:

"However, I rather agree with the Home Secretary on that point. I do not think that there is a direct correlation between police numbers and crime."—[Official Report, 18 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 1277.]

Does the hon. Lady agree with her right hon. Friend?

Mrs. Lait: If the hon. Lady listens to the rest of my speech, she will understand my argument. It is difficult to disagree with the Audit Commission's figures, which show that smaller forces may have smaller budgets and higher clear-up rates. Indeed, the Audit Commission has compared like with like: it has compared one rural force with another and found differences in clear-up rates; it has also compared one inner-city area with another and found differences. Statistically, I do not disagree, but the problem is that the British public and police forces themselves do not make that link. I suspect that the better clear-up rates reflect both good management and historic spending patterns. As I pointed out, the problem is that the public and the police do not believe it.

As I said, the consultative committee in Bromley regularly links underfunding with lack of police numbers. When we toured various operations under the parliamentary scheme, we were told time after time by the police, from the constable on the beat to the inspector in charge of any police station, that cuts in funding were leading to reduced numbers.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): One can always bandy statistics about, but for the first time in many years, there has been a cut in police manpower and in auxiliaries in Dorset and, for the first time in five years, crime has increased. That shows that criminals, at least, think that it is now safer to commit crimes in Dorset because fewer police and fewer resources are coming from this Government.

Mrs. Lait: I would not go so far as to argue that, but it is an interesting point. One is conscious that hardened criminals are as astute and aware of the potential for crime and not getting caught as the general public are aware that, as they believe, there are not enough police on the streets.

The constables will describe the increased pressure that they are under because of what they believe are shortages in numbers on patrol. One of their principal concerns is that, when they are in trouble—they could easily suddenly find themselves in a fracas on a hot day like today, when people's tempers are short—there might not be sufficient back-up to help them out of it. Indeed, that already happens. If the police feel vulnerable and lose confidence, they will not do their job to the best of their ability and constituents will complain.

As I said to the hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears), I acknowledge the argument—I am sure that she shares it—that modern and effective policing is intelligence-led. It is effective and it works. We have seen how successful Operation Bumblebee has been, for example, in targeting criminals and ensuring that continual troublemakers are taken off the streets or warned that they are being watched. Intelligence-led policing contributes enormously to modern policing, but I return to the fact that the British public do not believe that it is working because they do not see police on the streets.

The Police Federation also does not see police on the streets. Fred Broughton, the chairman, was quoted in The Guardian of 18 May. The article said:

"Violent crime has increased because police forces are having to cut the number of officers on the beat.

Mr. Broughton said successes in tackling burglary and car crime had been bought at the cost of a failure to patrol the streets.

'It is clear to every force that the uniformed presence is reducing on a monthly basis. That is while the government and chief police officers are talking about an alternative. All the indications are that it will get worse.'"

Ms Blears: The hon. Lady has made the point that intelligence-led policing works, but that the public do not believe that crime is being tackled unless they see bobbies on the beat. If she accepts the argument that there are better ways in which to spend our resources to tackle crime, is she in favour of spending money on, say, a medicine that does not work simply because the public believe that it does? Is it not her task and our's to lay out the facts and convince the public of what actually works in tackling crime—contrary to their perception? It is surely down to people such as us to play a role in ensuring that the public believe such things.

Mr. Ian Bruce: They do not in Dorset.

Mrs. Lait: As my hon. Friend says, people in Dorset do not believe it—nor do people in Bromley, the Police Federation or, as I am about to quote, the Association of Chief Police Officers.

John Newing said that the 1999–2000 settlement

"leaves the Police Service well short of what it needs."

Even though the Home Office has said that the 2 per cent. efficiency savings can be reinvested, and even though the police forces can keep the income from property sales, the forces are facing the need to spend much more money on new communications systems.

Anyone who has been into a police station will have seen the variety of computers and how they are not linked to one another. Work is duplicated because the custody officer may enter information into one computer, while upstairs the detectives are putting the same information into another system. That shows the need to spend money on communications. I am not arguing about the need for that; however, the public must also be reassured. If they are not, the whole basis of policing by the consent of the community will disappear.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that the phenomenal clear-up rate of the Victorian police force was primarily not because their methods were less fastidious, but because they lived in, and were part of, the community that they policed? As we have withdrawn forces into almost fortress-like police stations and police officers into panda cars, we have lost the proximity of the community, which was the source of success.

Mrs. Lait: I can see my hon. Friend's point, although the whole purpose of the Scarman and subsequent reports was to try to develop the role of the community police officer, who builds up the intelligence that was enjoyed by the Victorian police force. We have not lost that form of policing; the problem is that we do not have sufficient police officers to be able to conduct it as effectively as one would wish. That is why I am linking the two subjects—even though the Home Office and the Audit Commission doubt the correlation between police funding and numbers. Such a link needs to be made because we must ensure policing with the consent of the community.

I pointed out the need for new communications systems and the cost of them. There is also the cost of the pensions problem facing all police forces. We must acknowledge what a large proportion of their budgets is going on pensions—about 17 per cent. in the Metropolitan police and 20 per cent. in Greater Manchester. Obviously, if we were starting again, we would not start from here. A pay-as-you-go pension fund and an historic inability to control it has left forces with a huge demand on their slender resources. John Newing said last week that if additional funds are not forthcoming, there will have to be cuts in the numbers of officers in operational roles.

As a great believer in the development of the pensions industry and the provision that we have managed to create, I would say that it is time for the Home Office and police forces to get to grips with the pay-as-you-go pension scheme and reform it. That would be a most effective way of reducing the pressure on budgets. I know that that will not be easy and that it is a very long-term solution, but it should certainly be considered closely.

Despite the demands on budgets for things such as communications systems and pensions, I return time and again to the importance of the Home Office recognising the inextricable link in the minds of the British public between funding and proper staffing. The public cannot believe that there is no such correlation. As I have—I hope—shown, nor can many who work in the police, even when crime is coming under control. The position has clearly worsened recently and the forecasts are deeply pessimistic.

The police force is in a unique position to make its views known and clear to every member of the public. That will only reinforce the public's fears. The police, particularly if they are involved in community policing, are talking day in, day out to our constituents. If they are fearful of their future, they will make the public—our constituents—fearful, too.

The Home Office must ensure that the public are reassured that the thin blue line will hold. At present, the public believe that the line is under significant pressure. I very much hope that the Minister can reassure us that there will be a greater police presence on the streets, so reassuring our constituents.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am pleased to participate in this important debate. I shall restrict most of my remarks to the issue of funding.

The hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) realised that the crux of the apparent contradiction is due mainly to the perception of crime. In the past couple of days, the Women's Institute has referred to the importance of police on the beat in rural areas. However, that is not necessarily the same as catching criminals. We must ensure that we put resources where they really count, and invest in intelligence and the most effective policing, as my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Ms Blears) made clear. I should be worried if we went away from the debate believing that the contradiction was easy to solve. The Government have got the balance right. I shall explain how that can be enhanced and how it can be made clearer to our constituents that the funding situation is right and reasonable.

I shall restrict most of my remarks to funding, which is at the core of the debate. I have been engaged in correspondence with my hon. Friend the Minister about the needs of Gloucestershire. We shall be having a meeting shortly to discuss those matters in greater detail. It was a little disingenuous of the hon. Member for Beckenham to refer to the pensions problem, because the Conservative Government signally failed to grapple with the issue. They have left us an incredibly difficult legacy. Let us be honest. No police organisation wants to renegotiate the pensions situation, because they could not get a better deal. I may be wrong on some of the details, but I believe that a police constable retiring from the force today after 30 years' service would take about £60,000 in cash, plus half his current salary. With the best will in the world, that cannot be improved by a renegotiation of the pension terms. However, we shall have to deal with that dilemma.

[Mr. David Drew]

I do not want to speak for very long, because I know that others want to contribute to the debate. Many factors, including the pension situation, affect the funding requirements. I am grateful to the Government for addressing Gloucestershire's funding problems in respect of the number of royal households in the country. The problem with the 2 per cent. efficiency savings is that they have to be found from those areas, as well as from the wider budget. That causes us some grief in Gloucestershire. Perhaps that requirement should be reconsidered.

We need to fund policing properly, but we must also ensure that we are policing in the right way. We welcome the progress on the public safety radio communications project—a phrase that does not slip off the tongue easily—but we have to find a means of funding it, which is difficult. In Gloucestershire, there will be an annual leasing cost of £750,000, which is the equivalent of 40 police constables. I hope that the Government will come up with some good news on that. It is a project that we not merely want, but have, to implement. Gloucestershire has been bedevilled by a problem of hills. The communications network has never functioned properly, because people on one side of the Cotswolds cannot communicate with those on the other side. I try to go out with the local police on a Friday night. They have to switch wavelength regularly because that is the only way in which they can communicate with each other. That is a bit ramshackle at the end of the 20th century, when we are looking for the most effective way to deal with law and order issues.

We welcome the drug strategy, initiatives on youth offending and the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, but we must find ways to fund those ideas. Our old friend information technology will have a part to play and a lot of money is being put in that direction. We all agree that such spending should not be at the expense of front-line policing. People have a perception of crime and want to see their bobby on the beat, but they also want the most effective means of catching criminals and following up the more deviant members of society. We have to find ways of doing that.

We can argue about the statistics and what they mean, but we were disappointed with the 1.4 per cent. increase in funding in Gloucestershire, which was below the national increase of 2.3 per cent. We responded by putting up our budget and raising our precept. I could argue that Gloucestershire's precept was too low, but we had the fourth-highest increase of all police authorities, and there is a limit to the number of times that we can do that. We may now be more in line with the family of authorities that we all lovingly compare everything to in these days of benchmarking and the rest of it. I hope that the Home Office and the Treasury will look favourably in future at how we can make good our funding needs.

We are looking to the future. I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for our success in achieving funding for the tri-service control room project, which brings the police into line with the ambulance and fire services to make best use of our control rooms. There are ways of taking that initiative further forward. It is an efficient way of using our funding. That may be special pleading, but I hope that the Home Office will have more to say today or in the future about making more effective use of such funds.

We do not pretend that funding is not an issue. I am one of three Gloucestershire Members here today, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Ms Kingham) beside me and the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson). We have regular meetings with police authority representatives, who tell us their problems. Funding is always at the top of their agenda, so there is no point in pretending that it is not. However, the situation did not start with the election of a Labour Government in May 1997. It is an historic problem. In the debate on 18 March—which my hon. Friend the Member for Salford mentioned—I talked about having separate police authorities, some of which, including mine, are small. That has its benefits, but it also has its downsides, because there are no economies of scale and we were bound to have difficulties with the separation of administrative costs and overheads resulting from splitting police authorities from county councils.

Within reason, we are doing what we can. We need more funds. We need help from the Home Office and the Treasury to get the special projects up and running and to make them as effective as possible. That is as true in rural Britain as in urban Britain, as the recent report of the Women's Institute says. A report by the Back-Bench group of Labour Members published a couple of weeks ago contains an interesting article by Simon Anderson of System 3 about people's perceptions of crime in rural areas and how the globalisation of crime has a special impact on more isolated communities, because they want to see the police presence, but they also want to know that the policing is as effective as possible. That is the essence of the problems with getting the funding formula right. There is a need for more help in rural areas, because the funding formula is not as effective as it could be.

Ms Tess Kingham (Gloucester): We have heard a lot about the perceptions of the public and the desire for more police on the beat. However, we should also recognise that the Government have done a great deal in looking at other ways of preventing crime and taking the stress off police forces by ensuring that there are always police on the beat to deal with the after-effects of crime and clear-up rates. We have had the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and there is a duty on local authorities to have local crime prevention partnerships. We had a big launch of that in Gloucester, which included all the stakeholders. The initiative was greatly welcomed by every section of the community involved. The police said that they felt that it would have a great impact on the public perception of crime and on preventing crime, which would take the stress off the police.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Lady must sit down when I get to my feet. That is the first thing that she must learn. The second is that she should not make a speech during an intervention.

Mr. Drew: I acknowledge the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Ms Kingham) in her constituency, both now as a Member of Parliament and before coming here. She has much to offer, and she made a valid point.

We will not hide from the funding issue. We welcome many of the initiatives and we recognise that there must be a balance between urban and rural areas. All the figures show that the majority of crimes are committed in urban areas. The incidence of reported crime is four times greater in urban areas than in rural areas, but we have seen a relative increase in rural crime. That is due partly to globalisation, because people can move about more quickly. People in rural areas feel very vulnerable.

I hope that all that is recognised in the formula. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will have some good things to say about how all that can be rectified and about the most appropriate use of the overall funding package.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) on securing this debate and on the detailed way in which she gave examples of where police funding is inadequate. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who made the case for extra funding for Gloucestershire. I want to mention that. The fact that there are three Members of Parliament from Gloucestershire in the Chamber suggests that things are not well with police funding in that county.

The general funding of public services leaves something to be desired. The Labour party spent 18 years telling the public how the Conservatives had underfunded public services, but, now that we have a Labour Government, we still have similar problems. It is not only the police who are suffering in Gloucestershire. Despite the high-profile figures about health service spending, the health service in Gloucestershire is having to make £5.5 million worth of cuts because of inadequate funding. Tewkesbury borough council has had its grant reduced, causing it to increase the council tax. It has been named and shamed by the Government for reacting to a problem that the Government brought about. The same is true of police funding.

The national pay award, over which each force has no control, was 3.5 per cent. for 1999–2000. Price inflation was 2.2 per cent. Yet Gloucestershire constabulary has been given an increase of only 1.4 per cent. Again, as with the health service, the Government have made a high-profile pay award, with which very few people would disagree, but they have not funded it. That causes a big problem.

Why has Gloucestershire been given such a derisory award? Is it because the Government are diverting money from the shire counties to areas in which their more natural supporters might live? Every shire county apart from two has suffered real-term cuts. The Minister might find that amusing, but it is not amusing to those who live in shire counties. As the hon. Member for Stroud said, Gloucestershire has suffered the fourth largest real-terms cut to its operational budget. I am aware of the problems in the Labour areas to which the Government seem keen to divert money, because I was not born in Tewkesbury, but I am also aware of the problems in rural areas.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend is being over-generous to the Government. In Dorset, we also saw a real-terms cut in the operational budget. Was there not also in Gloucestershire, as there was in Dorset, a massive stealth tax because the Government ensured that local tax payers were paying for all the additional money that came forward? Not a penny extra came from the Home Office or the Government.

Mr. Robertson: I would be called to order if I went too far down that route, but my hon. Friend is absolutely right.

There are difficulties with crime in rural areas. For example, all Gloucestershire Members have received a note from the chief constable about drugs and drug-related crime. That is becoming as much of a problem in rural areas as in urban areas. The sparsity of policing in rural areas encourages that crime.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I do not wish to spoil the hon. Gentleman's argument, but if he believes that money is going to traditional Labour areas, which mine used to be, he is wrong. We are not seeing that and dancing in the streets in my area. The police are reporting just as many problems in areas such as South Yorkshire as they are in rural counties.

Mr. Robertson: Perhaps I have underestimated the funding problem.

The 2 per cent. efficiency saving is being taken into account when grants to constabularies are being calculated. As the hon. Member for Stroud said, the 2 per cent. target includes police pensions and security elements, over which chief constables have no control. A 2 per cent. saving nationally may be achievable, but it is difficult for each force to achieve it locally. For example, the police force in Gloucestershire has to provide security for the royal family. We are delighted that they live there and the force receives a grant to cover the cost, but, given that minimum standards of security must be provided, that should not be taken into account when calculating the 2 per cent. efficiency saving.

Gloucestershire has already made many efficiency savings. It has one of the lowest figures in the country for officers retiring through ill health, sickness levels are below average and it has the smallest number of superintendents. Given all that, why has Gloucestershire received a real-terms cut? Where is the money to come from? As we have already heard, Gloucestershire police have had to increase the precept by 19 per cent. That makes it look as if it is a local problem, when it is not. Also, the chief constable has told all the Gloucestershire Members of Parliament that cuts are having to be made in operational areas. Is that what the Government intended? I do not remember their claiming at the election that there would be cuts in the operational services provided by the police. The Minister must look at what is happening on the ground and not just at statistics which may appear to be okay on the surface, but do not reveal all that happens in the policing of counties.

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): I am delighted to have a further opportunity to speak on policing, police funding, police numbers and the Government's drive to tackle crime. It is the top issue for the people in my inner-city constituency. I believe firmly that unless we tackle the problem of crime and disorder, all the other social exclusion initiatives on which we are engaged will not be as successful as we would like. If people do not feel safe and secure in their communities, all our other measures to provide jobs and opportunities will not yield the results that we want.

We need some facts in this debate. Over the next three years, the Government will be spending an extra £1.25 billion, which has been gained from the comprehensive spending review. In addition, there is an extra £400 million for crime reduction projects, extra funds for CCTV partnerships between the police, local government and business to try to tackle crime, a major anti-burglary initiative and anti-car crime projects. We have set rigorous targets because we want to see the outcomes.

It is all very well to talk about perceptions, feelings and ideas, but what really matters to the people whom I represent is whether we are preventing, reducing and detecting crime and locking up those who commit crime. We aim to cut vehicle crime by 30 per cent. by the year 2002. That is a tough target, but the Government do not shy away from tough targets because they know how important those issues are for local people. There is no point spending money without tying it to targets. I know that the Conservatives have recently become a tax-and-spend party, but I do not see any point in spending money without the right outcome.

We must not forget the Tory record. I know that it is uncomfortable to be reminded of it, but, under the Tory Government, recorded crime went up from 2.5 million cases in 1979 to 4.5 million cases in 1997. Constituents such as mine bore the brunt of those crimes. A total of 40 per cent. of crime in this country happens in 10 per cent. of areas, and 4 per cent. of people are the victims of 42 per cent. of crime. Those are staggering and scandalous statistics and we must tackle them.

Under the previous Administration, the figures were up for violent crime, burglaries and assault. Crime and disorder was out of control, with young men running wild on estates, making people's lives a misery. The Government's plan to tackle all that is one of the top issues for the whole community.

We are beginning to tackle those problems. The hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) accepts that intelligence-based policing is the way to tackle crime, detect crime and ensure that convictions are secured, but I ask Conservative Members to use their brains and recognise that, in addition to intelligence, we have to use a little creativity and imagination. The Conservatives appear to be on a tramline of thinking that the only one way to tackle crime is to increase the number of bodies, but I want to increase the number of brains in our crime and disorder system as well.

Let me give some examples of new projects that are being carried out in my city to try to get maximum added value from our investment. Crime reduction partnerships bring together local government, the police, the business sector, the chamber of commerce, voluntary organisations and the local community in an effort to identify the problems of crime and how best to work together to tackle them. Are the police always right for a certain job, or could it be done better by, say, the housing authority? Is it better to bring in the youth service to intervene early in youth crime, rather than always look to the police to provide solutions? Without that partnership, we shall be unable to sustain the regeneration that we all want.

We have also drawn in resources from other areas, through projects such as Operation Victory, which has taken place in Greater Manchester in the past few months. It is the biggest police operation that Greater Manchester has ever known: in Salford, Trafford and Manchester on one day, more than 65 people involved in burglary, handling, theft and the laundering of drug money were arrested. It was a massive operation and, not only did it succeed in taking those people off the streets and locking them up—which was a great relief to my constituents—but it sent a message to the community that they could have confidence that the police were able to tackle those problems and that we are not sitting back and allowing ourselves to be overwhelmed by a wave of crime.

We are going out there, tackling crime and using our intelligence. The information used in Operation Victory was gathered over a period of 12 months—the operation was not here today, gone tomorrow. In often difficult and dangerous circumstances, officers gathered evidence and information to use in prosecutions.

Mrs. Lait: Will the hon. Lady tell me what is the difference between Operation Victory and Operation Bumblebee, which was instituted in the mid-1990s and which achieved exactly the same ends? Is not Manchester's action a little late?

Ms Blears: Not at all. Operation Victory was incredibly successful and, although similar programmes have happened before, it was the largest programme yet, being carried out on such a scale that the impact on the community was enormous. It was an excellent project.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The hon. Lady is extremely enthusiastic and we love to hear such enthusiasm. However, my son is a police officer in the north of England and I have to tell her that her speech seems to reflect more closely the views of the Treasury than those of police officers on the beat, who know about their lack of resources and overtime and their resulting inability to get out there and do all that the hon. Lady wants them to do. Will the hon. Lady go back and listen to police officers in her constituency rather than to the Treasury?

Ms Blears: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I listen to police officers in my constituency. Three weeks ago, as the local Member of Parliament, I personally called a crime and disorder forum in my constituency, because I believe that we have a role to play in crime and disorder partnerships. I called together the police, the voluntary sector, business, social services and the youth service to meet me and talk about the new Crime and Disorder Act 1998. I asked them to tell me whether the Act is working and what the difficulties with it are. I asked how best we could institute the anti-social behaviour orders and what sort of protocols were needed to get the evidence to enforce the orders.

I am in daily contact with local police officers. They have inner-city beats, which is hard and challenging work—yes, it is tough out there. However, we have just introduced sector policing, whereby officers are responsible for their own neighbourhood and so are in close, daily touch with their communities. They monitor crime, know where the criminals are, and are able to direct resources into tackling crime in their own neighbourhood. I completely support local police officers, who have a demanding, difficult and challenging job.

We are trying to ensure not only that police officers have the resources that they need, but that they use them in such a way that they get results. If we do not, we are just sending them out on the streets, they do not get results and they see the same criminals day after day, making the same people's lives a misery. The Labour Government's policies are about using intelligence and creativity to give police officers the tools to do the job.

The other example of local action in my city is a massive truancy project. I feel passionately that instead of spending our money on mopping up the results of failure, we should prevent that failure from occurring in the first place. In 1997, 40 per cent. of burglaries, 25 per cent. of robberies, 20 per cent. of thefts and 20 per cent. of criminal damage were committed by children aged 10 to 16. Those children should be in school. We have set a tough and challenging target—that, by 2001, exclusions from school will have been cut by one third—and backed it up with £500 million of extra resources.

We have to consider more than police funding. Look at all the extra resources that are being put into education through education action zones and truancy projects; that will help to prevent crime. Look at the money for the new deal, which gives young people the opportunity to work rather than become involved in crime. The Opposition have a one-track mind and do not see all the different parts of the jigsaw that is being assembled by the Labour Government. Four hundred thousand more people are now in work than were in work under the Tories. The hon. Member for Beckenham recognises the link between unemployment and crime: having more people in work means less crime on the streets.

The Government have set tough targets for efficiency savings, but those savings are being made. The briefing from the Association of Police Authorities—the very people who constantly ask for more funding—states:

"this year alone, cashable efficiency savings have been identified totalling £107 million . . . an additional £75 million of expenditure has been redirected into frontline policing activities."

That is what my constituents want to hear—resources redirected into reducing crime, detecting crime and convicting criminals. If the Government are able to shift the emphasis from simply having bodies on the street to intelligent policing that actually reduces crime, the people whom I represent who are repeat victims of robberies, burglaries, assaults and theft will be mightily relieved.

I acknowledge the points made by the hon. Member for Beckenham about pensions. We have to tackle that issue. Nationally, about 13 per cent. of revenue budgets are eaten up by pensions; in Greater Manchester, that figure is 20 per cent. That cannot be allowed to go on. The Government must tackle the issue of pensions.

I believe that the best way to get added value from the resources that we put in is to work in partnership. It is easy to quote statistics and figures, but, in communities such as mine, we are only now beginning to count the true cost of the policies of the previous Government. Conservative Members do not like to hear it, but crime, unemployment, poverty and the breakdown of family life are the true price of Tory government. That is the Tory record, and my city is counting the cost. If the Labour Government are able to tackle crime and make Salford a safer place for people to live, work and bring up their family, we shall have done a great deal. I believe that the Government are up to the task.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I congratulate the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) on securing a debate on police funding, which is one of the Liberal Democrats' main home affairs hobby horses. We need to move the debate on from the well-worked theme of whether there is a direct correlation between funding and police forces' effectiveness. I do not believe that there is such a direct correlation, but to suggest that there is no correlation at all between police funding and police numbers is ludicrous.

It is strange and interesting to hear Labour Members argue that tight public spending settlements lead to efficiency savings and improved services—a view that differs from that which was expressed for many years by their colleagues in local government. In fact, their local government colleagues are still expressing that view, even thought they now have to do it quietly, for fear of embarrassing the Government. We might hear next that the Government decline to abandon local government capping, but merely intend to replace it with a slightly more complex system of capping. Instead of allowing local government to spend what it needs to, perhaps it will be suggested that more efficient social services or education services would be the result of tight and challenging settlements.

I should like to touch on the issue of police numbers, especially the number of special constables, which is of particular concern to the Liberal Democrats. I shall also refer to funding pressures, some of which have already been mentioned and about which the police are extremely concerned. I shall also briefly explore the Government's longer-term strategy, especially in respect of private security. It would be helpful if the Minister could clarify comments heard in recent months about the role of private security which appear to be a response to a Government squeeze on funding. It is important that we explore those issues before policies emerge that cause us even greater concern.

The number of full-time police officers has fallen by 1,043 since the general election. We have heard various arguments about whether or not that is a problem. When the Labour party was in opposition, it was ingenious in not giving a specific commitment on numbers, although it gave a clear general impression that it was concerned about the falls in numbers under the previous Government, and launched attack after attack on them. It can now get out of that one by saying that it gave no specific commitment to increase the police numbers so the new falls are acceptable.

The number of special constables has fallen by 3,250 in two years. That is a 16 per cent. fall from 19,500 in March 1997 to 16,500 in March 1999. I know that the Minister has a particular concern about special constables because he said in January:

"Today's special is a police officer trained to professional standards commanding full confidence of regular colleagues and the public. . . . We believe this is an excellent use of a valuable resource available to chief officers and support this continued development of the Special Constabulary for the foreseeable future."

It gives us concern, and I hope that it concerns him, that we have seen a fall in numbers at a time when the Government seem to advocate increased use of that resource.

The Liberal Democrats would like to see an increase in police numbers. We suggest an increase of 6,000 as a useful way forward. The Government have helpfully costed our proposals in answer to a parliamentary question from one of their Back Benchers. In a written answer on 6 July, they said:

"The estimated annual cost of 6,000 additional constables would be around £150 million."—[Official Report, 6 July 1999; Vol. 334, c. 487.]

That would work out at about 5p a week for every citizen, or less than a penny a day. I feel that people would be willing to pay that to have an extra 10 constables in every constituency. People can relate to less than 1p a day and they would be happy to stump up.

We should not talk simply about a conflict between intelligence-led policing and police constables on the ground. There is a possibility of both if people are willing and able to pay. It is valid and legitimate to put it to the public that we need both to combat crime effectively by intelligence-led policing and to combat the fear of crime by providing uniformed officers as a point of contact. The two are not mutually exclusive. I should like us to consider funding both.

I am hesitant to talk about falls in numbers in any area, having heard from the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) how intelligent our criminals are these days. I fear that they may browse through the pages of Hansard, discover where police numbers have fallen, and target their efforts there. I hope that the hon. Gentleman sees no influx of politically astute criminals into Dorset, although that may be one way to describe his campaign team.

I hope that the Minister will respond to the report published by the police service expenditure forecasting group in June. If he does not respond to Opposition concerns, he must respond to the group's comments that "the revenue support grant settlement for 1999/2000 was insufficient even to meet inflationary pressures and other spending commitments. In itself, it provided no scope for investment to improve service quality and deliver."

That is the view of the professionals. They have made an assessment, and given us their honest opinion that the pressures are significant and are causing police forces problems in delivery of services.

The group has suggested that police forces have a particular problem with long-term projects such as the public safety radio communications project. We need to examine funding for such projects. The PSRCP will cost £23 million next year, but I understand that, as it rolls out in the following three years, it will cost even more. My force in South Yorkshire says that a major alarm bell is ringing on that issue. It simply does not have the money. There are two possible ways forward, both of which would be a problem. The first is to go forward with the full expenditure and cut front-line services. The second is not to take up all the options within the project, in which case the force will end up paying for a more expensive system without deriving all the benefits because it cannot afford the total package. The Government must look into that.

Pension changes are likely to cost more than £64 million next year, but concerns have been expressed that the changes needed in the pension system may end up costing more rather than less in the short term. We need to be assured that the Government are willing to make the changes in a way that does not impact on front-line services, given that the changes need to be made.

It has been estimated that the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 will cost about £15 million in the next year. We have welcomed the Act. The hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears) referred to initiatives such as crime and disorder partnerships. We are fully behind such initiatives, but there was an expectation that the Act would be revenue neutral in its impact on the police. Yet I know from my police force that it is putting a significant amount of senior officer time into it. That is quite proper, but it gives the police a short-term funding pressure estimated at £15 million over the next year. That is £15 million well spent, but I hope that we shall not simply ignore the police authorities when they say that the legislation is costing them more than expected.

We must also take into account specific events such as the millennium. Police forces have flagged up a serious problem in funding police support over that period.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): Certainly, the West Mercia constabulary has expressed to me its concerns about funding police support at the millennium. However, the millennium is a foreseeable event—we have known about it for 1,000 years. Does my hon. Friend agree that the policing of unforeseeable events such as the demonstration at Consort Kennels in my constituency by animal rights activists places enormous additional burdens on the police? That demonstration diverted police officers away from their normal activities. The police do not believe that they receive adequate Home Office support for unforeseen events that crop up from time to time.

Mr. Allan: That is a general problem. In my constituency, we had the tragic circumstances of the Hillsborough disaster. Continuing legal battles are costing the police service money. It is receiving conflicting advice. It is a huge political minefield, but, whoever is right or wrong, the police have faced unexpected expenditure. The demonstrations at Shoreham also created a policing requirement. We do not want local police forces to feel that they cannot provide the required level of policing. Some form of ability to respond would be helpful.

We accept that efficiency savings can be made in the police force, but we do not accept the Government's denial that there is any problem. The hon. Member for Salford referred to an increase of £1.24 billion over three years. The Government's comprehensive spending review presentation has been wonderful. They announce, announce again and then announce again. They multiply any figure by three to give a better appearance to their public spending figures. However, when we unravel the Government's ingenious accounting methods, we find that the increase over three years is £675 million, not £1.24 billion.

We should consider funding over the whole Parliament. We were critical of the Government for accepting Tory spending limits. The House of Commons Library has shown that, over the Parliament, there will be no real-terms increase in central funding for the police. In 1998–99, there was a real-terms fall in central funding for the police. That was only the second time that that had happened in 20 years.

Police force reserves are another problem. Police forces often dip into their reserves for specific events, such as the millennium. That increases the overall cost to the force. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance Accountancy has shown that 11 forces are now running reserves below the recommended level.

The hon. Member for Salford said that police officers faced challenging times. That was also the word used in the Home Office press release on its spending settlement. It said:

"This is a fair but challenging settlement for the police".

Everyone who has watched "Yes, Minister" knows that "challenging" is a Whitehall euphemism for "much lower than needed". One could say that local government had challenging settlements from the Tory Government in the past 18 years, and we know what impact that had on it.

We do not accept that there is a one-to-one relationship between funding and improvements in the police service, but we do not accept that there is no relationship whatever. That point is important and needs to be examined.

I wish to refer to the future direction of the police force. It is not a total coincidence that, at a time of tight police funding and falling numbers, the Government have opened the debate about the future of police patrolling. We are concerned about the Government's intentions. The Home Secretary has openly welcomed and encouraged the debate about the role of private security in patrolling the streets, and he has made public comments to that effect. We do not wish to see the private security industry ignored, as it has a significant role in private spaces, such as shopping centres, where one can define clearly who is responsible for that space and who should properly pay for the security.

There is a difference between that situation and sending people out on patrol, and we are concerned by talk about private security officers patrolling estates. There are two distinct services. Police forces are made up of accountable, professional, trained, disciplined and sworn police officers, who provide a distinct public service. Private security officers—we regret that the Government have not moved further on regulation for them—do not conform to the same disciplines. I hope that the Minister will indicate that there will be further regulation for private security officers.

The Government must ask themselves the crucial question—if private security provides a cheaper service, why is it cheaper? We believe that it is cheaper precisely because the industry does not have to maintain the same standards as the police. There is a lower quality, in that the industry is not an accountable public service with sworn loyalty to the Crown. I hope that the Government will make it clear that it is not their intention to civilianise police patrols. While there are proper arguments for civilianisation of non-front-line policing functions, we believe that they do not apply to police patrolling.

I hope that the Minister will respond to some of the specific concerns about funding issues, identified by the police agencies, and to some wider policy issues. That would shed far more light than simply repeating the mantra of the over-inflated and oft-repeated comprehensive spending review figures.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): First, I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) and to other hon. Members for being unavoidably detained and missing the start of the debate.

I will make a brief speech, concentrating on two themes. First, the West Midlands police force—one of the largest in the country—is not suffering under the misapprehension that it has had a resource cut; in fact, the budget for 1999–2000 shows a total revenue expenditure increase of about 2.3 per cent. It is significant that, in its budget planning, the West Midlands force has been able to put an extra 50 constables out on direct patrol on the streets. It has been able to do that because, as in Manchester—as my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Ms Blears) explained—the force is engaged in a radical exercise in sector policing, which is designed to cut out wasteful bureaucracy in the police force.

The West Midlands police force has the highest percentage of constables to other ranks in the country, and the lowest management costs in the country. That theme is extremely important in terms of police funding.

As resources are made available, there are particular aspects of policing and projects to which we would like to see more money directed. Personally, I think that there is more scope for the use of technology in DNA processing, which would be an investment worth making. It is important that we get value for money. The key to that is to reduce management costs and to get a greater ratio of constables to other ranks.

The hon. Member for Beckenham said that numbers matter, and I understand her point. However, it strikes me as significant that the Audit Commission reports have pointed out consistently that, even where the numbers are high, there are forces which, at any one time, can call on only 5 per cent. of their total force to patrol the streets. One must ask what kind of organisational structure pertains where, out of a force of huge numbers, only 5 per cent. are doing active policing. The lessons from Manchester and the West Midlands must be taken on board by other forces if we are to get greater value for money and efficiency.

My second point was touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). In this day and age, it is difficult to understand how it can be reasonable—with all the amazing technological advances, and the inevitable costs that they impose—to have 43 police forces spread throughout the country, ranging in number from 950 officers to 29,000. We have 43 authorities that are duplicating the costs of chief constables, personnel departments, research and development departments, payroll departments and purchasing departments. That seems to me to be an extraordinary waste of money.

I would not urge my hon. Friend the Minister to take direct action to compel forces to reduce overall numbers, or to rationalise the size of police forces. However, where improvements can be made by sharing at least some of those activities, there is scope for amazing cost savings, and that would be a significant step forward. I would particularly like to see a regionalised police force—the time has come when we can afford to reduce the number of forces from 43.

I am not concerned now with the question of a democratic deficit because of two significant developments. The first is sector policing. Local superintendents are now accountable to the local population, so there is direct democratic accountability. That is the great strength of sector policing. The second development is that the introduction of police authorities in itself removed directly elected accountability, in the way that it was understood traditionally. Having made that step, we do not need to rehash the old argument.

We must look for the maximum efficiency for the money we put in. That cannot possibly be achieved by 43 authorities that are duplicating every activity endlessly, and are wasting money on bureaucracy that could be spent on patrolling the streets and protecting people from crime.

12.7 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I could not disagree more with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) about police forces. Dorset is a relatively small force, but it is efficient and commands public support. I do not wish to see vast county or regional forces, or a national force. The British system of doing things, with a degree of local accountability, is the best. The county forces, including some of the smaller ones, have a good record. Problems have tended to occur in some of the larger forces, particularly the West Midlands force and the Met. The smaller forces have delivered a good service over the years.

I wish to refer to the overall concern about funding and numbers. I know that "more funding and more numbers" is not the only answer, but it helps in terms of the management of the police. The hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears) made an intelligent speech—apart from her political points at the end—and made some good points. However, the reality is that, in Dorset, we are struggling with pensions—as are all forces. Over the last 10 years, police pensions as a proportion of budgets have risen from 7 to 13 per cent—an added strain without additional budgets. That is a problem with which all Governments have had to deal.

Apart from pensions, there is the problem of the millennium, which—as the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) pointed out—is a predictable event. Major public services, whether police or hospitals, will have to make extraordinary arrangements to deal with that.

The Association of Chief Police Officers has said that the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 will cost £20 million. Much of that Act has been welcomed by my local force, and it may have a positive role to play in policing. However, there are resource implications that have not been addressed fully within budgets.

The fear of crime must be addressed. People are reassured when they see bobbies on the beat. I have a well-developed network of neighbourhood watch groups in Poole, whose members are extremely good at getting on to the police and asking, "Where are the bobbies on the beat? What is going on?" We should pay attention to the public relations aspect, which is particularly important to older constituents.

12.10 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) on securing the debate and introducing it with such skill. Although there are undoubted differences between hon. Members across the Floor of the House, all of us, regardless of party, are united in acknowledging how much we and our constituents owe to the professionalism, dedication and constant vigilance of our police service.

My hon. Friend sensibly drew attention to the fact that there is no straightforward correlation between police numbers and police effectiveness in tackling crime. However, like my hon. Friend, other hon. Members pointed out that police numbers do matter.

For example, as the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) noted, it is a matter of concern, especially to people in rural areas, that they may at times have to rely on a response time target from a relatively remote urban centre, rather than having officers on duty, particularly over the weekend or through bank holidays, in the police office or police station in their own village or market town.

The hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears) demonstrated all the passionate, born-again zeal for tight budgets that one would expect from the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. With a cut of 113 police officers in Greater Manchester since the general election, I am not surprised that she steered clear of that subject.

More generally, there is a difference between a considered decision by a chief officer to deploy more of his officers to intelligence gathering, problem-solving policing, surveillance and targeting known villains and repeat victims—for which there would be support across the House—and chief constables and police authorities feeling compelled to reduce the numbers on their establishment below the level that they would regard as satisfactory, simply because of budget constraints resulting from spending decisions imposed by central Government.

The Home Office's figures show that there has been a reduction of more than 1,100 police officers since the general election. The biggest losers include London, where the figure is down by about 680; Sussex, where the figure is down by almost 240; and West Yorkshire, which has lost more than 200 officers. Of the 43 forces in England and Wales, 29 have cut their police numbers since 1998.

The Government's priorities for spending were made clear in their comprehensive spending review. The figures that I have seen suggest a cash increase of 2.7 per cent. in the current year, plus the hoped-for efficiency savings. Over the lifetime of this Parliament, the Government's published spending plans involve real increases of no more than 0.7 per cent.

As four fifths of police expenditure goes on pay, a tight budgetary settlement inevitably means that there will be an impact on manpower. That has been recognised by the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Association of Police Authorities, the Police Federation and the Police Superintendents Association, which have all vigorously drawn attention to the fact that such a tight settlement will make it extremely difficult for them to deal with the priorities that they have been set by the Home Secretary, and to provide the quality of service that they want to give to their local communities.

ACPO has said that an increase of 6.1 per cent. in police spending is needed in order to stand still in the provision of service. If the Government disagree with ACPO's assessment of necessary expenditure, I hope that the Minister, in his response or in writing subsequently, will spell out in detail the methodology that the Government have used to reach a different conclusion from that of ACPO.

As time is short and to enable the Minister of State to respond, I shall concentrate on three topics related to resources, on which I hope the Minister will comment. The first topic is patrols. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) expressed concern about problems affecting the special constabulary. The Minister knows that there has been considerable disquiet among police officers at the idea that, partly as a consequence of constraints on resources, the Government may be considering greater reliance in the future on ancillary citizens patrols or private security patrols of some sort.

Concern about that is not confined to those on the Conservative Benches. A Labour peer, a distinguished former officer, Lord Mackenzie of Framwellgate, warned in another place of "substitute, second tier public or private patrols, which certain chief constables are flirting with."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 June 1999; Vol. 602, c. 723.]

We on the Conservative Benches have no problem with voluntary initiatives in support of the police. Neighbourhood watch was a great success story of the 1980s, and I am delighted if those on the present Treasury Bench have been converted by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) to the advantages of "walking with a purpose". It is always pleasant to see Labour Ministers swallowing the words that they expressed in opposition.

What powers would those patrols have? Would those on patrol hold the office of constable? What would their relationship be to the police? Would there be disciplinary procedures if the powers of those patrollers were abused?

The second topic is pensions. The inspectorate of constabulary concluded that police pensions will cost about 14 per cent. of police expenditure by the financial year 2001-02. It is just over a year since the Home Office published its consultation document on police pensions. Lord Burlison, another distinguished Labour peer, said in another place:

"We intend to publish soon specific proposals on the future of police pensions."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 June 1999; Vol. 602, c. 737.]

I hope that the Minister will tell us how soon that document will be published and over what time scale the proposals will be implemented.

My final point concerns the public safety radio communications project—PSRCP—to which other hon. Members alluded. I am sure that the Minister of State is aware of a letter of 17 June from the chairman of the Association of Police Authorities, Dr. Henig, to the Home Secretary, in which she wrote.

"It is already clear . . . from the indicative prices that many authorities will face very serious problems if the full cost of this service is to be met from existing funding allocations."

She continued:

"The police service cannot afford to finance PSRCP within the existing level of police grant, without a direct effect on the availability of officers for frontline policing."

My own authority in Thames Valley told me that its estimates suggest that the reality of absorbing PSRCP costs within current baselines set by the Government would result in the need to reduce police officer strength by 167.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give answers to some of those questions. He and his colleagues now have the responsibility for making budgetary decisions and setting priorities for a service that all of us in the House support. I hope that he will deal with the concerns that have been expressed not merely by hon. Members in the Opposition parties, but by senior representatives of the police service.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Paul Boateng): This has been a useful and largely good-humoured debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) on raising an important subject that the whole House will want to be tackled. She was wearing her sensible shoes today; to be fair, she always does. Unfortunately, those sitting behind her—the bovver boys of Dorset and of the New forest—were determined to put her off track. They were true to form; she rightly talked about the importance of sophisticated argument and sensibilities in respect of numbers. The hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) knows nothing of sophistication, and sensibilities are hardly the stock-in trade of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne). We heard from them a crude party political response to the debate which did them and their party no service whatever.

The truth is that the Government have made available to the police resources far over and above those made available by our predecessors. The figures speak for themselves: estimated total revenue expenditure on the police service in England and Wales for 1999–2000 is £7.426 billion—an increase of £225 million, or 3.1 per cent., over 1998–99. Let us look at police numbers in the constituency of the hon. Member for Beckenham. Police numbers fell between March 1992 and March 1998—by an average of more than 340 officers a year on the basis of a Conservative budget in each and every one of those years—and the Metropolitan police lost 2,060 officers throughout that period. We have stabilised the position and the Met lost only 21 officers in 1998–99. Those are the facts and she must give credit where it is due. Under the Government whom she supported, police numbers fell by more than 340, year on year.

The hon. Member for South Dorset complained about the budget of the Dorset police, but it has increased in the current year by 5 per cent., or £77.4 million, which is above the national average of 3.1 per cent. The people of Dorset would not have had that money spent on policing had his party been returned to government. It was not returned to government and, as a result, expenditure on police in Dorset is greater than under our predecessors.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Boateng: No.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) also complained, saying that the presence in the Chamber of three Members representing Gloucestershire seats showed that Gloucestershire's police funding was in crisis. On the contrary; that is a sign of diligence, not of crisis, and it is no accident that the Conservatives were outnumbered. One Conservative and two Labour Members representing Gloucestershire seats were present, and the House can draw its own lessons from that. The contributions of those Labour Members, as well as those of my hon. Friends the Members for Salford (Ms Blears) and for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe), recognised the real gains being made in policing on the ground resulting from the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Those gains were reflected in the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Ms Kingham).

All my hon. Friends recognised that the 1998 Act has provided a totally different context for policing and the reduction and prevention of crime in our country, and that it has enabled partnerships to be established on the ground. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), who wears his sensible shoes on almost all occasions, was good enough to give due credit to all those good folk in Dorset who are taking advantage of that Act, which the Labour Government passed, to build effective partnerships between the private and public sectors, which is the best way of bearing down on crime and disorder.

We heard the usual Liberal rant from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan): money, money, money, money, more resources, more resources, more resources. Some absurd figures were picked out of the air and it was suggested that if only we would take another penny out of our pockets and give it to the police—it could have been two pennies, but one never knows with the Liberals—all would be well and police officers would suddenly spring up like dragon's teeth. My response is that he really must get real. Why are the Liberals so afraid of recognising the benefit that private-public partnerships can bring?

The hon. Gentleman attempted to raise the spectre of neighbourhood wardens as if the House should be frightened of them. The reverse is true and I am sorry that, in an otherwise unremarkable maiden Front-Bench speech on these matters, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) saw that same spectre. He suggested that neighbourhood wardens somehow presented a threat to traditional policing values. They do no such thing, because community patrol and neighbourhood warden schemes do not provide substitutes for police officers. On the contrary; their role is to add value to the work of police officers, not to replace them. The benefits of that are being experienced by local communities up and down the country. If the hon. Member for Hallam listened to communities more rather than always having the next edition of Focus in mind, his party would be much better sighted on these issues.

Two serious points relating to police pensions were raised by my hon. Friends and echoed on occasion by Conservative Members. We recognise the difficulties faced by police authorities—they are part of the poisoned legacy left to us after 18 years of neglect of these issues and this part of public policy. We have increased the proportion of revenue funding to be allocated on the basis of pension commitments to 14.5 per cent. in 1999–2000 in recognition of the increased burden of pension costs. I assure the hon. Member for Beckenham that we have been prepared to confront those difficult issues in our review of this matter.

There are no easy answers to the problem of the cost of police pensions, as my hon. Friend the Member for Salford said. We have not yet made final decisions on the detailed content of the firm proposals that we intend to introduce, but we shall do so shortly. The House will then have an opportunity to consider them, as will the police service and the wider community, in terms of the decisions that we shall have to take.

The public safety radio communications project is important because it relates to new technology, and to improving and enhancing police capacity in that area. Negotiations are taking place between the police information and technology organisation and BT, the putative contractor. They will soon produce outcomes and it will then be possible for us to consider a proper response to the funding challenges.

These are challenging times, but partnership between the police and the public—not simplistic solutions, but recognition of the importance of efficiency and effectiveness—is at the heart of our policies. If we recognise the complexity of modern policing, and if we do not accept simplistic answers to simplistic questions, we shall go forward successfully.

Grimsby Fish Market

12.30 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I hope that you are sitting comfortably, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister is also sitting comfortably, because I am about to retail a horror story that is worthy of the Hammer house of horror—apart from the fact that, in this horror story, Anglian Water plays the combined role of Baron Frankenstein and Count Dracula.

At the beginning of this year, the Grimsby fish merchants who buy and fillet fish in Grimsby's market—Grimsby's wonderful new fish market, I should say—received a shock. These merchants, who carry out what could be described as the primary process, were given estimates by Anglian Water showing the scale of the increase in charges that would take effect from June. The increase had been imposed to pay for the new treatment station at Pyewipe, which was to come on-stream in that month and, indeed, has come on-stream. The existing charge for Macklam's was £738 a year; it was to increase to £20,400—an increase of 2,600 per cent., at a time when inflation was running at about 2 per cent. The current charge for Arthur Bacon was £2,700 a year; that was to increase to £49,000, an increase of 1,735 per cent. The current charge for Cheek House was £7,000 a year; that was to increase to £63,500, an increase of 790 per cent.

Those horrendous increases were due to the urban waste water treatment directive, which requires urban waste water from coastal towns to be collected and treated prior to discharge by the end of 2000—next year, in other words. Grimsby was to have the pleasure of pioneering the measure and of paying the full charges 18 months before the deadline. That was because Anglian Water happens to have a new treatment station—originally intended to remove discharges deposited on beaches in Cleethorpes—which was planned and started before the directive. The station was to be financed by the charges, although what is discharged by the fish merchants—the primary processors—is organic biodegradable waste.

The Sea Fish Industry Authority tells me:

"The direct discharge of this effluent to the open sea is relatively harmless, it simply returns the fish nutrients back to their origin."

Indeed, generations of fish in the Humber estuary and its environs have been reared on exactly such discharges. Anglian Water says that the discharges, although organic and biodegradable, are polluting; but that is only because they are mixed with human and other industrial waste before being treated. If the material were discharged directly into the sea—that would be possible, with consent, and it is being considered in north-east Scotland—there would be no threat of pollution.

Anglian Water imposed the charges on Grimsby before imposing them on any other fishing port. I am talking about ports with which Grimsby is in direct and increasingly intense competition. For instance, it is competing with Hull for landings. Hull has no processing plant, so no charges will be imposed in that regard—if, indeed, charges are imposed at all. If they are imposed, they will be imposed in 2001, or perhaps later. Grimsby must also compete with north-east Scotland and parts such as Aberdeen and Peterhead. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) will know, the North of Scotland Water Authority intends to set up a plant under the private finance initiative, but bids will not come in until next year and we do not know when the plant will be completed.

The competition is intense. Because of the shortage of fish, Grimsby market's throughput has fallen by 25 per cent. since its establishment. The problem is that this is a mobile industry. The merchants and traders can do their business anywhere. Grimsby merchants buy in Hull; Hull merchants buy in Grimsby. If there is a threat of much heavier charges in Grimsby, the merchants will simply transact their business elsewhere.

Fish can be landed anywhere. Why should they be landed in a place where charges will be so much higher than they are in every other fishing port?

The strength of Grimsby market lies in the fact that a large number of merchants are competing, and they set good prices. The competition sets good prices. If a substantial proportion of merchants go bust because of these charges—20 or more firms may go bust—there will be less competition to set the prices. The possibility of bankruptcy is imminent for several. Anglian Water says that the increase amounts to no more than 1 per cent. of annual turnover, but the Sea Fish Industry Authority estimates that in 1994 processors' profit amounted to only 1.5 per cent. of sales, so most of the industry's profit will be eliminated by the charges. Bankruptcies will result, and firms will go under.

Grimsby's ability to set a good price will be lessened, as will its attraction in regard to fish landings. The charges will deal a blow to our competitive position in the United Kingdom, and, when they are imposed everywhere—as they will be—will deal a blow to the competitive position of British fishing, as opposed to the European position. The directive leaves it open, but I have no doubt that if charges are imposed everywhere, they will not be imposed in the same heavy-handed fashion elsewhere. Other countries do not have the hard-nosed water companies that we have.

Other countries are helping their fishing industries to adjust. Denmark, for instance—

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mitchell: I will in a minute, when I will be making a point directly relevant to my hon. Friend's constituency.

Denmark is giving its industry relocation grants. France is giving its processors 70 per cent. grants to enable them to install treatment equipment in their plants; 35 per cent. comes from the chamber of commerce, while 35 per cent. is provided by European grant money. Other countries are coping without higher charges, and that will deal a blow to the competitive position of Grimsby and the British industry as a whole. It will also deal a blow to fishermen, because the cost of fishing will increase. Fish is already experiencing difficulties in the supermarkets. Demand is down because the price is up: people are turning to alternatives such as chicken. As a result, there is surplus capacity on the processing side. We are already seeing manufacturers restructuring and jobs being lost, and the charges represent a further prod in that direction, because they will increase the cost of fish in the supermarket.

As soon as this became known, I was confronted by an outcry. I began corresponding with Anglian Water. The joys of corresponding with Anglian Water must be experienced to be believed: I really ought to publish the correspondence on the internet. It involves all the pleasure of corresponding with an "I speak your charge" machine that replies only, "We must do this in order to clean up the environment. Charges will go up. You will enjoy it later."

Anglian Water has pretty much refused to budge. It did agree that its initial sampling procedures, on which it has based its charges, were wrong. I am glad that it agrees about that because the procedures were wrong, so Anglian Water has made no great concession in that respect.

I arranged a meeting with my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment. He urged compromise. Anglian Water said, "In that case, we will start the charges one month later." That, too, was no great concession because Anglian Water could not have started the charges in June anyway. It also said that it would limit the increase this year to two and a half times the existing charge, or 250 per cent when inflation is 2 per cent., provided that the full charge—up to 500 per cent. for smaller merchants, which will amount to about £250,000 for one of our biggest processors, Bluecrest come in—next year, so Anglian Water gets the merchants into its net, and then closes the trap.

Anyone who protests about the charges is now being referred by Anglian Water to its legal department. Such is Anglian Water's desire for accommodation and compromise. There is still to be an increase of 2.5 times, and a damaging blow is still to be dealt to Grimsby—and it is based on inaccurate information. Samples of the effluent that is discharged vary widely. The Sea Fish Industry Authority has carried out checks, and its findings are very different from those of Anglian Water, whose findings from surveys and spot checks fluctuate wildly.

There is no legitimate basis for these charges. It is a basic principle that charges should reflect the actual costs. Anglian Water does not know the actual costs, and it therefore has no legal or reasonable basis for the charges.

There has been no co-operation with the Fish Merchants Association, because Anglian Water has been unhelpful on the "divide and rule" principle. Indeed, Ofwat wrote to me on 28 June saying that

"Anglian Water did not properly consult fish merchants". properly.

That was a crushing indictment of Anglian Water.

Fish merchants have had no time to implement changes in their procedures to reduce effluent. All sorts of changes could be made, but they all take time, investment and planning. Merchants could use less water—which they use at the behest of their customers, who want the product to be clean and not to be filleted in dirty water—or they could arrange for primary treatment of effluent, or they could remove solids, which could be collected by the council. The big processors could construct a dissolved air flotation plant—which would cost £250,000, so it really is only for the big boys. Consents for direct sea discharges could be obtained. Small business men could be grouped, so that they might better cope with the charges or install plant to reduce effluent.

The Sea Fish Industry Authority is prepared to advise on alternatives; even Anglian Water could help and advise, but it has done nothing. The fact is that there has been no time to act on any alternative, because Anglian wants its money—its pound of fish—now.

The fishing industry in north-east Scotland has brought in environmental consultants—CORDAR—financed by local authorities, to tell it how it might reduce effluent and, therefore, the charges that it pays. In Grimsby, we have had no time to take similar action.

Anglian Water has not even considered the regulator's suggestions. The Environment Agency told me that "scope exists for Anglian to present an argument to OFWAT that Grimsby fish merchants are a special case and their costs should be phased in."

To which, in a letter to me, dated 6 July, Anglian Water simply replied:

"Using the economic argument would set a precedent applicable to other groups".

Gosh—how awful it would be if people were able to contest charges on economic grounds!

On 7 April, the Office of Water Services suggested to Anglian that "charges should be delayed until waste minimisation and agreed sampling procedures have been put in place."

There was no response.

The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has finally been stirred, and realised that the charges will damage the industry. MAFF urged caution in applying the charges, which are only one of many burdens being imposed on the fishing industry. MAFF has received no response from Anglian on the matter.

Grimsby is on the front line of this issue, as all the other water companies are waiting to see what happens there before imposing their own charges elsewhere. Some companies, such as Yorkshire Water, are being a little more sensible about the issue. However, South West Water is proposing increasing water charges from 37p to £5 per cubic metre. North-east Scotland's pelagic industry is facing a 28-fold increase in water charges. Therefore, everyone is waiting to see what happens on the front line.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) is interested in related events in Lowestoft, and I hope that he will lead the resistance to similar charging there.

Mr. Blizzard: Fish merchants in Lowestoft are watching the situation with great trepidation, as Anglian Water is just about to commence work, just north of Lowestoft, on a new sewage works, and we fear that the same charging regime may be imposed in my area. My hon. Friend has made the point very well that no business can face such crippling charges, and pointed out the irony that fish merchants' waste itself does not harm the marine environment.

I also tell my hon. Friend that my experience of Anglian Water is essentially the same as his—Anglian is arrogant and insensitive. Moreover, Anglian itself was recently fined £14,000 for polluting the beaches at Lowestoft, resulting in the loss of a European blue flag.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, which reinforces the argument.

I should also emphasise that these Grimsby merchants are new Anglian Water customers. Previously, Associated British Ports added 18 per cent. to its charges, and then divided up those charges and billed individual businesses. When ABP discovered the size of the charge increases, it decided to let Anglian Water cut out the middle man and crucify its customers directly. Those Grimsby merchants are therefore new customers, for whom Anglian should allow a one-year moratorium in applying the new charges so that a proper and legal charging basis may be agreed, and customers advised on how to reduce charges. After the moratorium, the new charges could be phased in.

I also ask the Government to consider how they might assist the British fishing industry, the competitiveness of which is being affected by a massive increase in charges. Our industry needs help and support which has been made available in Europe, but not in the United Kingdom. Something has to be done to encourage our industry. It needs encouragement and advice on training, and proper investment in new procedures to reduce effluent—which, consequently, would reduce bills. I am sure that no other European Union member state would insist that the new charging regime should be implemented as fully and rigorously as Anglian is trying to do.

Despite the temptation—as hon. Members will see, I am labouring under strong feeling on the issue—I shall not apply John Edmond's two-word description, one word of which was "greedy", to Anglian Water. I do not want to call Anglian greedy—its behaviour will prove whether it is. Nevertheless, Anglian Water has the power to do anything. It has the power to establish a moratorium and to phase in the charges gradually. It should exercise its power for the benefit of our fishing industry, which has been very hard hit, and to create good relations with its customers. It is a monstrous and unforgivable tactic for Anglian to use its legal department to threaten customers who express doubts about the size of the charge increases.

Anglian Water's only defence is but a sophisticated form of the Nuremberg defence. Anglian tells me, "We're improving the environment—everyone wants that". Anglian said:

"We are merely seeking payment for the services we are providing".

The Nuremberg defence was, "I have killed you for your own good and for the good of others", and Anglian has taken the same line.

Our fishing industry accepts the need to clean up the environment. It has cleaned up its own environment by using an enormous amount of water. However, it cannot absorb such a huge increase in charges. We are not at the 11th or the 12th hour—it is 12.30. Nevertheless, I tell Anglian Water that the charges will be resisted. I cannot advise merchants to pay the charges, or say, "You've got to behave reasonably towards Anglian Water because Anglian has behaved unreasonably and inconsistently towards the fishing industry."

I tell Anglian Water this, "If you persevere in blind, unaccommodating, inconsiderate and greedy behaviour, you will irreparably damage the fishing industry and—specifically, and in advance of the rest—the Grimsby fishing industry. You'll kill the goose that lays your golden eggs. If you do that, I'll not forgive you, Grimsby will not forgive you, and the fishing industry certainly won't forgive you."

12.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Alan Meale): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing this debate. It is a very important debate not only because of the importance of the United Kingdom fishing and food processing industries, but because of the importance of the communities in the areas represented by my hon. Friend and other colleagues in the Chamber.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, but also to other Labour Members for attending the debate. It is noticeable that only Labour Members have attended this very important debate on an issue affecting not only Grimsby but many other fishing communities across Britain. I am sad that Opposition Members have not bothered even to be here.

My hon. Friend has a long history of supporting and expressing the concerns of the fishing industries. I remember that, long before I was elected to the House—even before my hon. Friend was a Member of Parliament—in the mid-1970s, he was campaigning on issues affecting the fishing industries. Similarly, some of my other Friends in the Chamber, in their short time in the House, have expressed in the House concerns about food processing and fishing companies in their constituencies. My hon. Friends the Members for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn), for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) and for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) persistently raise their concerns. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) also raises matters of concern frequently, but fishing is a devolved matter in Scotland, and my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who deals with these matters in Scotland, is present in the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I ought to point out to the Minister, as the Chair has frequently had to do to hon. Members, that half-hour Adjournment debates are the property of the hon. Member who introduces them. They are not wide-ranging debates, and the absence or presence of other hon. Members has no significance for them. The debate is a matter between the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister.

Mr. Meale: I appreciate that point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I referred to my hon. Friends because of the enormous number of representations made to me before the debate. I realise that the debate is narrow and time limited, but I recognise the concerns of many of my hon. Members.

This is a serious matter, but I must disappoint my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby by saying that the Government do not have the power to intervene in the charges set by Anglian Water this year. Under the law, we cannot tell Anglian Water what to charge. Neither Ministers nor Ofwat have the power to control charges, provided companies do not discriminate unduly and remain within price limits. Our only power—we have used it as best we can—is to encourage all parties to search for an agreed solution.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment recently met a delegation led by my hon. Friend. We have not been able to achieve an agreement, but I am more than willing to meet my hon. Friend, and others, to discuss their concerns. We shall use our best endeavours to gain some movement.

The Government value the fishing industry, and substantial grants for a range of improvements have been made to fish processors under the European Union fish processing and marketing scheme. Since the processing and marketing and port facilities teams were launched in 1996, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has made grant awards totalling more than £8 million to English fish processors, markets and fishing ports. The Sea Fish Industry Authority, which is sponsored by that Ministry, recently produced a 50-page guidance note on water and effluent minimisation, which has been sent free of charge to fish processors. The document contains guidance to fish processors on how to identify areas of wastage and minimise increases in costs.

We support the determination of our fishing industries to be fully competitive internationally. My hon. Friend suggested that we should do more than other countries to improve the environment, and he said that firms abroad receive financial help for environmental improvements. Each EU country supports its industries in different ways to suit local arrangements, but there are legal limits on assisting industries financially without falling foul of competition rules.

If my hon. Friend has any evidence that other EU states have supported their fishing industries beyond the limits of competition rules, it would be a matter for the European Commission to investigate. Other member states have different priorities and contribute different shares to the EU budget. Their fishing industries are in different stages of development and vary in their relative importance to national economies. It would not be appropriate to seek to match the spending of other countries in these areas. Spain, for example, receives a much larger allocation than anyone else, because of the size of the Spanish fishing fleet and the relative poverty of the areas concerned.

To provide decent services and to protect the environment, it is reasonable to expect all users of services to pay their way. In particular, charges should broadly follow the principle that the polluter pays. Producers—including the fish processing industry—of trade effluent hitherto discharged with little or no treatment have benefited for many years from relatively low charges.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central): My hon. Friend mentions the polluter pays principle, but one of our major difficulties is that different water authorities apply the rules differently. The industry is highly competitive, and when my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) talks of possible job losses in Grimsby, I have to hope that some of those jobs might come to Aberdeen, but the playing field is not level.

Mr. Meale: I take that point, and I sympathise on the points made about the introduction of new charges. That is why I have offered to broker a deal.

Although the average bills of fish firms have been lower than average household bills, the firms produce much more effluent than households do. Consequently, their bills per cubic metre have been lower on average. According to Anglian Water, the previous charges to fish firms in the Grimsby area were about 25p per cubic metre. The increased charges work out at about 66p per cubic metre—just over half the volumetric price that domestic customers pay. Given the volume of fish firms' effluent, it is remarkable that previous trade effluent charges for some firms were as low as £112 when the average household sewerage bill in Anglian Water's area was £164 in 1998–99.

A few fish firms have claimed, as a reason for continuing to pay low charges, that they produce natural waste. However, fish processing includes processes such as battering and crumbing. It also produces discharges with a high content of putrescible solid waste. By its very nature, the industry is dirty, and effluent can contain blood, offal, oil, flour and other residues. The effluent is comparatively polluting and expensive to treat.

In England and Wales, since before privatisation, trade effluent charges have been calculated according to the Mogden formula, under which charges are set partly according to the nature of the effluent and partly according to the level of treatment undertaken. That is in line with the polluter pays principle, which we fully endorse.

Fish firms are being asked to meet the higher costs of treating their effluent to at least secondary standards, as is required by the urban waste water treatment directive. We support the directive's main aims, and I shall outline some of the main improvements that it requires. There should at least be minimum requirements for the treatment of all significant discharges of urban waste water from the sewerage network to fresh waters, coastal waters and estuaries. Secondary treatment—that is, treatment by a biological process—is required as the norm for urban waste water discharges.

The directive requires that the most potentially polluting urban waste water discharges—in other words, those into sensitive areas—should have been treated by the end of 1998. Those serving communities of 15,000 people or more must be treated to secondary standard or higher by the end of 2000, but treatment of smaller discharges can be deferred until the end of 2005. We consider that all of that is right, and we want improvements to be introduced as quickly as possible—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now begin the next debate.

Plymouth and Torbay (Objective 2 Bid)

1 pm

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I am tempted to move to the Dispatch Box, given the absence of Conservative Members, but—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. This is the second time I have had to intervene. These half-hour Adjournment debates are the personal property of the hon. Member introducing them. The relevance of any other hon. Member attending them is not at issue; they are a matter only for the hon. Member introducing the debate and the Minister replying.

Mr. Sanders: The south-west region suffers from an outdated conception of its prosperity that is based either on an old-fashioned view of current conditions—often resulting from people's childhood experience of pleasant summer holidays—or a view that the east of the region, which is prosperous, is somehow typical of the entire region. In a sense, we are the victims of our own marketing strategy. We spend thousands of pounds marketing the area to the rest of the nation and overseas as a place that is good to visit, with a high-quality environment, good standards of accommodation and plenty of attractions. That tends to hide some of the social problems that lie behind the facade of the marketing strategy.

Cornwall's designation as an objective 1 region demonstrates that there are substantial problems in the west of the region, but those problems do not end at the Tamar bridge. My Cornish colleagues may even agree with me when I say as a Devonian that parts of my county are indistinguishable from the county of Cornwall: the tin mine ruins of west Devon, the chapels of north Devon, the fishing port of Brixham and, linking both counties as a main centre of education and employment, the city of Plymouth, which provides thousands of jobs, as well as education and health services, for people who live in Cornwall.

The Plymouth-Torbay-Devon arc essentially represents a dividing line between the prosperity of the main south-west region and the Cornwall-Devon periphery, where unemployment is significantly higher and GDP per capita considerably lower than the national, regional or European averages. Indeed, 56.5 per cent. of people in the arc area are economically active compared with 62.6 per cent. of people in the south-west generally, and 16 per cent. are recipients of income support, compared with just 12 per cent. in the rest of the region. Average earnings are 84 per cent. of the UK figure and our GDP per capita figure is 82 per cent. of the European average. The figure for my constituency of Torbay is equivalent to that for Cornwall, at 71 per cent.

The area's historic economic rationale and its recent problems derive from its natural environment. Inland, the importance of agriculture and the natural environment dominates, while, on the coast, the traditional industries of tourism, fishing, defence and support services have been in decline for some time.

The decline of dominant sectors has affected every part of the north, west and south of the county, and includes a substantial decline in industrial employment in Plymouth, the slow and inexorable decline in agriculture-related employment throughout the rural part of the area, a continuing decline in the service sector, particularly resort tourism employment in Torbay and other coastal locations, and a decline in fishing and related industries.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is making a powerful case. We in Devon are delighted that Cornwall has received objective 1 status. Does my hon. Friend agree, however, that if the Devon arc does not achieve objective 2 status, investment and jobs will go to Cornwall or remain in the prosperous areas to the east of the Devon arc, leaving us with a corridor of neglect?

Mr. Sanders: My hon. Friend makes an important point. There is already evidence of that. A prospective call centre that wished to locate in my constituency is now looking at Cornwall rather than Devon because it has objective 1 status. There could be more such cases in future if our bid is not successful. One of the criteria laid down by the European Commission—which is also part of the Government's remit—is to assist areas adjacent to those that receive the maximum objective 1 support.

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He will know that we in Cornwall were very grateful for the support of colleagues from Devon for our bid for objective 1 status. Is he aware of how much we recognise the importance of Devon's objective 2 bid? It is important to acknowledge that we are not in competition here. One reason for Cornwall's success was the unanimity across the wider south-west that we needed objective 1 status. It is vital that the message gets through that Cornwall is also calling for objective 2 status for the hon. Gentleman's constituency, just as Devon called for objective 1 status for us.

Mr. Sanders: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. Other partnerships of support are emerging throughout the south-west. I was very pleased about the support from Somerset, Gloucester and Bristol and from right across the south-west, as well as from Cornwall.

Our economic problems did not occur overnight with the loss of a major employer or an industry such as steel or shipbuilding, but the social and economic effects are just as severe. The question that has to be answered is not whether the area should receive assistance but when.

The Plymouth-Torbay-Devon arc bid is not an immediate reaction to a new set of events, but a considered response to a long-term trend. Traditional employment opportunities have been in long-term decline, new sectors have failed to emerge and low-wage and often part-time employment dominates the labour market.

The trend towards low-wage and part-time employment has increased in recent years. The majority of jobs in sectors under threat, such as fishing and defence-related industries, have been full time and higher paid. As those jobs have declined, they have been replaced by predominantly part-time and lower-paid service sector jobs. Even in lower-paid industries, such as agriculture and tourism, there has been a move away from year-round, full-time jobs to more seasonal part-time jobs.

Even though there is a strong and vibrant hotel and catering industry in the region, and especially in my own constituency, it supports far fewer people in the area than it did in the past. Gone are the days when a small guesthouse could generate enough to provide a sole income for the owners. Gone are the summer months when family-owned local shops would get a boost in trade that stopped the business from going under in the winter months. Gone are the week-long, bucket-and-spade holidaymakers in their thousands, whose holiday pay circulated in the local economy for months after their visit.

Today's visitor will spend more, but less of that money will stay in the local economy. It will be spent in national accommodation chains, nationally owned petrol stations and superstores, nationally run entertainment centres and tourist attractions and nationally franchised fast food outlets. Nationalisation in the literal sense has seen to that. Globalisation has had similar effects in fisheries, agriculture and defence—the other main south-west industries.

One of the main consequences of those changes is that well-educated, trained and skilled labour is fast becoming our main export to the rest of the United Kingdom.

Our problems were recognised under the far south-west objective 5b programme, the Plymouth objective 2 programme, through funding drawn down under European social fund objective 3 and Community initiatives such as PESCA, LEADER and KONVER.

The far south-west has an established track record of successfully implementing a number of European programmes, but the nature, mechanics and scale of previous programmes have only slowed the economic decline of the region. The 1994-99 programmes can be regarded as the start of the process of reversing decline, but it is far from complete.

The intention behind the new objective 2 bid is to build on past programmes. Already, a comprehensive partnership of local councils, businesses, community groups and voluntary organisations have come together and identified the main drivers for change. They include competitive small and medium enterprises. The long-term prosperity of the region is dependent on a strong, outward-looking and competitive business sector.

Technology and knowledge-based industries are also important. The growth of industries in which physical location and accessibility are less important presents opportunities for the far south-west. For example, 70 per cent. of all internet traffic in north America is transported on equipment made in south Devon. With our skilled work force, clean environment and strong university bases in Plymouth and Exeter, the area is very well placed.

We need to support sectors in transition. Adjustments in the agriculture, fisheries, defence and tourism sectors have hurt the local economy. With support from all four of the strands in the objective 2 programme, we can help those industries to create new opportunities and improve their competitiveness.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): The hon. Gentleman is wise to have given way to me, because I intend to support him on this occasion and say what an excellent initiative he has taken in securing this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) and I share his sentiments and support his case, and we hope that the Minister will be able to give us some good news.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the major factors in getting new money into Devon is that we should have a good transport network? Does he share our concern about the lack of railway development and agree that, without good air and rail transport, new industries will not want to locate in our area?

Mr. Sanders: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support and agree that transport links are crucial. We may be able to tackle some of the transport problems through objective 2 funding, so it is doubly crucial that we secure it.

Community regeneration is another important economic driver. The major task will be to tackle the severe deprivation in the region's major urban centres as well as in some of the smaller towns. The failure of trickle-down approaches to the regeneration of deprived communities is now widely accepted. The region has a strong track record in community-led and co-operatively structured initiatives, with wealth and job creation centred on local needs, local labour markets and local solutions.

I think that the case has been made. It is one with which the Minister is familiar, as he has taken the trouble to visit the region and sample the reality of our economic circumstances. For that, we are grateful, and we assure him that a warm west country welcome awaits him should he want to make a return visit.

We await with confidence the Government's decision on which areas will qualify for the new objective 2 programme. There is all-party support for our case, and a wide partnership of councils, businesses and voluntary organisations is working together and hoping for the best. We know that we meet the criteria and we can demonstrate that we have the networks and partnerships to maximise the opportunities that objective 2 designation will bring.

We would like a hint that we are moving in the right direction, that the Government recognise that there are structural problems behind the marketing image that we create to attract visitors to our area, and that assistance is at long last on the way.

1.12 pm

The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning (Mr. Richard Caborn): I thank the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) for securing this debate. We are trying to bring more sense to the way in which we spend public funds in the English regions and to consider more strategically all the elements that need to be put together to tackle the problems in areas such as his, which, as he says, I visited a few months ago. The regional development agencies have a role to play in advising Government on the disbursement of the single regeneration budget, on the development of our assisted areas map and regional selective assistance, and on the structural funds.

We are genuinely trying not only to formulate joined-up policies for the regions but to get joined-up money to implement them. The representations of the RDAs have made this an interesting period.

Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders). This debate is as important to my constituents as it is to his.

The difficulties of the economy in Plymouth are deep-seated. Is my right hon. Friend saying that we will be able to tackle the disparities through that joined-up thinking? The Treasury's public expenditure statistical analysis shows that the south-west is among the three regions receiving the least identified general Government expenditure. As he probably knows, in 1996–97 Scotland got £4,756 per head; Wales £4,553; the north-east £4,235; and London £4,601. By contrast, the south-west got only £3,651, or a whole £1,000 per resident less than Scotland. I hope that we will be able to begin to redress that, and the importance of objective 2 in that respect cannot be overstated.

Mr. Caborn: I cannot answer directly, because I do not know the composition of all the figures, but my hon. Friend makes a telling point.

We must take a strategic approach, and land use and transport planning are major parts of that. I hope that when the examination in public for the regional planning guidance for the area takes place we will be able to factor in some of the problems. One of the RDA's first actions was to underline its support for the extension of the runway at Plymouth airport: a decision clearly taken with an economic as well as an integrated transport perspective.

The hon. Member for Torbay eloquently put the case for his area and for Plymouth. As the Minister with responsibility for the English regions, I welcome the opportunity to reply to the points that have been made.

At the Berlin summit in March, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister secured a very good deal on European funding for the regions in Britain, and many areas of the United Kingdom will benefit from funding for economic development and regeneration over the next seven years. We have always accepted the need for member states to take cuts in the size of their population covered by the funds to make enlargement affordable—that has been generally agreed in the House—but the cuts have to be fair. We are pleased to say that we have negotiated an outcome that we believe to be fair and affordable for all future and existing member states, including the United Kingdom.

Figures released by the Commission on 1 July confirm that the UK got a good deal at Berlin. UK regions will get funding of more than £10 billion for 2000-06 for economic development and regeneration. That funding will be good for jobs and investment in the regions. Money will be spent on projects involving business support, education, transport and the environment. We aim to target the support directly to the UK's neediest areas.

That deal shows the Government's commitment to maximising the benefits of European Union membership for the people of Britain.

Mr. Steen: As the Minister probably knows, a third of Torbay is in my constituency.

Mr. Sanders: A quarter.

Mr. Steen: A quarter, is it? I thought a third.

The Minister mentioned the most needy areas. Does he accept that the area under discussion is a needy area?

Mr. Caborn: I shall come to that in a minute.

A unique package of support for Northern Ireland was secured at Berlin, as well as a special deal for the highlands and islands; both areas will continue to receive generous support of about £1 billion in total. Cornwall, West Wales and the Valleys, and South Yorkshire—my area—will receive objective 1 funding for the first time, and Merseyside will continue to be eligible.

It is not a great accolade to get objective 1. I think that I said that when I was in Cornwall. We do not aim for objective 1 or 2. We want to be at the top of the wealth creation league in Europe. That is what we have to strive for. I hope that, if I still have this job in seven years' time, I will not have to read out a catalogue of areas that have got objective 1 or 2 funding.

Mr. Burnett: The Minister is making a powerful point about market forces, but does he concede that, in our part of the world, there are, rightly, significant planning constraints, and that objective 2 would help us to get the seed corn investment in jobs that we so urgently require?

Mr. Caborn: I take that point, and it is why we are in the process of modernising the planning system. I have explained our new planning guidance on housing to the House several times, and have just done so to the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs. When I was in the Torbay area a few months ago, 350 workers had just been made redundant at Nortel. However, I spoke to the firm yesterday and was told that 500 people have been taken on to work in a new development. The Government want to assist wealth creation by business, through transport, land-use planning, and the economic benefits stemming from the regional development agencies.

Perhaps the most notable success in the Berlin summit discussions on the structural funds was to secure the two thirds safety net for most UK regions. Given the cuts in funding coverage, the safety net will be of significant benefit to the UK, as it will maintain two thirds of the existing population coverage under objectives 2 and 5b, which have been amalgamated. The original plans were not fair, and we had to negotiate hard to secure the safety net, which means that about 13.8 million people—rather than the 6.5 million originally proposed—will be covered between 2000 to 2006 under objective 2. That shows the extent of the Prime Minister's success in the negotiations.

On 30 March, the Government issued a public consultation paper, announced to the House by my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, to determine eligible areas for objective 2 funding. My hon. Friend invited interested parties to submit their views on possible eligible areas, as well as comments on preferred geographical areas—the NUTS areas to be covered—and outlines of the criteria that might be used to determine eligible areas.

That consultation ended on 25 May. More than 360 submissions were received from a wide range of individuals and organisations—indeed, 41 Members of Parliament wrote in support of their constituencies. I am very aware of the importance of the structural funds to the regions, as underlined by the response.

My hon. Friend and I have seen an enormous number of delegations over the past few months. As I said earlier, I have met the RDAs and representatives from each of the regional and local partnerships to discuss their objective 2 proposals. That has all contributed to the process of drawing together priorities for the proposed areas. The work of the RDAs has been a significant contribution to what has been a mature discussion in Whitehall about dispensing public funds, and I am grateful for it.

We also need to bear in mind the fact that this is just one of a range of instruments to address need at regional and local level. The Government are committed to providing a strategic and co-ordinated approach to tackling need, however it is manifested. That means matching the instrument appropriately to need.

During my meetings with regional delegations, I have emphasised the need to ensure that their objective 2 proposals are inclusive of other forms of funding, such as the single regeneration budget and the new deal for communities. The structural funds should be part of a funding package for the next seven years, led by the regional economic strategy. It is unfortunate that the RDAs will not produce their economic strategies until the end of the year, but they became operational only on 1 April. However, the RDAs' emerging economic strategies have contributed to their thinking, and they have been able to factor some of that thinking into their representations to Government about how the regeneration funds should be dispensed.

My Department, in consultation with the Department of Trade and Industry and other Departments, is now looking at the criteria and areas for funding based on local and regional representations, to help draw up the UK's list of areas eligible for objective 2 status, with a view to submission to the European Commission in the summer.

However, I stress that no decisions have been made yet. All areas will be considered equally for inclusion on the basis of need and against objective criteria, whether they are industrial, rural, urban or fisheries areas. The Commission's proposed breakdown of percentage covered by each strand—10 per cent. for industrial areas, 5 per cent. for rural areas, 2 per cent. for urban areas and 1 per cent. for fisheries areas—is indicative at EU level, not at member state level.

The Commission's definitive position is not yet known. It has released the amounts of money involved, but it has not yet clarified the criteria. We are waiting for that clari[illegible] and we shall start work on the various maps as so[illegible]ve get it.

Mr. Sanders: Does the Commission have to make that decision before any announcement of which areas qualify can be made? Will the Minister say who will make the decision, and how? Will it be made known first to the House?

Mr. Caborn: I would hope that the announcement will be made to the House, but of course that cannot happen if the House has risen for the summer recess. As soon as we get the information from the Commission—and we hope that that will be sooner rather than later—we will make the announcement, but the timing is not altogether in our gift. I hope that the Commission can be hurried up a little, but we shall have to wait and see.

Discussions will take place with the Commission after we submit our proposed areas to it. We expect that agreement will be forthcoming in the autumn. An announcement will be made of those areas that we propose to the Commission for eligibility under objective 2.

As I said, areas losing full objective 2 and 5b status will receive continued funding, at a reduced rate. They will have the flexibility to profile spending across the six years of transition that we have negotiated. The transition fund will be worth about £450 million, and will ensure continued funding for many areas that currently benefit from the structural funds.

I am sure that all hon. Members welcome objective 1 status for Cornwall. I hope that the county uses this unique opportunity effectively.

Ms Atherton: May I take this opportunity to thank my right hon. Friend, on behalf of the people of Cornwall? I know that they are universally grateful for the work that he has done to secure objective 1 status for the county.

Mr. Caborn: I thank my hon. Friend, and can tell her that I shall be going to Cornwall for my holidays this summer, as I have done for the past 15 years. When the beauties of Torquay and Torbay were described earlier, I was reminded of my honeymoon, which was spent in Torquay. I have fond memories of the area.

Cornwall will receive about £315 million over seven years from 2000, which will go towards the regeneration of its infrastructure and economy. That will be a much needed and welcome boost for the area.

I referred earlier to my meetings with delegations from the regions. During my meeting in May with the south-west delegation, led by Jill Barrow, chief executive of the RDA, we discussed, among other things, the case for Torbay and Plymouth's eligibility for objective 2 status. As I said, well before that meeting I had visited Torbay in October 1998, at the invitation of the hon. Member for Torbay. I was made very much aware then of the importance of gaining objective 2 status for the economic and social regeneration of the area.

I have taken note of what has been said in the debate, and of the powerful case that has been made for objective 2 status for the Plymouth and Torbay area. As I have said, the Government have not yet finalised their proposals for the new map.

Mr. Steen: Does the Minister accept that Torbay is a needy area and requires objective 2 status?

Mr. Caborn: The representations made on behalf of the area have placed it in its rightful position in terms of the needs of the south-west as a whole.

Mr. Steen: It is not what it was on the Minister's honeymoon.

Mr. Caborn: That is true, but we shall consider the whole picture. I therefore cannot predict the outcome of the consultation for any area, and it would be wrong to try. We have been objective and transparent in the way that we have considered the wider issues of regeneration, beyond the structural funds. However, I can assure the hon. Member for Torbay that the case for Plymouth and Torbay—as for all areas in the UK—is being carefully considered.

Gas Industry (Regulation)

1.29 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): It is just over a year since I first had occasion to bring to the attention of the House the bullying and anti-competitive practices of Transco, a division of BG plc. I cannot decide whether my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry is more likely to begin his remarks by saying, "We must stop meeting like this," or with the somewhat less comradely, "Oh no, not you again." In the hope that it will be the former, let me start by bearing some good news.

Two weeks ago, I had the pleasure to stand with my constituent, Mr. Andrew Duffield, outside the High Court, where his solicitors had read a statement in open court announcing that BG plc had made an out-of-court settlement of £101,000 plus costs to Mr. Duffield and to his company, EGS—Exoteric Gas Solutions—in respect of the libel perpetrated against that company, which I had brought to the Minister's attention in last year's debate. That is indeed good news. I take the opportunity to thank him for his close and continuing interest in the case. But for his interest, BG plc might have taken even longer to capitulate. BG plc has deep pockets and it is hard for any impartial observer to do other than believe that it attempted to use its huge financial resources to bully a fledgling business into submission by forcing EGS to incur massive legal costs before settlement of the case.

If all I had to report were good news, however, I would not have presumed to detain the House this afternoon. In fact, I will expose lies and prevarication at the highest level in BG plc and Transco, and what must either be incompetence or a shameless lack of resolve on the part of the supposed regulator in the industry, the Office of Gas Supply.

Beneath all that, I will show that Transco's illegal and anti-competitive practices continue unabated, despite an enforcement order that was issued by Ofgas. Most disturbing of all, I will provide evidence that public safety has been jeopardised by Transco's change in response-time targets and in procedures for handling uncontrolled gas escapes.

I must provide the House with some background. The Gas Act 1986, which was amended in 1995, introduced competition to the business of connecting premises to the mains gas network. Previously, the market had been a monopoly controlled by British Gas-Transco.

In January 1997, Mr. Duffield, who had been a senior manager at Transco, left to set up a specialist gas connection company, EGS, to compete against Transco. Under the Gas Act, Transco is charged with custodianship of the gas mains network and all competitors such as EGS must apply to it for a quotation for the final-stage connection of any new development.

Without that information, EGS cannot provide an accurate quotation to the end customer for the cost of the scheme. For that reason, Transco has a statutory obligation not to abuse its position by delaying a quotation to its competitor to advantage its connections team, which is competing for the direct business. Nor may it over-quote for the final connection to EGS in order to raise the price quoted by EGS to the end customer, thereby making its bid uncompetitive.

It was those statutory obligations that I accused BG plc of ignoring in the debate of 9 June last year. I have a copy of a letter from Mr. Richard Giordano, chairman of BG plc, to Mr. Duffield dated 24 June 1998. It says:

"I am fully aware of the statements made by Mr. Gardiner M.P. at the Adjournment debate in the House of Commons having received a full transcript from Hansard of the debate including the Minister's reply. BG plc is furnishing the Minister with a statement on the main issues that were raised, a copy of which will be passed to you."

That was a lie. Despite three reminder letters, no such statement was ever passed to Mr. Duffield.

I have a copy of an affidavit sworn by Mr. Christopher Lefevre, a director of Transco, in which he deals with the circumstances surrounding the production of the libellous e-mail, the same e-mail in respect of which BG plc has had to pay £101,000 plus costs. That e-mail was headed:

"BG plc Transco Memorandum from the Area Directors to all Managers of District Operations."

In the affidavit, Mr. Lefevre recalls that

"Phil Nolan, who was then Area Director for East Area, assumed the role of acting Area Director for South Area."

Thus, Mr. Nolan, in two capacities, can be said to have sent the e-mail that was from all the area directors.

More than that, in the affidavit, Mr. Lefevre recalls that "Phil Nolan asked me to deal with a letter sent by OFGAS".

He continues:

"I had a general discussion about the issue with David Ashbourne, the Manager of Legal Services and decided to issue the e-mail of 27 March 1997 instructing staff not to deal with the Plaintiffs"— that is, EGS.

On 1 September 1997, the same Phil Nolan wrote to Mr. Duffield specifically to confirm:

"I have issued no such instruction and there are no such instructions to that effect in place."

That, too, is a lie. Phil Nolan has since been promoted to become managing director of Transco. Like the chairman of BG plc, Mr. Giordano, he remains in post.

The Minister is aware that, in February, Ofgas finally issued a decision document relating to its investigation of Transco. The document concluded that "there have been unacceptable delays in Transco's quotations for connections, that there has been overcharging and that Transco's behaviour is anti-competitive".

It goes on to say:

"There is a likelihood of continuing breaches, if action is not taken", and states unequivocally that

"information provided by Transco in the course of the investigation has proved to be untrue".

At last we have some tough talk from the regulator. It is two years too late perhaps, but, despite the fact that Ofgas stubbornly refuses to interpret the Gas Act as allowing it to punish past action, at least it insists on compliance with statute and the introduction of a system of compensation for any future breaches. The order states:

"The scheme shall provide as a minimum for payments to be made in such amounts in such circumstances and on such terms as are provided in Attachment 2 to this order."

[Mr. Barry Gardiner]

Let us examine attachment 2, which deals with claims for compensation. Paragraph 7, subsection (ii) provides that:

"If, before the expiry of five working days from the submission of the claim the quotation is adjusted by Transco so that the reason why it was thought to be excessive has been addressed to the reasonable satisfaction of the person who submitted the claim no compensation shall be payable by Transco".

That may not pass the crystal clear standard of plain English, but the effect is devastating. It means that Transco has every incentive to continue overcharging in the certain knowledge that, even if it is caught out, all it will need to do is agree to reduce the charge to the proper level within five working days. It will then not have to pay any compensation at all—not even the client's costs of showing that it has overcharged. That is not regulation, but a fraudster's charter.

The case of Mrs. Moyies provides an example of Transco's racketeering and of Ofgas's total ineffectiveness as a regulator. She lived in an area of Cumbernauld that was not supplied from the gas mains. She obtained a quote from Transco to have her home connected at a cost of £2,730.17, an exorbitant sum, but she calculated that, within three years, the savings on her Calor gas bills would have recouped that enormous investment. She borrowed the money and got connected by Transco.

Over the next few weeks, Mrs. Moyies's supply was cut off by Transco as it connected neighbouring properties. Those were connected for £146 per house. When she complained, her Member of Parliament, my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mrs. McKenna), who is my good friend, took up her case and brought it to the attention of Ofgas and the Gas Consumers Council. Transco insisted that the charge was correct. Mrs. Moyies had to pay for the extension of the mains and it was then permissible for Transco to spur off that extension to neighbouring properties. Neither Ofgas nor the Gas Consumers Council had the expertise to show that Transco had overcharged.

Fortunately for Mrs. Moyies, Mr. Duffield heard of the case on Radio 4's "You and Yours" programme. He was able to demonstrate that Transco had overcharged by 120 per cent. Mrs. Moyies's bill was reduced from £2,730.17 to £1,231.14. Transco had overcharged in accordance with its own statement of charges, which it published and which were provided to the Director General of Ofgas herself.

In a letter of 5 May 1999, some six months after the original complaint to Ofgas, Mr. Graham Boorer, gas distribution engineer of Ofgas, wrote:

"Transco accepts that the charge was not in accordance with its Condition 5 charging methodology and that it overcharged for the connection."

What did Ofgas do? It looked carefully at condition 5 paragraph (7) of the Department of Trade and Industry's standard conditions of public gas transporters' licences, which states:

"Where a statement in respect of the determination of such charges as are mentioned in paragraph (3) has been furnished to the Director under paragraph (3) or (4) then unless and until it has been superseded by a subsequent statement under paragraph (4), the licensee shall not make such a charge or agree or offer to make such a charge as is so mentioned other than the one determined in accordance with the methods and principles shown therein, unless the Director otherwise consents."

Transco made a charge other than the one determined in accordance with the methods and principles shown therein. This was Transco's own statement of charges as mentioned in paragraph (3), which provides:

"The licensee shall comply with any directions given by the Director to furnish him with a statement showing the methods by which, and the principles on which" such charges are to be made.

Ofgas argued that although the statement had been sent by Transco to the Director General of Ofgas, although Transco had published and accepted it as its basis of charging and although it accepted that it had contravened that statement and overcharged Mrs. Moyies, Ofgas could do nothing because the director general had never asked for the statement as per paragraph (3). Of course she had not done so. One does not ask for something that one already has. Ofgas is supposed to be the rottweiler regulating the industry. In fact, it is the industry's lap dog, or more accurately, it is Transco's.

The Ofgas connections steering group has collected statistics from Transco itself, which show that out of 77 responses to inquiries during September and October last year only 57 per cent. were within Transco's own standards. That record is appalling enough, but the strange thing is that it improves so dramatically—to 86 per cent. within standard—if one excludes responses to Mr. Duffield's company EGS.

Only 21 per cent., or one in five, of Transco's responses to EGS were within standard. An objective observer might regard that as clear evidence of blatant discrimination against EGS. Ofgas continues to regard those responses as a series of isolated and unconnected mistakes on the part of Transco.

In a letter dated 25 February 1999, Mr. William Sprigge, Ofgas's legal counsel agrees that:

"BG has on occasions treated EGS differently to other businesses requesting quotations."

However, he is quick to add:

"Whether this has been deliberate is uncertain. We therefore cannot say that BG has not deliberately treated EGS differently to other businesses requesting quotations; nor can we say that it has."

For such a shameless display of fence-sitting, I simply express the wish that all Mr. Sprigge's fences be henceforth topped with razor wire.

Finally, I must make good my claim that there is evidence that Transco has prejudiced public safety by its changes to the procedures for handling gas escapes and the reduction in response time targets for such incidents. Prior to the establishment of Transco in 1994, BG responded to more than 99.99 per cent. of uncontrolled gas escapes within one hour. Since Transco took over, its performance has fluctuated between 97 per cent. and 92 per cent. Given that there are more than 1 million calls a year, that means there are tens of thousands of occasions on which the public has been exposed to a significant danger for longer than would have been the case under the old British Gas company.

In May 1997, Mr. David Varney, BG plc's chief executive, wrote following a challenge at the company's annual general meeting that:

"concerning the figure of 96 per cent. performance against the applicable regulatory standard of attending uncontrolled gas escapes within one hour, the information, as best we know it, is accurate . . .

In terms of your query as to the former standard of 99 per cent. within one hour, I confirm that we are working to improve performance in this area. However, we are not in a position to disclose information relating to the 1997 target at this time."

Changes in response times are not the only adverse changes in safety standards that Transco has introduced. New working practices mean that teams attending uncontrolled gas escapes are often unsupervised. In some cases, the line manager is 100 miles away and yet different workers at the site believe that other members of their team have a supervisory role, which they do not.

I ask the Minister to raise those matters with the Health and Safety Executive and to establish what percentage of responses Transco currently meets within one hour, its current target response figure and the steps that it has taken to ensure proper supervision at the site of uncontrolled escapes and clarity and responsibility among the teams attending.

I said what steps Transco "has taken" because the safety issue is not new to Transco. Indeed, a report was prepared for the area directors of Transco in December 1996 by a senior manager who had particular expertise in the investigation of incidents and the formulation of policies and procedures to minimise the risk of further escapes. That investigation revealed that safety standards had fallen substantially from those inherited in 1994. In particular, the investigation revealed that procedures developed in response to previous incidents had lapsed into disuse. A serious question was raised about whether a single one of Transco's directors possessed the necessary skills and operational experience to carry out the proper review of incident trends.

The original draft of that report caused such a stir that its commissioner, Mr. Lefevre, phoned its author, who was buying a sandwich in his lunch hour. On answering his mobile phone in the supermarket, the author was curtly asked to destroy the report. He refused to do so, but eventually agreed to modify some of the language contained in it. The author of that report, which caused such embarrassment and disquiet to Transco, was of course Mr. Andrew Duffield who had been assigned that as a final project before his departure to set up EGS.

Some people might venture that the extraordinarily poor service that EGS has received from Transco in the past two years—the constant delays in quotation, habitual overcharging, and the refusal to pay the prescribed penalties for statutory breach even where it is admitted that they are due—has been in no small way related to the embarrassment that Transco felt at Mr. Duffield's report on its company safety.

Be that as it may, the fact that Ofgas has either not possessed, or failed to apply, powers to protect Mr. Duffield is just as serious. It must be the concern of all hon. Members that assurances are sought and received from Transco about public safety, that anti-competitive behaviour in the industry is eradicated and that Ofgas begins to take seriously its role in regulating that industry and protecting consumers such as Mrs. Moyies and companies such as EGS.

1.50 pm

The Minister for Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) for raising this matter again and for securing this debate. I welcome the debate; he should not apologise for returning to the matter. It is the role of us all as Members of Parliament to persist in drawing attention to injustices and flaws in the structure of our laws and budgets. He has done so assiduously. He has raised serious matters on behalf of his constituent.

Although the Government do not run energy industries—all the companies operate privately in the marketplace—the gas and electricity industries are subject to competition regulation, to tackle both abusive market power and anti-competitive market practices. The independent regulator—there is now one regulator for the gas and electricity industries—operates within the relevant Acts of Parliament.

When we came into office in 1997, we inherited the Gas Act 1995 and the Electricity Act 1989, which set out the parameters for activities. We decided that, although they were okay as far as they went, they were flawed. We are updating them, and, when we have an opportunity, we shall change them through primary legislation. Indeed, we have already acted to change the terms of operation under the licence conditions.

My hon. Friend asked some detailed questions about the interpretation of conditions of standard. If I cannot reply now to all his points, I shall ensure that he receives a detailed response in a follow-up letter.

The gas and electricity industries occupy a crucial position in the United Kingdom economy, accounting for 2 per cent. of the gross domestic product. They provide essential services to millions of people. Our intention is to ensure that consumers come first and that the regulatory regime reflects that. We accept that the system is far from perfect and have already implemented a better and fairer one, which re-emphasises the consumer.

We issued a Green Paper on the regulation of utilities last spring, which laid the foundations for a better and more efficient regulatory system. We proposed to improve and align gas and electricity regulation under a single energy regulator, to separate electricity distribution and supply, and to provide a new basis for delivering policies to encourage energy efficiency and generation from renewable sources.

In response to our consultation in July 1998, we announced the intention to merge the Office of Electricity Regulation and the Office of Gas Supply. They now fall under a single energy regulator in one body. We also announced that the new regulator should organise the appropriate structure in which all energy industries are regulated. We have made a fresh start, with the appointment of one person to the posts of Director General of Gas Supply and Director General of Electricity Regulation—not least because electricity companies are now selling gas, and gas companies are now selling electricity.

Such a structure needs to be reinforced by law, and, when parliamentary time allows, we shall align the regimes of electricity and gas regulation, which were out of sync under the legislation that we inherited.

We have also taken action to change the rules when they do not work immediately in favour of the customer. As a result of complaints that I as a Minister and many other hon. Members have received about door-step selling, we inserted a marketing clause into the gas suppliers' licence to challenge bad practices and improve them. We intend to use the proposed utilities Bill to sort out regulation at the earliest opportunity.

[Mr. John Battle]

My hon. Friend has pursued the case of Exoteric Gas Solutions with me and my Department. We have had many meetings and much correspondence on the issue, which was raised in the House in June last year. Following his constituent's complaint, the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets—Ofgem—carried out a thorough investigation into Transco's connections business, and found Transco to be in breach of standard condition 11(1) of its licence and section 9(2) of the Gas Act.

Ofgem consequently made an enforcement order against Transco, requiring it to introduce systems for handling quotations for connections to its pipeline system and to achieve the International Standard Organisation 9001 standard for the systems. Transco also had to introduce a liability scheme for failures to meet standards of service. Ofgas, as it was then, imposed the enforcement order on Transco on—I think—19 February, so things have moved on significantly since last June.

To be in breach of an enforcement order is a serious matter. It is the first time that such an order has been made against Transco. It takes the form of a public notice and the company must take responsibility for it. I know that Transco is taking it very seriously.

I thank my hon. Friend for drawing my attention to the particular case of Mrs. Moyies's connection. I cannot answer it in detail in the House, but I will ask for a thorough investigation of the practice in order to draw out implications for the structure of the entire connections industry.

My hon. Friend mentioned that legislation allows the Director General of Gas Supply to make provision in a final enforcement order for a monetary penalty. In addition, if an enforcement order is made and not complied with, the legislation confers the right of action on persons who suffer loss or damage as a result of that non-compliance, subject to certain defences.

That describes the situation under the regulatory regime that we inherited from the previous Administration. We are considering those arrangements very carefully to see whether improvements can be made for future cases of alleged breach of licence conditions. It may be possible to give the regulator powers to impose monetary penalties that are proportionate to the circumstances for past as well as continuing breaches of licence conditions. I know that that is what my hon. Friend has consistently and persistently campaigned for, and I hope that we can give him some solace in the not too distant future.

Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) on bringing this important matter before the House and particularly on highlighting the lack of expertise available to assist consumers in pursuing such issues. In the forthcoming utilities Bill, for which we hope, and the follow-up to the review, will my hon. Friend the Minister ensure that the Gas Consumers Council or its successor body has the resources to make such expertise available?

Mr. Battle: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. She has championed energy consumer councils in her time in the House. In the revised regulation that we hope to introduce under the utilities Bill in the not too distant future, we hope to give consumers a much strengthened voice through the consumer councils. As she said, that means that they ought to have the resources to enable them to do the job well and properly.

I should mention the important question of safety, which is paramount. Under the licence condition, which is tighter than the general condition, a response must be made within one or two hours. I should emphasise that the National Audit Office, a body entirely independent of the Government, published a report on competition in the domestic market on 12 May, and some of its headline points were encouraging.

As we know, prices are down; all suppliers are offering lower tariffs. Customers have a choice; 26 companies are active in the domestic market. Crucially, safety has been maintained and the quality of service to customers has on the whole improved. I shall keep a close eye on safety, although the NAO's report was encouraging and I was heartened by the fact that it was, in the main, so positive.

On the downside, the report pointed out that many customers do not have sufficient knowledge of changing structures. There has been a maelstrom of change since the days of one nationalised gas company. Companies have proliferated, with new entrants to the marketplace as well as the separation of former nationalised industries. People do not know how much the market has changed or know what to expect. It is all right saying that they all have choice, but if they do not know of what, life is made incredibly difficult. There have been complaints of poor selling techniques and lack of information on what to expect. That in turn can drag down quality and performance. I am determined that that shall not happen, and I am sure that the regulator cannot tolerate it either.

I shall look in detail at all the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North has made. We must consider how we shape the market's regulatory structure for the future. That is precisely the point of our White Paper—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Tourism

1. Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): If he will make a statement on the state of tourism in Wales, with particular reference to raising standards of bed-and-breakfast accommodation. [88521]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I had responsibility for this matter until 1 July. In difficult circumstances, the industry in Wales has performed well. We have allocated an additional £1 million to the Wales tourist board. Quality standards in the bed-and-breakfast sector—

Madam Speaker: Order. The Minister said that he had responsibility until 1 July. It is 7 July. Is it not a devolved matter?

Mr. Hain: I understand that, Madam Speaker. I was just explaining that it is a devolved matter, but I was talking about what had gone on until 1 July.

Madam Speaker: Yes, but if it is a devolved matter, we must pass on.

Mr. Hain: It is indeed, from 1 July.

Madam Speaker: Thank you.

Welsh Legislation

2. Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): What plans he has to introduce amendments to legislation dealing specifically with the needs of Wales with regard to (a) the Government of Wales Act 1998, (b) the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994, and (c) the Welsh Language Act 1993; and if he will make a statement. [88522]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): None.

Mr. Wigley: I believe that this is not a devolved matter. I thank the Secretary of State, who also doubles up as First Secretary, for that comprehensive answer. Does he agree that there will be times when legislation to deal with Wales alone, such as the three Acts referred to in the question, will need amendment—perhaps relatively minor amendment—to enable the Assembly to undertake its work and to allow other activities in Wales to go forward? Does he agree that it would be helpful to have a fast-track procedure to deal with such legislation? Is he involved in discussions about the possibility of the Welsh Grand Committee being reinvented to enable such relatively small changes to go forward?

Mr. Michael: The Assembly is free to ask the UK Government to amend primary legislation. In another place, the right hon. Gentleman and I might well discuss where it was appropriate for those requests to be made. If the Government agreed, the Secretary of State for Wales would steer the amendments through Parliament. It is for this House to decide how it would deal with such matters. I am sure that the appropriate authorities understand the right hon. Gentleman's point and will consider it.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): My right hon. Friend's predecessor as Secretary of State for Wales said that we needed a Welsh Assembly because Wales was increasingly run by quangos. I was not a great supporter of the Welsh Assembly, but I am certainly opposed to quangos. The previous Secretary of State also gave a commitment to end the quango state in Wales and make a bonfire of the quangos. Will the present Secretary of State give us a date when the commitment will be met and the bonfire will happen so that we can all attend?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend should attend regularly as we remove quangos. The Cardiff Bay development corporation will wind up its affairs by the end of March next year. A number of organisations, have already been folded. It is important that the Assembly is taking on its responsibilities. During the Assembly's short time in being, a lot of which has been devoted to preparing the ground for future action, Members of the Assembly and the Assembly Cabinet have been engaging with the policies and activities that have previously been the responsibility of quangos. The underlying trend of my hon. Friend's question is being pursued.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): As the Secretary of State has said, the National Assembly for Wales has been running effectively for only a week. It is no surprise that the nationalists are looking, under the Government of Wales Act 1998, for further transfers of power. Will the Secretary of State give a commitment to the House of Commons and to the people of Wales that there will be no more transfers of powers from Westminster to Wales, particularly tax-raising powers, until the people of Wales have been given their say in a referendum?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. He attacked the nationalists for wanting to go further, but his party did not want to go anywhere and has made a sad lack of contribution to date. The job of the National Assembly is to make the current devolution settlement work. It is good settlement, which provides an opportunity for those who have been elected to the Assembly by the people of Wales to bring accountability and creativity to bear on policies directly affecting Wales. That is what is happening in Cardiff bay now.

Beef Industry

3. Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): When he next intends to meet the Assembly Secretary responsible for agricultural issues to discuss problems in the beef industry. [88524]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): This is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales, but I am delighted to see that Christine Gwyther, as the Assembly Secretary with responsibility for agriculture and the rural economy, has taken up her duties with such strength, integrity and determination.

Madam Speaker: Order. If the Minister announces that it is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales, I cannot allow the House to trespass on those responsibilities. [Interruption.] If the Minister tells me that it is a matter for the Assembly, it cannot be a matter for the House, correct?

Mr. Michael: Correct.

Abattoirs

4. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What representations he has received regarding the number of European Union export approved abattoirs in Wales. [88525]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): None.

Mr. Swayne: Will the Minister undertake to launch an investigation into the administrative and regulatory burdens that are faced by abattoirs in Wales as compared with the rest of the European Union? Will he undertake to publish the findings of those studies? Can he assure the House that the studies will be carried out by impartial and proper sources, not vegetarians?

Mr. Jones: This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, or, in Wales, for the National Assembly.

Madam Speaker: Order. In that case, it is a matter for the Welsh Assembly. It cannot be the responsibility of both this House and the Assembly.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I cannot take points of order in the middle of Question Time. Once we break our rules, there will be no end to it.

NHS Funding

5. Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): When he last met the Assembly Secretary with responsibility for health to discuss the funding of the NHS in Wales. [88526]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): I am delighted to see that devolution is working through in the way that Jane Hutt has taken up her role as Health Secretary in the Assembly. She is one of four women appointed to the Assembly Cabinet. This is already making a significant impact on the serious problems of the NHS in Wales, which is in a parlous state owing to the incompetence of the last Government. The Assembly will make a significant impact towards improving that situation.

Miss Kirkbride: I am delighted to see that, after the farce we have just experienced, the national health service is still a matter for this House. According to the Secretary of State's answer, the Government still have responsibility and they have a great deal to answer for when it comes to the NHS in Wales. The Secretary of State will be aware that, on 31 March 1997, the waiting list for the waiting list—people diagnosed by their general practitioner as needing treatment and waiting to see a consultant to be put on an official waiting list—was 5,956 in the Principality. By 31 May 1999, 26,094 people were waiting for their initial hospital appointment. That is an increase of 400 per cent. as a result of the Government's policies for the health of the people in Wales. Is it not time that the Government admitted that, under Labour, the health service is getting worse?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Lady clearly does not understand the damage done by the previous Conservative Government, for which she and her hon. Friends should apologise. The hon. Lady also does not understand that these matters are now the responsibility of the National Assembly, which is seeking to tackle them.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Will my right hon. Friend remind me whether the amount of money spent on the health service has increased substantially ahead of inflation? Is anything being done about the burden of debt that faced the health service before 1997 and which it is taking so much time to get grips with?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In the period up to 1 July, strenuous efforts were made to prepare the ground for the Assembly's taking over the NHS in Wales and to enable it to tackle precisely the problems my hon. Friend raises. A stocktake that I set in motion will be available to the Assembly as it takes up its functions, to inform it as it tries to improve the parlous situation that he describes.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Today, it would seem that the Secretary of State for Wales is hardly responsible for anything to do with Wales. Welsh questions will increasingly become a laughing stock if that is allowed to continue. However, the right hon. Gentleman is responsible for the total block grant out of which health spending comes, so perhaps he can say whether he believes sufficient resources are being spent on the NHS in Wales.

The Secretary of State knows that waiting lists for admission to hospital are getting longer and that each extra person waiting means stress and pain for those involved. On 16 June, David Davies, an Assembly Member, wrote to the right hon. Gentleman about a Newport man who has been told by his consultant that he needs a quadruple heart bypass and that he could die within six months. The man is now on a 10 to 12-month waiting list for an operation at Morriston hospital, Swansea. What will the Secretary of State do? What action will he take to ensure that that life-saving operation is carried out as soon as possible? Is it not time that the Government woke up to the fact that it is waiting times that are important, not merely waiting lists?

Mr. Michael: It is the hon. Gentleman who is a laughing stock—his synthetic anger is pathetic. The Conservative Government failed the NHS in Wales. He is right to say that there is a responsibility on the Secretary of State to provide resources. Massive additional resources have been provided, but the problem is the state of administration and the financial chaos in which the Conservative Government left the NHS in Wales.

The matters to which the hon. Gentleman refers are not matters for this House, but matters for the Assembly. That is why he quoted an Assembly Member raising the question.

Assisted Area Map

6. Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): When he intends to meet Assembly Secretaries to discuss the assisted area map of Wales. [88527]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): That is a matter for which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has lead responsibility, but, as Secretary of State for Wales, I was directly involved in those discussions until 30 June. The Assembly Cabinet will take the matter forward with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Jones: Is it not the case that my right hon. Friend has discussed those matters with our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? May I persuade him that it is absolutely vital to my constituency that we retain assisted area status and that we have restored to us objective 2 status, which was taken away five years ago by the previous Administration? Does he accept that Airbus, Raytheon and the many companies on Deeside industrial park need to know that, in the years ahead, my constituency will have assisted area status and objective 2 status, so that we can continue to obtain investment—especially investment from abroad—and the grants available to indigenous industry? May I urge my right hon. Friend to ensure that Deeside remains on the assisted area map?

Mr. Michael: My right hon. Friend always makes the best possible case for his constituency. With him, I have visited both Airbus and Raytheon and I am impressed by their work. Through him, I congratulate the workers at Raytheon on their successes in recent weeks. I can certainly confirm that the best possible case for Wales has been made within Government and that Cabinet colleagues, including the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, have listened carefully and sympathetically.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): As we know, this is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry. In his discussions with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, has the Secretary of State for Wales emphasised the importance of obtaining assisted area status for the upper Swansea valley, which has been badly hit by unemployment? Can he give us any idea when an announcement will be made on assisted area status, which would give a much-needed injection to such areas?

Mr. Michael: Both I and the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), as junior Minister responsible have done everything possible within the powers of the Welsh Office and in co-operation with other colleagues to ensure that the enormous problems in the upper Swansea valley are understood and that everything possible is done. I cannot say more than I have about the short period that we have to wait before the full details are available, but the hon. Gentleman can be satisfied that we fully understand and share his concerns.

Beef Exports

7. Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): When he expects exports of beef products to resume from Wales. [88528]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): A great deal sooner than would have happened under the previous Government. I am pleased with the progress that our Government have made to date towards achieving the lifting of the beef export ban, but these are matters for the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and in future he will involve the National Assembly for Wales in his deliberations.

Mrs. Winterton: Despite the Labour Government's boast about the lifting of the export ban way back in November 1998, no British beef has yet reached the continent. The Government have failed to remove any further barriers set up by the European Union. What discussions has the Minister had with the Agriculture Secretary in Wales and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about the future of the calf processing aid scheme? Does he agree that it is vital that that scheme be extended until the export ban is lifted and beef is exported and until the market has righted itself again?

Mr. Jones: We are very near to persuading the EU finally to allow beef to be exported from this country. We expect the first beef to be exported in the very near future—this summer, I hope. The hon. Lady claims that the Government are not succeeding where her Government lamentably failed. They produced the difficulty in the first place, and I think that she should have some shame.

Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): The hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) has asked a question which I hoped to ask under Question 3. In any meeting with the Agriculture Secretary in Wales will the Minister stress the mature and responsible attitude of the National Farmers' Union in Wales, which stated this weekend that any unilateral moves to remove the ban on beef on the bone in Wales could damage the efforts to get the export ban on beef lifted?

Mr. Jones: I endorse my hon. Friend's comments. The NFU has acted extremely responsibly. This is a difficult issue. We are working towards an objective that all the industry would share—the lifting of the export ban.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The Minister makes much of the lifting of the ban. He says that he hopes to see exports in the summer. Let us cut the waffle. The Minister knows that the beef farmers will be listening to what he has to say. Not a single carcase of beef has gone abroad from Wales or anywhere in the United Kingdom for that matter. Will the hon. Gentleman give Welsh farmers a date on which the first beef will be slaughtered and exported from Wales to the rest of Europe?

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman asks for a specific date. I recall that when the Labour party was in opposition, the Conservative Government constantly referred to a date—a November, I believe it was. The lifting of the ban never came and no beef was exported. The Conservative party seems more interested in renegotiating the treaty of Rome than renegotiating the rights of British farmers. The beef ban will be lifted under the Labour Government soon and farmers know that they can trust the Government to act in their interests, while the Conservative party let them down extremely badly.

Concordats

8. Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): If he will make a statement on the preparation of concordats between the National Assembly and Whitehall Departments. [88530]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): The UK Government expect to send a draft memorandum of understanding and related concordats to the Assembly Cabinet shortly for its consideration. These documents will set out administrative arrangements designed to secure the smooth operation of the devolution settlement.

Mr. Rowlands: During the referendum debates, we made a clear commitment to the people of Wales that there would be a Secretary of State for Wales in this House answerable for all oversight matters in Welsh affairs and other Government Departments. Given the shambles that has occurred this afternoon, will my right hon. Friend make it clear that the Secretary of State for Wales will be accountable and answerable in this House for oversight matters in other Government Departments when they relate to Welsh matters?

Mr. Michael: The only shambles this afternoon has been that hon. Members—mainly Opposition Members—have not understood that devolution has taken place and have asked questions on matters that are for the Assembly, and not for this House.

The answer that I gave indicates that concordats will deal with the relationships between Government Departments and the Assembly, and that will provide the necessary clarity. In many cases, it will be a matter for the Assembly and the Secretaries of State with other responsibilities. However, there is an important role for the Secretary of State for Wales and that will continue.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Is it not a fine state of affairs when a former Welsh Office Minister of the status of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) sees fit to describe the present arrangements as a shambles? Does not that only go to show what happens when a Government impose, for ideological reasons, a system that is not wanted by the majority of the people in Wales and which squeaked through by only 6,000 votes in the whole country on a tiny turnout, despite the Prime Minister begging his Labour supporters in Wales to let the proposal go through?

Mr. Michael: That question was asked with the flavour of bitterness, arising from the hon. Gentleman's knowledge that his party was swept away so completely at the general election that it does not have a single representative in Wales. Events this afternoon have demonstrated that the Conservatives have not understood the responsibilities that have been transferred to the National Assembly for Wales, where they are being taken up with vigour. The settlement was not imposed—it was voted on by the people of Wales in a referendum. The hon. Gentleman waving his arms in the Chamber will not change that fact.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When the Secretary of State for Wales next meets the First Secretary of the Welsh Assembly, will he convey the happiness and congratulations of this House on the splendid start made by the National Assembly, which has resulted in growing approval for the idea of devolution in Wales, a new sense of pride and identity in the Welsh nation and, to our great satisfaction, the marginalisation of the Tory party?

Mr. Michael: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. I will make sure that they are passed on not just to the First Secretary, but to other Members of the Assembly. His remarks will be appreciated.

Ministerial Duties

9. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): What proportion of his working time is taken up by his duties as Secretary of State for Wales; and how he separates his responsibilities to this House and to the National Assembly. [88531]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): At the present time, my key priority is to achieve the smooth transition from the previous role of the Secretary of State, as it was until 1 July, to the role of the Secretary of State following devolution on the one hand, and to the role of First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales on the other hand. In both roles, I serve the interests of this House, the interests of the Assembly and the interests of the people in Wales.

Mr. Bruce: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not take it amiss if I say that it seems extraordinary that a person can be responsible within Cabinet as Secretary of State and as First Minister, where he has a clear responsibility to the Assembly in Wales. Surely this should not continue constitutionally. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman immediately resign from at least one of those posts?

Mr. Michael: That shows the hon. Gentleman's lack of understanding of the process that we must go through. Obviously, he does not understand the versatility that we are able to demonstrate on this side of the House. I have always said that I would step down as Secretary of State for Wales after weeks rather than months, but the experience to date confirms that it was wise to combine the two roles during the period of transition. That is obvious from a Welsh perspective, but not from the jaundiced point of view of the hon. Gentleman.

Barnett Formula

11. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): What representations he has received with regard to the Barnett formula in relation to Wales; and if he will make a statement. [88533]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): There have been a number of presentations, mainly during my predecessor's time when the Government of Wales Bill was under consideration in this House.

The principle behind the formula—that Wales gets a population share of changes in the comparable programmes in England—is clear and easy to understand. Most criticism of the formula confuses the absolute size of the block with the formula for changes. They are two different things.

Mr. Llwyd: I wish to refer to the additionality principle in terms of bringing in further moneys to bring forth objective 1 projects. I seek the Secretary of State's assurance that his office will adhere to the additionality principle, and that any moneys coming in will be over and above those already provided for in the Barnett block.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman goes off at a tangent. I think that he is referring to structural funds. I can reassure him that the principle of additionality is an obligation on the UK Government, which they will seek to fulfil, as they have in the past. As the Prime Minister stated when he was asked a similar question in Cardiff, the Government will not let Wales down.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): Does the Secretary of State agree that, before we even begin to think of devolution as a process, not a change, the Assembly must be seen to exercise its existing powers effectively? Does he further agree that it can do so only if Wales is sufficiently funded under the Barnett formula, and if sufficient attention is given to matched funding, particularly in relation to objective 1 funding?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend goes off on another tangent. Those are matters that must be dealt with in the process of the comprehensive spending review, when the burdens and the opportunities available will be considered. My hon. Friend refers to the fact that we achieved objective 1 status, which is so important for the valleys of south Wales, for mid-Wales and for north Wales. That achievement was brought about through the success of a Labour Government fighting for Wales. Over the next few years, the Government will continue to pursue the opportunity that it represents, and I am certain that the Assembly will make a massive contribution to ensure that it brings success to the economy of Wales.

Welsh Development Agency

12. Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): If he will make a statement on the Welsh Development Agency's support for the manufacturing sector in Wales. [88534]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Government are giving considerable support to manufacturing in Wales, but the specific measures being undertaken by the Welsh Development Agency are, of course, a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful to the Minister for that somewhat inadequate reply. Does he agree with many business men and women in Wales, as well as business men and women throughout the United Kingdom, that it is one thing for a development agency to offer some support, and quite another thing for the Government to load industry and business with huge additional on-costs, which totally counter that support and make it more and more difficult for manufacturing industry in this country to compete with countries outside Europe that are not loaded with the huge on-costs so typical of the European Union?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's interest in and support for manufacturing throughout Britain, and I am sure that that includes Wales. Will he acknowledge that there is now a better climate in Britain for business, including manufacturers, than there has been for generations? That contrasts starkly with the massacre of manufacturing that the Conservative Government carried out in the early 1980s and again 10 years later. Such a policy destroyed manufacturing. This Government's commitment to a healthy business climate to build a high-skill, high-quality economy throughout Britain, including Wales, is achieving success.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Welsh Development Agency provides invaluable support to companies throughout Wales, including a company in my constituency, Cambrian Consultants, which last week was presented with the Queen's award for export achievement? Will he join me in congratulating that company on its outstanding achievement?

Mr. Hain: Yes, I will. I acknowledge that success as one of the many successes that businesses are enjoying in Wales, as they strive to turn Wales into a high-quality world-class economy with the backing of the Government's policies.

Care for the Elderly

13. Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): What discussions he has had with the Assembly Secretary for Health and Social Services on the provision of care for the elderly. [88535]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on asking that question during Alzheimer's week. Before the transfer of functions, I had a number of meetings with Jane Hutt, the Assembly Secretary for Health and Social Services. During those meetings, we discussed a wide range of issues that are in her portfolio.

Mr. Öpik: Does the Minister accept that funding on care for the elderly is still far too low in Wales? Indeed, the availability of provision for the elderly in Wales has fallen below that in England. Will he carry on making representations to try to equalise investment in elderly care provision in England and in Wales?

Mr. Jones: I am sure that the Assembly will be very sympathetic to the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised, but it is for the Assembly to decide on the allocation of resources.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Minsterial Visits

Q1. [88551] Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): What plans he has to visit Bexleyheath and Crayford.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Beard: I am sorry that the Prime Minister will not be coming to Bexleyheath and Crayford. If he were able to do so, he would meet members of a community, which is a cross-section of the whole country, who admire and applaud his strenuous efforts to bring peace to Northern Ireland. When he next meets Unionist and nationalist leaders, will he tell them of the incomprehension, impatience and anger that will be felt in such communities if the best prospect for a settlement in Northern Ireland this century collapses because one side has made no gesture in many months to recognise legitimate concerns for arms decommissioning and the other side is too intransigent to wait 30 days for decommissioning to begin?

The Prime Minister: There are difficult decisions for all sides in Northern Ireland. All I ask is that people keep an open mind and carry on discussing the nature of the legislation with the Government so that we can put proposals that are agreed by everybody to the House next week. I very much hope that that will be the case.

Engagements

Q3. [88553] Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 7 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Marsden: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the health White Paper, which was launched yesterday and aims to save 300,000 lives over the next 10 years, will benefit everyone, particularly people on low incomes and those from socially disadvantaged backgrounds—the same people whom the Tories wrote off when they were in office through their two-tier national health service?

The Prime Minister: We have targets to reduce the death rates from cancer and heart disease. We shall put £60 million directly into services for the three most common cancers and a further £150 million into providing state-of-the-art equipment for cancer treatment. There will be an extra 400 cancer specialists and increased spending on cancer drugs. All that will, of course, take time, but we will end up with a vastly improved service for people suffering from that disease.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Why did the right hon. Gentleman not mention that the waiting list to see a consultant has doubled since he became Prime Minister? Will he keep on blaming other people or will he and his Ministers take responsibility for that miserable failure?

The Prime Minister: Waiting lists are down as a result of the Government's policies and we are putting an extra £21 billion into the health service—opposed by the Conservative party.

Mr. Hague: It is a good job that there is not a waiting list for a straight answer, or we would be here for a very long time indeed. The number of consultants is down; the number of complaints is up; the waiting list to get on the waiting list has been doubled; junior doctors have been betrayed; the head of the MBA said in his speech on Monday—[Interruption.] The head of the—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hague: The head of the BMA said in his speech on Monday—[Hon. Members: "Hurray!"] I am glad that everybody is listening; listen to the next bit as well. The head of the British Medical Association congratulated the Prime Minister on the fact that "Morale has never been so low".

Will he give the House the figure for the number of people waiting to see a consultant?

The Prime Minister: The waiting lists are 62,000 below the level that we inherited. The present figure is just over 1 million. [Hon. Members: "Give the figures."] I am giving the figures. Average waiting times are now shorter. As for junior doctors' hours, when we came to office, 6,500 junior doctors were working for more than 56 hours a week—an unacceptable figure. Now the figure is 4,800. However, we will continue to bring the figures down. I am pleased to say that only one junior doctor in six works now for more than 56 hours a week, which means that five sixths work for less than that; nevertheless, we will continue to reduce the hours. There are now 2,200 more doctors in the national health service, and, over the next few years, we will introduce 7,000 more.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister should be concerned that his officials did not even bother to put the answer to the question in his folder. The answer is this: 456,000 people are waiting to see a consultant. That is 200,000 more since he took charge.

Is not the emerging story of this Government, on this as on so many other things, one of simple incompetence? We have half a million people waiting to see a consultant, half a million people waiting for a passport, and half a billion pounds lost on the sale of the gold reserves. The Prime Minister's problem is that he has a Cabinet full of incompetents, but he can only have one candidate for the post of mayor of London. When will he get rid of those people, and secure people who will actually deliver for the Government?

The Prime Minister: As I have said, the right hon. Gentleman's figures for the waiting lists are wrong. Waiting lists have fallen by 62,000 from the level that we inherited.

The BMA made three criticisms. Let me deal with each in turn. First, the BMA disagreed with the way in which the primary care groups had been set up—but, last year, they voted by three to one to support the reforms. Secondly, the BMA opposed the private finance initiative contracts for the new hospitals. I am proud that we are building those new hospitals, which will deliver better health care for people. Thirdly, the BMA opposed NHS Direct and the new walk-in centres. Those centres, and NHS Direct, are giving ordinary people better access to the health service than they have ever had.

I understand the BMA's concerns, and we are prepared to talk to its members about them, but change is necessary for the improvement of the health service. We shall have 7,000 more doctors, 15,000 more nurses, 31 new hospitals and £21 billion more investment. That is a record of which we can be proud.

Q4. [88555] Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if we are to protect the countryside and rejuvenate our inner cities—as suggested in the Rogers report, "Towards an urban renaissance"—we must deal with a massive anomaly? A builder can construct a new house on a green-field site and be zero-rated for VAT, while renovation of an empty property in an inner city is charged at the full rate of 17.5 per cent. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that the Government will take the matter seriously, and will act at the earliest opportunity?

The Prime Minister: Of course we will take my hon. Friend's points seriously. As he knows, the problem of reducing the rate to zero has been caused by a European regulation. [Interruption.] It was signed by the last Government, I might add.

We are, however, taking two other steps that I consider important. We have refocused the single regeneration budget, and we are putting some £900 million extra into inner-city areas, where we can develop more brown-field sites. Moreover, we have upped the target for brown-field sites to 60 per cent. I believe that those measures will make a difference over time. However, I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes, and I recognise the anomaly to which he has drawn attention.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): When the Prime Minister talks of obstructiveness and resistance to change in the public sector, are doctors one of the groups that he has in mind?

The Prime Minister: No, I am not attacking doctors, but let us take the example of the PFI, which they have attacked. We are going to deliver the largest hospital-building programme that the health service has ever seen. We will deliver it on cost and on time. I think that experience shows that such developments, delivered through the private finance initiative, are better for the patient, and therefore better for the health service as a whole. I am not attacking doctors, or any other group of workers; I am saying that we need change in our public services—and this Government, who are putting more money into the public services than has ever been put into them before, are entitled to demand real change in return.

Mr. Beith: Does the Prime Minister not understand that doctors are concerned about future funding for patient care, as they worry about the much higher long-term costs of paying for hospitals through the private finance initiative? Over time, it costs more to do it that way. Does he understand that junior doctors are similarly concerned about their position? If the scars on the Prime Minister's back were real ones—if he had to go to casualty—would he really want to be treated by a doctor who had been on duty for 34 hours?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely why we are reducing the hours that junior doctors work. We have significantly reduced those hours, but we have to reduce them more. However, we cannot go all the way now, because it takes considerable time to train a doctor—in some specialisms, it takes 10 or 15 years. We are putting in extra investment—which, after all, is the largest three-year additional investment that the health service has ever had. As I said, we are getting in extra doctors and nurses, but that takes time.

I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's point on the PFI. If he would go and talk to the people at the PFI site that I visited today at Greenwich, they would tell them that, because of the PFI, the contract will be completed on time and will not have a cost overrun. They would also tell him that care and maintenance are part of the contract, and that the fact that care and maintenance are not done properly in the public sector is one big reason why we do not have the health service that we need.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): I should like, first, to place on record the sincere appreciation of my party and the people whom I represent for the superhuman effort that the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State, the Taoiseach and his Ministers made last week to deliver peace and government in Northern Ireland. I should like also to apologise to the Prime Manor and the House for being absent on Monday and unable to play a supportive role. I hasten to add that my absence was due entirely to aircraft failure.

Does the Prime Minister agree that the way forward document, which he and the Taoiseach produced, at this juncture, shows the best possible way forward for the future of Northern Ireland and for implementing all aspects of the agreement, not only decommissioning—which we all want, desire and need—but the devolved institutions, and other instruments of government, that would have been in place last September, had the spirit of the agreement been fulfilled? It is also the best possible way of ensuring that the process that has been endorsed by the people of Northern Ireland is brought to a successful conclusion, and to test the sincerity of those with arms on whether they will really decommission. The document shows the only way that we can test that.

The Prime Minister: It is important that people should understand that this is the only chance—the only way forward—for Northern Ireland. The agreement allows us to get both devolution of power, which people want, and the decommissioning of paramilitary weapons—not only republican paramilitary weapons, but all paramilitary weapons. As we have said, we shall listen profoundly—we must do; it is our duty—to concerns raised by any group in respect of it. I do believe that it offers the best way forward, and I urge people—all parties—to accept it as such.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): At the end of March 1998, no junior doctor at the Royal Surrey hospital worked beyond the 56-hour limit set by the previous Government. Now, over half the junior doctors at our hospital are working beyond that limit. Does the Prime Minister agree with his Health Secretary that care for the old and the sick in places such as Guildford simply does not matter to the Government?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend never said anything of the sort. I do not know the circumstances of that particular hospital, but I shall look into them. However, as I said, the overall national figures show a reduction in the number of doctors working more than 56 hours a week.

The one group of people from whom we shall take no lessons on the health service is the Conservative party. We are making up for 18 years of failure by the Conservative Government. Yes, it will take time to get the hospitals built and the technology in, and to get more doctors and nurses into the health service, but we shall get there because, unlike the Conservative party, we believe in the health service.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): As a former inspector for the Office for Standards in Education, I welcome today's Ofsted report on improving standards in our primary schools. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the work of good teachers and the Government's introduction of the national literacy and numeracy hours have brought about the improvements that are benefiting our children?

The Prime Minister: We were very pleased by the Ofsted results, and I believe that even more dramatic change will come over the next few years, partly because of the literacy and numeracy hours and partly because, although under the previous Government's plans spending was cut by £80 per pupil for the past three years, it will rise over the next three years by £200 per pupil. In addition, class sizes are falling for primary school children, and substantial capital investment will mean new buildings and new computer systems in schools. All that will transform the educational standards of our country.

Q6. [88557] Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Is it fair that some abattoirs in Britain are charged more than £50 an hour for veterinary supervision while others are charged less than £30? Does the Prime Minister recognise the vital role of small abattoirs, and that damage would be done to the rural economy if they were forced to close? Will he intervene personally to ensure that small abattoirs are not driven out of business by wholly disproportionate and unaffordable Government-imposed meat inspection charges?

The Prime Minister: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. Charging requirements were introduced in 1995, and they have caused a lot of concern to smaller abattoirs, although I understand that not all small abattoirs pay higher charges than larger ones because inspection charges reflect the cost of providing the service to each premises. However, we are reviewing the charges to ensure that they are fair and sustainable, and the results of that review will be announced in due course. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's comments will be taken into account.

Q7. [88558] Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe (Bradford, South): I recently met representatives of the large Serbian community in my constituency who were angered and upset by the tarnishing of the proud name of Serbia. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, rather than wasting money on an inquiry into the Kosovo conflict, the Government should spend more money and more time on support for the growing opposition in Serbia? Would that not prove that the conflict was conducted not against the Serbian people but against Milosevic and his actions?

The Prime Minister: I cannot emphasise too strongly that the conflict was not aimed against the Serbian people, whose second world war heroism we remember well. I hope that people in Serbia recognise that a democratic Serbia, rid of Milosevic, would have a bright future, and that it could be part of the new Balkans that we want. The whole region is less stable while Milosevic remains, and it is in the interests of the Serbian people and the whole region that he should be removed.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Does the Prime Minister personally guarantee that no grammar school will close under the Government?

The Prime Minister: It is not for me to guarantee that. As a result of our proposals, the power to decide lies in the hands of parents.

Mr. Hague: It is a pity that it is not for the Prime Minister to guarantee that. Two years ago, during the Wirral, South by-election, he wrote a letter to parents, saying:

"Let me put the record straight. A Labour Government will not close your grammar schools. That is my personal guarantee."

Now, however, campaigns to close grammar schools are run by Labour party activists, and he is the leader of the Labour party. Has the warranty expired on his guarantee, or just on what is left of his principles? My personal guarantee is that I will campaign against his party to save the grammar schools. Will he join me?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is talking complete nonsense, because the Labour Government are not closing grammar schools. At present, the power to close a grammar school lies with the local education authority. The decision then goes to the Secretary of State. Our legislation takes it out of the hands of the local education authority and puts it in the hands of the parents. The party that closed more grammar schools in Britain than any other was the Conservative party.

Mr. Hague: Even if the Prime Minister is not motivated by conviction to help the grammar schools, one would think that he would at least be motivated by shame, because, when the Labour party made that election promise, it lied to people. Is it not time that, instead of hypocrisy, the Prime Minister called off members of the Labour party from destroying some of the best schools in the country, or is it that even he now has no respect for the promises that he made?

The Prime Minister: I repeat to the right hon. Gentleman that, as he knows perfectly well, the Labour Government have not closed a single grammar school. We have no power to close grammar schools. As I explained a moment ago, the power used to vest in local education authorities; it now vests in parents. It is a decision to be made by parents. So far, they have not chosen to close any grammar school so, I suggest that, rather than raising scare stories, the right hon. Gentleman concentrates on the difference between the Government's education achievements and those of our predecessors. This Government are putting money into all our schools, because we want not just some, but all, our children to get a decent education. As I pointed out a moment ago, the previous Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Cabinet Minister, capped spending per pupil by £80 for all school children. We are raising it by £200 per pupil. That is the difference between a Conservative Government for the few and a Labour Government for the many.

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Govan): Is my right hon. Friend aware that 1,200 jobs at Kvaerner in Govan are under serious threat? The people of Scotland, my constituents and the work force at Govan shipyard are looking to the Government to do everything in their power to save those jobs. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the Government will provide all the necessary support to the work force, who are campaigning with passion, dignity and self-respect to secure those jobs?

The Prime Minister: They certainly are campaigning with passion and dignity. As my hon. Friend knows, we have set up a task force specifically to try to secure the future of the Kvaerner yard. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is to meet the shop stewards and the task force this afternoon to see how we can plot a way forward for the shipyard. Everyone knows that those skills are valuable to Scotland and to the United Kingdom and we shall do all that we can to keep them.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): Does the Prime Minister agree with Birmingham's chief education officer, Professor Tim Brighouse, that his Government's abolition of the assisted places scheme has widened social divisions in education?

The Prime Minister: No. If he said that, I comprehensively disagree with him. As a result of abolishing the assisted places scheme and putting the money into reducing class sizes in primary schools, by September there will be about 240,000 fewer five, six and seven-year-olds in classes of over 30 pupils. I believe that that it is important not that we subsidise some children to get a good education, but that we provide a good education for all our children.

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement this morning of £650 million-worth of private finance initiative investment and contracts in the national health service. In my constituency and in Derby, South and Derby city, the £177 million-worth of investment that will bring together acute services, possibly on one site, will enhance and improve health care in southern Derbyshire. In addition—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House is getting very impatient because the hon. Gentleman is not putting a question. This is the first time that he has had the opportunity to put a question to the Prime Minister, and the House should be tolerant—but do put your question now, Mr. Laxton.

Mr. Laxton: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Does my right hon. Friend agree, that for the very first time in the city of Derby, a community hospital will be created on an existing site and that it is a much-needed—and will be a much-valued—facility?

The Prime Minister: I agree. My hon. Friend is entirely right. Not only will there be a community hospital, but, as a result of the contract that has been announced today, all the acute services for the people of Derby will be on one site, so people will not have to go to different places to get acute service care. Our experience with the private finance initiative is that it delivers the contracts on cost and on time. The previous Government promised all the hospitals, but never started or delivered them.

Q9. [88560] Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells): Is the Prime Minister aware that, despite all the hype that we have heard about hospital PFIs, the people of west Kent and East Sussex are in despair over the failure to reinvest in one of the most decrepit acute hospital facilities in the country? What hope can he offer them? Why has every one of the major investments in the NHS announced in the past 24 months been in a Labour-held constituency?

The Prime Minister: Well, there are rather a lot of Labour-held constituencies. The hon. Gentleman talks about the decrepit hospital in his constituency. Does he really believe that it has become decrepit in two years? The problems in the health service are of long standing. We are making a start on putting them right. We are getting new hospitals built, and new doctors and nurses, but it will take time. I say to his constituents what I would say to anybody in the country: if they want the health service rebuilt, they should look not to the people who ran it down for 18 years, but to the Government, who believe in it.

Mrs. Christine Butler (Castle Point): Will my right hon. Friend congratulate nursery teachers, teachers and head teachers in my constituency on the enormous work that they have put into early-years development and numeracy and literacy hours in the primary sector? By this September, there will be fewer than 30 pupils in all classes of five, six and seven-year-olds, and there is enormous expansion in early-years education throughout my constituency. Does he look forward to the next Ofsted report, which will mark even greater strides forward in raising standards in basic skills in the primary sector?

The Prime Minister: When we came to office, half a million five, six and seven-year-olds were in classes with more than 30 pupils, education funding was being cut and almost half our 11-year-olds were leaving primary school without proper literacy and numeracy skills. We are getting class sizes down and improving literacy and numeracy, which will mean a better-educated and more prosperous country for the future.

Q10. [88561] Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Britain's dairy farmers are in crisis, owing to the Government's failure to assist them over matters connected with the reform of the common agricultural policy, bovine tuberculosis and the lowest milk prices in Europe. When members of Milk Marque want to tackle that problem by investing in more dairy production capacity, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry appears to rule out farmers doing something to help themselves. Will the Prime Minister ask the Secretary of State to reconsider the matter and ensure that our dairy farmers can invest in themselves?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, the Secretary of State has to take into account the recommendations of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, and the right hon. Gentleman would expect that. I understand his claim that we should put Government money into the dairy sector. [Interruption.] I am sorry, but dairy farmers will invest in the sector only on the basis that they have set out, which is contrary to the MMC report. If the Government failed to take account of the MMC report and ignored it, many consumers would rightly be angry with us. We will listen to the concerns of the dairy industry, but we also have to act on the recommendations of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. We would be wrong to ignore them.

Libya

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on relations with Libya. I am grateful to the Opposition for agreeing—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. This is an important statement. Those hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber must please do so quietly and quickly, as those who are remaining want to hear the statement.

Mr. Cook: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You anticipated me, as I was saying that I was grateful to the Opposition for agreeing to this important statement being made on a Supply day.

For over a decade, two separate issues have prevented us from maintaining normal diplomatic relations with Libya. One of those was the refusal by Libya to hand over the two men charged with responsibility for the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie. As the House will be aware, the diplomatic stalemate over this issue was broken by our initiative in offering a trial under Scottish law in the Netherlands. Intensive and patient diplomacy produced an agreement by Libya in April to hand over both suspects. The two accused are currently held in the court complex at Camp Zeist, where we expect their trial to commence early next year. This will give the relatives of those who died and the public their first opportunity to hear all the evidence that we hold.

United Nations sanctions were imposed on Libya in 1992 as a result of its refusal to comply with the investigations into the Lockerbie bombing and the parallel UTA case. Following the surrender of the two accused, UN sanctions on Libya have been suspended.

However, diplomatic relations between Libya and the United Kingdom had already been broken off before the Lockerbie bombing. They ceased in 1984 when we broke off diplomatic relations over the refusal by Libya to co-operate with the investigation into the killing of WPC Yvonne Fletcher, who was shot while carrying out her duties in front of the Libyan People's Bureau in St. James's Square.

In the weeks since the handover of the two Lockerbie suspects, we have been engaged in repeated exchanges with the Libyan Government in an attempt to secure their co-operation with the police investigation. Throughout these negotiations over some weeks, we have consulted fully with the Metropolitan police and, through them, with the Fletcher family. Earlier this afternoon, I met Mr. Obeidi of the Libyan Government, and we have finalised a joint statement.

In that statement, Libya accepts general responsibility for the actions of those in the Libyan People's Bureau at the time of the shooting. It expresses deep regret to the family of WPC Fletcher for what occurred and offers to pay compensation now to the family. Libya agrees "to participate in and co-operate with the continuing police investigation and to accept its outcome".

I have placed in the Library a full text of the joint statement. It fully meets the objectives pursued by successive British Governments since 1984, and it is supported by the Metropolitan police and the Fletcher family. No amount of payment can ever compensate the Fletcher parents for the loss of their daughter, but the agreement to make compensation now is welcome as a recognition by Libya of its responsibility.

The way is now open for the police to pursue their investigation into the killing of Yvonne Fletcher. That investigation will be pursued as far as it can and we expect Libya to co-operate at all stages of the investigation.

The two agreements that we have secured open the way for us to resume diplomatic relations with Libya. I am upgrading immediately the British interests section in Tripoli to embassy status. We will, as quickly as practical, appoint an ambassador and bring the embassy up to full strength. As a result, the 4,000 or so British citizens who are resident in Libya will have restored to them full consular protection, and we will be able to provide appropriate support to British commercial interests. Full diplomatic representation will also enable us better to monitor Libyan co-operation with the Lockerbie trial and the police investigation into the killing of Yvonne Fletcher.

Today's announcement brings to an end 15 years throughout which relations between our two countries were suspended. I should like to thank the Government of Italy for their assistance throughout those years as the protecting power of British interests in Libya.

I ask the House again to pay tribute to Yvonne Fletcher, a young woman who gave her life in the service of law and order. Her family have suffered not only her loss, but the added pain of 15 years in which its investigation has been blocked. They have borne it with dignity and fortitude. I express on behalf of the whole House our deep sympathy to them. I hope that the agreement that we have secured today will open the way for them to learn more about what happened on that fateful day.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I thank the Foreign Secretary for his kind words and his courtesy in providing advance notification of today's joint statement. Both the last Conservative Government and the present Labour Government have striven to reach this point. On behalf of the official Opposition, I therefore welcome the progress in Anglo-Libyan relations that is contained in the declaration, which, in effect, restores normal diplomatic relations between our two countries.

It has always been our view that Libya should express regret about, and accept responsibility for, the appalling murder of WPC Yvonne Fletcher, as well as co-operating in the investigation into her murder. The Foreign Secretary has announced that the investigation will be pursued. To what degree can he expect co-operation from Libya to identify the murderer? Does he believe that the murderer will now be brought to justice? If so, will he confirm that the procedures that are in place for the trial of the Lockerbie suspects could be used to try any person who is accused of her murder?

The relatives of those killed in the bombing of Pan Am 103 will follow developments closely. What discussions has the Foreign Secretary had with those relatives, and what has been their reaction to the compensation to Yvonne Fletcher's family, which is symbolic of the guilt of Libya?

[Mrs. Cheryl Gillan]

The Foreign Secretary has referred to United Nations sanctions against Libya, which are only suspended, not lifted. Does he intend to press for sanctions to be lifted? Has he had an opportunity to discuss that with the United States Government?

There has been undisputed evidence of Libyan support for terrorists, particularly the IRA. Will the Foreign Secretary assure the House that all training of terrorists and material support to terrorists has now been stopped, including support to rebel groups in west Africa?

On the future, and the restored links between our two countries, will the Foreign Secretary clarify the status of the business delegation that has been proposed by the British Libyan business group? There was some confusion, I understand, between his Department and the Department of Trade and Industry earlier this week. Does that delegation now have his support?

We welcome the fact that the 4,000 British citizens who are working in Libya will now have British consular protection. Conservative Members hope that the restoration of full diplomatic ties will prove to be a turning point in our relations with Libya and in Libya's relations with the rest of the world. Libya will be watched very closely.

Finally, we are pleased that the outcome has the endorsement of the Fletcher family. I join the Foreign Secretary in paying tribute to them and to Yvonne Fletcher. Even now, although we are moving on to the next chapter, I do not believe that anyone in this House will forget the brave WPC who, in doing her duty, paid with her life.

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her approach to this issue and I very much welcome the sentiments expressed in her closing remarks, which are shared by hon. Members throughout the House. The hon. Lady asked a number of questions and I will try to respond to them all as briefly as possible.

First, we expect Libya to honour its commitment to co-operate fully with the police investigation at all stages. That must include the final stage if any individual is identified by the police.

I do not think that it would be feasible or helpful to wrap up any proceedings with the trial that has been set up for the Lockerbie bombing. That was set up under the Security Council resolution that refers only to that bombing. In any case, there is the difficult question of jurisdiction. We have already managed to achieve legal history by carrying out a trial under Scottish jurisdiction in the Netherlands. We could not extend that to include English jurisdiction because of the killing of Yvonne Fletcher.

On the relatives of those involved in the Pan Am bombing, I assure the House that we contacted them in advance of the statement to inform them that we intended, in the light of the agreement, to resume diplomatic relations with Libya. Among British relatives of those who died, we are not aware of any dissent from the course of action that we propose to take. As the House will know, they warmly welcomed the initiative that we took to secure the trial.

On United Nations sanctions, those are suspended to all intents and purposes. When we reached agreement on the Lockerbie trial we undertook that if the Secretary-General reported that Libya had complied with the Security Council resolutions of 1992, Britain would support the lifting of sanctions. That remains our position. The Secretary-General has not yet been able conclusively to say so, but when he does we will support the lifting of sanctions.

On Libyan participation in terrorism, I refer the House to what is said in the joint statement that I have placed in the Library. In that statement, Libya condemns terrorism and pledges to co-operate in the international fight against it. The very clear statement that we have secured amounts to the renunciation of terrorism, which has been sought repeatedly in the past decade and has on previous occasions been volunteered by Libya. With our new diplomatic channels in Libya, we will do everything that we can to ensure that both countries fight against the support of terrorism.

On the British Libyan business group, the proposal for that visit was first put to the Government in May. Both the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign Office took exactly the same position. The standard position of Governments throughout the years since 1984 has been that we will neither support nor discourage trade missions. That was the view that was clearly expressed to that group. Last week, when it became clear that we were getting close to an agreement, both the DTI and the Foreign Office relaxed our comments on the trip. I understand that the business visit is proceeding at present.

That is now history. As a result of the agreement that we have secured today and of the strengthening of diplomatic channels, we are in a position properly to support commercial interests and trading missions for the future.

Finally, I welcome the hon. Lady's welcome for the agreement that we have secured today. It marks a significant step forward. For the first time, Libya has acknowledged responsibility for what happened on that day. Libya has also offered compensation from the Libyan authorities, as opposed to an ex gratia payment without the acceptance of responsibility. Libya has for the first time given a commitment to take part in the police investigation and to accept its outcome. All those four points are substantial steps forward and give us a firm basis on which we can proceed to normalise our diplomatic relations.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Having had various Adjournment debates on the tragic death of WPC Fletcher, I pay tribute to the courage and dignity displayed throughout by Queenie Fletcher, her husband and family. May I clarify something that seems unclear? In his statement, the Foreign Secretary said that "general responsibility" had been accepted by the Libyans for the actions at the time—I think that those were his words. The Opposition spokesman talked in terms of Libyan guilt. Will my right hon. Friend clarify whether the Libyans have accepted guilt? As I understand it, the testimony that was given on film by Huw Thomas, formerly the surgeon in Belfast, by George Stiles, the senior ballistics expert of the British Army, and by Professor Bernard Knight, the Home Office pathologist, at least raises questions.

I pay tribute also to David Veness and his colleagues, whom I went to see in Scotland yard. I see the Home Secretary nodding. Indeed, I pay tribute to my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Foreign and Home Offices for the seriousness with which they have tackled this issue. Could there be clarification on the issue of responsibility and exactly what the Libyans have accepted?

I should like to ask a final question of which I gave the Foreign Office notice once the statement went up on the Board. Are there likely to be, along the lines suggested by Professor Robert Black, the educational and cultural exchanges that are yearned for?

Mr. Cook: When Mr. Obeidi called on me earlier today, he expressed voluntarily his appreciation of Britain's acceptance of a large number of students from Libya to study in Britain. Even under present circumstances, 500 students from Libya are attending full-time courses in Britain. I very much hope that, with the normalisation of diplomatic relations, we will be able to intensify that base, which is already strong. I assure my hon. Friend that I should imagine that the new ambassador will want to give high priority to promoting cultural exchanges where appropriate.

My hon. Friend mainly focused on the question of guilt. Guilt is of course a particularly narrow term, which identifies the criminal responsibility of an individual or individuals. We are dealing with the acceptance of responsibility by a whole Government for the action of their agents. In that sense, the statement that I have placed in the Library, which hon. Members may examine, is quite explicit. Libya acknowledges the verdict of the coroner's court that the bullet was fired from within the Libyan People's Bureau, and accepts general responsibility for those who were in the bureau at the time. That is a satisfactory acceptance of responsibility. The issue of individual guilt is one for the police investigation.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I thank the Foreign Secretary for his statement and for allowing us to have sight of it before he announced it in the Commons. We of course welcome the resumption of diplomatic relations with Libya and the terms of the agreement. That is very good news. We send sympathy to WPC Fletcher's family for what must have been terrible times for them.

Although we accept that the negotiations must have been difficult and sensitive, does the right hon. Gentleman understand the desire of British business not to lose out on trade to its competitors? Does he realise the confusion that surrounded the trip to Libya organised by the British Libyan business group this week? Will he reaffirm that, now that the agreement has been reached, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign Office will get their act together and give a clear signal and support to British companies?

Mr. Cook: I am happy to agree with the hon. Lady on what she says in respect of the Fletcher family. They will appreciate that those in all quarters of the House have expressed sympathy and support for their conduct over the past 15 years and the trial that that must have been to them.

I say bluntly to the House that the Government have nothing to apologise for on the question of the British Libyan business group. The visit was proposed in May, when we had only commenced discussions on whether we could reach a resolution of the matter of the killing of WPC Fletcher. It would have been quite wrong for the Government at that stage to encourage a parliamentary visit when we were still unable to get agreement from Libya on this question. Indeed, if we had done so, we would have been subject to much greater criticism in the House. There has been no confusion between the two Departments. Both Departments took that view in May and last week both decided that the time had come to relax it.

One consequence of that outcome is that we shall be better placed to support trade missions and our commercial interests. That is not why we sought the agreement. We sought it to do justice to the memory of Yvonne Fletcher. We sought an agreement on the Lockerbie bombing to take the course of justice forward. However, we should not regret the fact that one consequence of the agreements is that we shall be able to compete on equal terms with our trading partners in Libya.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that when I was shadow Home Secretary it was my responsibility to attend the siege of St. James's square, when a leafy part of central London was turned into a killing field, and that I later represented our party at the unveiling of a memorial to WPC Fletcher there? Is he further aware that when I was shadow Foreign Secretary it was intimated to me that if I were to travel to Libya, compensation for WPC Fletcher would be handed over to me, but I decided that it would not be acceptable to do that because we did not have diplomatic relations with Libya and because a behind-the-door approach to dealing with the problem would not entail Libya accepting responsibility, which it has now done? While we shall continue to mourn for WPC Fletcher, we have now seen a country that was outside the rule of international law voluntarily return within the rule of international law. Other countries, including Iraq, should pay attention to that.

Mr. Cook: I am well aware of the part that my right hon. Friend played at the time. This morning I re-read his observations in the House of Commons at the time of the original statement. I am also well aware of the monument to which he refers, as it is within walking distance of my official residence and I have passed it many times. We should all recognise that we would not do justice to the memory of Yvonne Fletcher by allowing the matter to continue in abeyance without attempting to find a way of resolving it and taking it forward. The agreement that we have secured today is a good way of trying to establish the truth and making sure that, in honour of Yvonne Fletcher and the pain of her family, we can take forward our relations with Libya. I agree with my right hon. Friend that there is a message in what has happened. Even Governments who have put themselves outside the circle of acceptable international relations can be brought back in. The more we succeed in doing that, the more we shall be able to offer security to people around the world.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Does the Secretary of State agree that an apology is not a new development? Many years ago, shortly after the tragic death of Yvonne Fletcher, the Libyans offered a personal apology, accepting responsibility and offering a payment to a police charity rather than to the family. By responsibility, did the Libyan authorities—Mr. Obeidi—in particular, say specifically that they accepted that the bullet came from within the embassy? That is desperately important, in view of the right hon. Gentleman's answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). My understanding is that in all previous statements the Libyan authorities did not imply that.

I greatly appreciate the initiative that the Foreign Secretary has taken, as compared with what has happened in the past. Will he take every possible step to ensure that the agreed rules and safeguards in the trial at The Hague are carefully observed, particularly in view of the reports of one or two incidents over the past few days? Will he do all in his power to make sure that the safeguards that he offered are applied?

Mr. Cook: I assure the House that, as well as the Foreign Secretary, there will be a number of Scottish trial judges present who will certainly wish to insist on proper rules of procedure. I have every confidence in their doing so. On the custody of the two accused, I gently say to the House, without divulging the details, that the reported breach of security was of a minor and technical character. I remain confident of the security arrangements that we have prepared at Camp Zeist.

The hon. Gentleman asked to what extent the agreement was an advance on previous offers. I acknowledge that, in 1991, he obtained an offer of payment from Libya. The agreement that we have secured during these discussions goes further than that in the following ways. First, the offer in 1991 was for an ex gratia payment which was to be channelled, not directly to the Fletcher family, but through the police fund. This agreement is for something that is described explicitly as compensation and goes directly to the Fletcher family. It recognises the greater extent to which Libya now accepts responsibility for the killing of WPC Fletcher.

Secondly, in the text of our agreement, Libya agrees to co-operate with the police investigation and to accept its outcome, which is specifically stated. Whatever other facts may emerge from further police investigation, I do not think that anybody, including Libya, can be in any doubt that the police investigation will confirm the coroner's verdict that the bullet was fired from within the Libyan People's Bureau. I welcome this step forward. It has enabled us to make progress in our relations, but I must tell the hon. Gentleman and the House, that this represents a significant step forward in agreements that we have been able to secure from Libya so far.

Mr. Roger Casale (Wimbledon): I join hon. Members in welcoming the restoration of diplomatic links with Libya. On behalf of the British-Italian parliamentary group, of which I am chairman, I join the Foreign Secretary in paying tribute to the work of the Italian Government in protecting British interests in the intervening years. Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the forthcoming British-Italian summit offers a good opportunity for our Government to renew their commitment and support for Italian initiatives within the common foreign and security procedures and other mechanisms to create an area of freedom, security and justice across the Mediterranean?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend draws attention to what I believe is a new development in our relations, the British-Italian summit, which we will be hosting in Britain shortly. It will give us an unprecedented opportunity to take forward a number of the wider European issues.

I take this opportunity to echo the appreciation that my hon. Friend has given to the Italian Government for acting as our protecting power. In fairness to the Government of Italy, I do not think that they understood at the time how long that commitment might last, but, throughout those 15 years, they have never resiled from their commitment to act as our partner and friend within Libya. My friend and colleague, Lamberto Dini, was also helpful in interceding with Libya in part of the negotiations over the Lockerbie trial. I have written to him this week giving him advance notice of this statement and thanking him for all the help that Italy has given us over the years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): The right hon. Gentleman has told us that the Libyan Government will co-operate with the investigation and abide by the outcome. It would be helpful if he could tell the House what is meant by that. Are potential witnesses to be questioned by officers of the Metropolitan constabulary? Are potential witnesses to come to the United Kingdom for that purpose or are officers of the Metropolitan force to go to Libya? If there is a prima facie case against one or more individuals, will they, if necessary, waive diplomatic immunity and submit themselves for trial in the United Kingdom courts?

The House will know that the Libyan Government provided large quantities of arms to the IRA. Will the Foreign Secretary tell the House whether the Libyan Government are proposing to set up a fund to compensate the families of those murdered by those arms?

Mr. Cook: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his questions. I remind him that Libya's support for the IRA was dealt with by the Government of whom he was a member in 1995. That Government then said that they were generally satisfied with Libya's response and the information it had provided on previous links with the IRA. That Government regarded the matter as closed and I do not have a basis on which to seek to reopen it.

On diplomatic immunity, if I recall correctly, in 1984 the previous Government contested the right of those in the bureau at the time to demand diplomatic immunity and we would not seek to change such a view. The investigation is a matter squarely within the hands of the Metropolitan police. I can only tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the House that they have fully supported this statement and will be making their own statement of welcome today. Of course, a commitment to co-operate with the investigation must, by definition, mean making witnesses available for interview. I hope that that will take place. If it does not, we will remind the Libyan Government of their commitment.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): I think that we should readily seize this window of opportunity to redevelop the historic relationship that we had with Libya before these recent difficult times. In that light, may I take my right hon. Friend back to the issue of the Inter-Parliamentary Union? Is he prepared personally to raise with the executive of the IPU the need to bring in a delegation of parliamentarians from Libya, so that they can mix with those here and recognise that, here in this Parliament, there are friends of Libya who want to put all these matters behind us as soon as possible?

Mr. Cook: I absolutely concur with my hon. Friend. If we are to have successful diplomatic relations it is important that they do not consist merely of Government-to-Government contacts, but include contacts between our peoples, our cultures and our Parliaments. I am well aware from my experience in several countries around the world that contact between parliamentarians is an extremely useful parallel to my discussions with Ministers.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I join in congratulating the Foreign Secretary on the report, especially on the reference to co-operation in dealing with terrorism. As one who understands how a family feels when a serving member of a police service suffers and is killed, my sympathy goes out to the Fletcher family, and I am delighted that that chapter is closing.

However, in his response to the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), the right hon. Gentleman said that the previous Government had accepted Libya's earlier explanations about Semtex. I ask that that issue be kept open and that contacts continue to be made. It may be that we shall all have to face again the use of Semtex, either on the mainland or in Northern Ireland, so it would be helpful to know about sources and movers, so that they might be brought to justice.

Mr. Cook: If an occasion arises when it would be useful to seek information from the Government of Libya in that context, we would certainly do so. After today's statement and with the resumption of direct representation in Tripoli, we are better placed to do so. The previous Government noted that there were some omissions from the information provided in 1995, although it was generally satisfactory. I agree that, if further information can be useful in our fight against terrorism, it is open to us to go to the Libyans and seek their assistance.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): As a Back Bencher who has followed the difficulties between this country and Libya over many years, I congratulate the Foreign Secretary most warmly on his statement to the House this afternoon. I believe that objectives that are satisfactory to all the parties involved have been achieved, which might indicate that Libya is once again re-entering the civilised world.

Will the Foreign Secretary answer this direct question, which is of the utmost importance: does he believe that the agreement with Libya delivers a kick in the teeth or a blow to international terrorism, and that it may deprive international terrorism of supplies of weapons, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth)? Would not such a blow to international terrorism be to the benefit of the world as whole?

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman echoes a point put to me earlier by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), which is that the more we embrace countries in the fight against terrorism, the more we isolate those countries that are prepared to support terrorism. One of the issues that have brought Libya to the present agreement is that it has become conscious that it, too, can be a victim of terrorism, and that it is in the interests of all of us to fight terrorism together with equal determination.

I have been informed that the Metropolitan police investigation will initially be carried out through written commission interrogatories. Those will include requests for written witness statements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): I join in welcoming what the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues have achieved. Those who have kept the flowers at Yvonne Fletcher's memorial in St. James's square will understand the various considerations and the progress that have made his statement possible. Doubt remains in respect of diplomatic immunity: we do not believe that the people in the Libyan People's Bureau had it, but, if it is claimed, can it be waived by the individual who is charged, or can it be waived only by a Government?

On a broader point, does the Foreign Secretary understand that Governments and people opposed to Governments or people with political causes will continue to believe that London is a place where they can get publicity and public attention by committing the sort of violence that we witnessed at the Iranian embassy, the Libyan People's Bureau, the Israeli embassy and elsewhere? Will he confirm the continuing promise of British Governments that there will be an intensity and a persistence in pursuing those who use London as one of the world's killing fields so that people will not expect to get away with it?

Mr. Cook: I can certainly give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that the Government will do everything possible to combat terrorism here and abroad. Britain has had too sad and too much experience of terrorism at first hand not to understand the importance to other Governments of our assisting them wherever it is possible to do so within the law in their fight against terrorism. I fully agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point.

I, too, have noticed that the flowers at the memorial to WPC Yvonne Fletcher have remained throughout the 15 years, and I am sure that they will continue to do so. They are a mark of the esteem in which she was held by her friends and colleagues. It is important that if we close this chapter, we do so in a way that does justice to what happened to her.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Are those suspected of the murder of WPC Fletcher resident in a country with which we have an extradition treaty? If so, will the authorities apply for her extradition? If they are not, what does the Foreign Secretary propose to do?

Mr. Cook: It is a bit premature at the start of the police investigation to identify those who may or may not be charged with individual responsibility for WPC Fletcher's murder. We have no extradition treaty with Libya. That has been precisely at the heart of our difficulty in the past 10 years in the case of the Lockerbie bombing, which we have now resolved through negotiation. I cannot anticipate what action will be open to us in the event that the police investigation concludes that charges can be brought.

Speaker's Statement

4.6 pm

Madam Speaker: I have to acquaint the House that I have received the following letter from Mr. Peter Jennings, our Serjeant at Arms:

"I write to confirm that I wish to retire on 31 December this year, when I shall be 60.

I have been highly privileged to serve the House for over 22 years, most recently in a senior capacity. I would like to thank all members of the House staff, particularly those in my Department who have so ably helped me to discharge my duties. I also include the Metropolitan Police Division whose staff provide security here and the Post Office staff who provide our mail services. It has been enormously rewarding to lead such a dedicated and diverse team and see how all those involved in it have developed to meet the ever increasing demands placed on them to meet the Departmental objective of providing 'the best possible service'.

May I finally record my appreciation for the many kindnesses shown to me during my time here and particularly for all the support which you personally have given me during my time as Serjeant."

There will be an occasion to pay formal tributes in due course. Meanwhile, consultations on the recommendation for a successor to Mr. Jennings are taking place through the House of Commons Commission.

Points of Order

4.6 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I raise with you the issue that arose in Welsh questions today, especially on Question 3 from my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence). The question was when the Secretary of State for Wales next intended to meet the Assembly Secretary responsible for agriculture. I did not quite catch all of my right hon. Friend's reply, but it appeared that he said that it was a matter for the Assembly. You subsequently intervened and said that we therefore could not continue to question him.

It is patently not a matter for the Assembly what action the Secretary of State for Wales in this House does or does not take. It is surely open to my right hon. Friend as Secretary of State for Wales to seek a meeting of any kind. As he is accountable to this House, we are entitled to ask him about such meetings.

The question was put to the Table Office and approved. I hope that you will give us a ruling that a question such as Question 3 will be perfectly in order in future Welsh Question Times and that future Welsh Secretaries of State can come to this House and answer questions.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) rose—

Madam Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman wishes to make a similar point of order.

Sir Patrick Cormack: We realise that, after 1 July, with devolution, we are entering uncharted waters. We are grateful to you for the guidance that you gave the House this afternoon, but, as the Welsh Assembly does not have primary legislative or tax-raising powers, Members of this House will obviously wish to ask questions and hold Ministers properly to account. I wonder whether you would be kind enough to give some thought to this matter, and to give some guidance to the Table Office so that inappropriate questions are not allowed on the Order Paper and so that all those that do appear on the Order Paper can be pursued.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I come to this matter as a Member of the National Assembly as well, and questions have arisen as to what competence lies where. Will you discuss the implications of this matter informally with representatives of the parties—and, perhaps, with the usual channels—so that we can have some convention, whereby we know where responsibility lies?

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. If money is voted by Parliament, on what basis can there be any restriction on asking a Secretary of State questions on the use of those moneys?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asked for a ruling, and I am always prepared to give a ruling. On more than one occasion today, I heard a Minister of the Crown say at the Dispatch Box that, as of 1 July, matters had been devolved; therefore, it was not possible for the House to trespass on matters that are the responsibility of the Welsh Assembly. Of course there are bound to be some problems when such changes are being made. I thought that I had had proper discussions with the Department concerned, and with the Table Office. Obviously, we have a long way to go to bring about improvements. However, the House can be sure that I shall use my best endeavours to see that the matters are dealt with efficiently and properly at Question Time in future.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Could I have a written, considered response to the question I asked of you—namely, the question of moneys voted by Parliament?

Madam Speaker: Certainly. I shall look at the precise wording of the hon. Gentleman's question and see that he gets a written response.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful for your initial response, Madam Speaker. However, my point is narrow and specific. Question 3 was about whether the Secretary of State for Wales would seek a meeting with X, Y or Z. That is a matter for the Secretary of State for Wales, who must be accountable and answerable to this House. I should have thought it possible for us to say that such a question was in order because it related directly to the activities of the Secretary of State, who is answerable to this House.

Madam Speaker: I understand, and am sympathetic to, the hon. Gentleman's point, but I repeat what I said earlier. If a Minister of the Crown tells the House that an issue has been devolved, it is for that Minister of the Crown to know whether it is devolved or not. I cannot intervene on that. I am trying to be helpful, and I will look at the matter to see that we run smoothly in future.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A few moments ago, the Prime Minister, in answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), said that the number of junior doctors working more than 56 hours had fallen to 4,800, but we had established that the figure was 8,500—

Madam Speaker: Order. Points of order are matters with which I can deal. I am not a statistician—I do not know the figures. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to correct the Prime Minister, he must do so by means of the Order Paper and other questions, and not by means of a point of order.

Dr. Harris rose—

Madam Speaker: Is there a point of order for me as Speaker?

Dr. Harris: Yes.

Madam Speaker: Then I shall hear it.

Dr. Harris: What is the procedure for asking the Prime Minister to come back and reassure the House that if he has inadvertently misled—

Madam Speaker: Order. I thought that I had just explained that if the hon. Gentleman feels that the answer was not full enough or informative enough—or even if he feels that it might have been incorrect—there is an Order Paper by which he can put written or oral questions to the Prime Minister, or to the Minister with that portfolio. That is the way to proceed.

Sir Patrick Cormack: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am grateful for your response to the points of order on Welsh Questions. Could you please copy to those involved the letter that you send to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours), and place a copy in the Library?

Madam Speaker: Certainly.

Royal Hospital, Haslar

4.9 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 24, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely, the closure of the intensive care unit at the Royal Hospital, Haslar, in my constituency.

Since the Ministry of Defence announced in December its intention to close the only remaining military hospital, the whole area has been united in its determination to reverse the decision. There are two reasons for that. First, the area has the strongest defence links, and those who serve in the defence medical services and those who care for our defences are distraught that the announcement, which has already led to the resignation of 15 consultants, will have a devastating effect on defence medical services and on our defence forces generally.

Secondly, Gosport will lose its main hospital with superb facilities, on which £35 million has been spent in the past 10 years. The most emotive aspect is the fact that Gosport will lose its accident and emergency cover. There is absolutely no doubt that lives will be lost in ambulances on the congested roads between Gosport and the remaining local hospitals, if the accident and emergency unit at Haslar should close.

We heard this morning that the intensive care unit at Haslar is to close shortly because of lack of staff. The announcement could have been made last Thursday when we had a meeting with all those concerned, including the head of the Defence Secondary Care Agency. The announcement might have been made on Monday, when the Minister for the Armed Forces appeared before the Select Committee on Defence with all his staff to answer concerns about defence medical services. However, the matter was left for us to discover today.

This is the latest chapter in a sad story of botch and bungle. The Ministry of Defence failed properly to consult with the national health service before announcing the hospital closure. Caught out, Ministers at the Department of Health have given repeated promises that medical care will not deteriorate after the closure of Haslar hospital, but of course it will. It cannot do otherwise.

Words cannot express the anger and frustration felt by my constituents in the face of this terrible blow to their health care. I therefore ask for the House to adjourn to allow full debate on the matter, which is of such importance to defence medical services and to all people in the area.

Madam Speaker: I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said, and of course I must give my decision without stating any reasons. I am afraid that I do not consider the matter to be appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 24. I therefore cannot submit the application to the House.

BILL PRESENTED

RAILWAYS

Mr. Secretary Prescott, supported by the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Straw, Mr. Secretary Byers, Mr. Secretary Reid, Mr. Secretary Michael, Mrs. Helen Liddell and Ms Glenda Jackson, presented a Bill to establish the Strategic Rail Authority and make other provision about railways: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 133].

Empty Homes

4.17 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for reducing the incidence of vacant dwellings; to extend the duties and powers of local authorities to that end; to require local authorities to publish empty homes strategies and to exercise their duties and powers in accordance with those strategies; and for connected purposes.

The Bill is my contribution to stopping the unnecessary building of new homes on green-field sites. We should first make the best use of existing properties standing empty. It is also my contribution to trying to ensure that all our citizens have access to decent homes that they can afford.

I know from a housing development that is taking place in Stafford just how strongly residents feel about new building on open fields on the edges of our towns and cities. Such developments detract from urban regeneration, encroach on our countryside and increase traffic.

According to the written answer to a recent parliamentary question from the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer), there are more than three quarters of a million properties standing empty. That figure has remained fairly constant for years. Six out of every seven of them are privately owned.

The hon. Gentleman also asked why more cannot be done to use existing housing stock, rather than building excessively on green-field land. I agree. I want more to be done, and the Bill represents my ideas for action.

Local authorities have a vital role in helping to bring back into use empty properties that are otherwise up to standard. The best authorities already have empty homes strategies that inform and direct their efforts. In its guidance to local authorities, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions encourages all of them to prepare and publish such strategies. Alas, a recent survey by the Empty Homes Agency of all 354 local authorities in England and Wales revealed that only about half of them have developed a formal strategy.

A good strategy can ensure that policies are based on reliable information about the scale of the problem and the opportunities that exist. It can raise awareness of empty homes as an issue that must be tackled. It can provide for targets and monitoring, and for liaison with housing partners and with residents. Such a strategy can bring together resources and priorities for using them. Help for owners can be made available through renovation grants, and help for people who intend to become tenants can be made available through rent deposit and rent guarantee schemes.

All authorities ought to set targets for reducing the number of empty homes in their areas. They should ensure that full and accurate information is assembled, that all their resources available for meeting the targets are identified and that the actions that will be taken are clearly defined and predictable.

As most of the empty properties are in the private sector, authorities must have comprehensive strategies. They must work with owners, letting agents and housing professionals; they need the support of the public; and they must set a good example by making sure that council houses are fully utilised and do not stand empty in excessive numbers or for excessive periods. Of course, they must also have sufficient powers of persuasion and compulsion, which is where my Bill comes in.

Under the Bill, every local authority would be required to designate an empty homes officer who would be responsible for the work of the council in reducing the number of empty homes. The officer would be important for co-ordinating the work of the council across all departments and between it and other organisations. The officer should have full power to obtain the necessary information from all sources, including council records such as council tax data. Every local authority would be required to prepare and publish an empty homes strategy setting out local housing need and the number of empty homes; the targets for reducing the incidence of homes standing empty; the actions to be taken to reduce the number of empty homes; and how success would be measured.

My Bill would also allow local authorities to vary the council tax payable on properties standing empty, depending on local priorities. I envisage a range from 50 to 200 per cent. of the standard tax. The empty homes strategy would set out the criteria that would be applied to determine what rate would be charged. Currently, we appear to reward owners for keeping property empty. They are entitled to a 50 per cent. discount on their council tax if a property stays empty. Indeed, the Government have recently moved to end an even bigger seal of approval—nil council tax when a property awaiting major renovation work has stood empty for more than a year.

Additionally, my Bill would extend local authorities' power of compulsory purchase to allow them to acquire properties that are kept empty for unacceptable reasons or for an unreasonably long period. Again, the strategy would set out the criteria that the authority would apply in deciding when to exercise that power. I have come across situations in my Stafford constituency in which property stands empty, but the existing powers of compulsory purchase are not wide enough to allow the local authority to step in and buy the property.

We should consider the effects on neighbourhoods and on the immediate environment of properties standing empty for long periods. They become targets for vandalism and a honeypot for crime. They lower the prices of surrounding property and attract fly tipping. Those are all deeply unattractive consequences for other residents. We should consider it socially unacceptable for good homes to be allowed to stand empty, to deteriorate and to bring down standards for neighbours as well.

In introducing the Bill, I thank those who have helped and supported me. The Empty Homes Agency, which is a charity, has given me enormous support through Ashley Horsey, its energetic chief executive and successor to the redoubtable Bob Lawrence. Similarly, the charity Shelter has helped—I should say inspired—me to keep up the pressure for housing policies that give everyone the chance of somewhere decent to live. I also thank the Law Society, which has assisted me with the drafting of my Bill, and of course my supporters, who come from all the main parties.

Will my ideas become law? I am sure that they will. Perhaps it is too late in the Session for the Bill to reach the statute book, but I have high hopes that much good will come of it. Since I proposed it, Lord Rogers has reported on the work of the urban task force. The report looks at the prospects for the Government meeting their target for 60 per cent. of new homes to be built on brown-field sites. I am delighted that all three of my main suggestions—the empty homes strategy, variable council tax and a wider power of compulsory purchase—appear in the 100 recommendations.

The task force has identified empty commercial property in addition to empty homes that could be used to provide homes for people. That raises to 1.3 million the number of homes that could be provided before we turn to new house building to meet the anticipated demand for more homes.

The Government have promised to produce a housing Green Paper later this year, which encourages me to believe that they may also produce a housing Bill. Such a Bill would, of course, be expected to deal with other important issues relating to homelessness, standards of fitness and an adequate supply of social housing; but I hope that the Government will also give careful consideration to my Bill, and to the suggestions that I have made.

Tackling the scandal of empty homes is essential for planning and for social reasons. It is also a priority that I believe would command widespread public support. Most important of all, it will help us to meet real, compelling housing needs.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Kidney, Dr. Vincent Cable, Mr. David Curry, Mrs. Llin Golding, Mr. David Lepper, Mr. Andrew Love, Siobhain McDonagh, Ms Margaret Moran, Mr. Peter Pike and Mr. Jonathan Shaw.

EMPTY HOMES

Mr. David Kidney accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for reducing the incidence of vacant dwellings; to extend the duties and powers of local authorities to that end; to require local authorities to publish empty homes strategies and to exercise their duties and powers in accordance with those strategies; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 23 July, and to be printed [Bill 134].

Opposition Day

[17TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Dairy Industry

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.26 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): I beg to move,

"That this House notes that, since 1st May 1997, the farm gate price of milk has fallen by over a quarter, the price received by farmers for cull cows has fallen by over one third and the income of dairy farmers has collapsed; condemns the Government's failure in recent CAP negotiations to secure any immediate increase in milk quota for mainland Britain whilst conceding increases for other EU countries; deplores the delay in publishing the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on Milk Marque, thus needlessly damaging confidence in the industry; expresses concern that outbreaks of TB have risen substantially; and urges the Government to remedy this crisis by addressing these issues, ending its disgraceful neglect of the dairy industry, strengthening Milk Marque and implementing the Krebs Report without further delay".

I welcome the presence not only of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food but of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. It is rare for not just one but two members of the Cabinet to attend an agriculture debate—although both represent urban seats. [Interruption.] Who knows? Perhaps in a week or two the Government will dredge up someone with a rural seat to speak on these matters.

I shall have a word to say to the Secretary of State in a moment, but I shall start with the Minister. It is almost exactly a year since his appointment to his post, and I think even he would acknowledge that it has been a year of appalling crisis for agriculture. British farmers today face worse conditions than farmers have faced for a generation. Total income from farming has halved since Labour came to power, and the agony has been spread throughout the industry. Cereal prices have fallen by a third, livestock prices by a quarter and milk prices by well over a fifth. Collapsing prices mean collapsing incomes; they mean the destruction of family farms; they mean the loss of jobs in the countryside. There is not much of a new deal there.

Astonishingly, during this year of crisis the Government have not arranged a single agriculture debate. The only debates initiated by them in which the Minister has taken part have been on quarantine and on the Food Standards Bill. Not a moment of Government time has been used to allow Parliament to consider the plight of British farmers. The Minister may be a good listener outside, but he has not been keen to listen to Parliament. I suppose that, in that respect, he is following the example of his leader.

Although the Opposition control only a fraction of parliamentary time, this is the third occasion on which they have raised the problems of farming in a full-scale debate. Sadly, it is all too typical of Labour's attitude to the countryside that it should try to ignore this crisis completely. Labour's contempt for agriculture was exposed in its recent paper "Rural England: a discussion document", which set out the party's so-called vision for the countryside—a vision that occupied a whole page of that rather brief publication. Labour's vision for the countryside includes not a single mention of farming or of farmers.

I think that, to be fair, we can partially exempt the Minister from these criticisms. Occasionally, I have heard him, both inside and outside the House, offering sympathy to farmers. He seems at least to have impressed the Duke of York. Perhaps that is why we read that the Prime Minister is to move the Minister on. Perhaps the Prime Minister fears that, if the Minister were to stay another year, his sympathy might even be turned into action; or his warm words might be matched by some daring deeds; or comparisons between his predecessor's extravagance and his own rather admirably frugal travel and entertainment spending may be causing embarrassment to the Cabinet enforcer.

Today, we shall focus on the dairy sector. In spring 1997, just before the general election, farm gate prices for milk were about 14p per pint. The latest farm gate prices for milk are less than 10p per pint. In the past two years, the value of Britain's milk production has fallen by more than £750 million, and the impact on dairy farmers has been devastating.

Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): The hon. Gentleman mentioned milk prices in spring 1997. Statistics from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food show that, in spring 1997, the price was 11.65p a pint; and that the current price is 9.96p a pint. That is a 10 per cent. decrease. Between July 1995 and the 1997 general election, however, the price per pint fell by a massive 24 per cent.

Mr. Yeo: Unfortunately, the hon. Lady is quoting from exactly the same sheet from the Library as I am. She has chosen—if she cares to tell the whole truth—the April 1997 figure, which was 11.65p per pint. However, at no time in the previous three years—I have the monthly figure for every month of those three years—did the price fall below 13p a pint. In January, February and March 1997, the price was 13.7p, 13.5p and 13.46p per pint. Furthermore, as I said, for the whole of the previous three years, the figure was as I have just quoted it.

If the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) is trying to make a point by so selectively using statistics, I am grateful to her for giving me the opportunity of proving absolutely clearly that the milk price for the whole of the latter period of the previous Government was substantially above even the level that I have quoted.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): It is true that, when the previous Government were in office, farmers complained to me—as they complained to my hon. Friend—about many things. However, the one thing that they never complained about was dairy farming. Dairy farmers did incredibly well under the previous Government.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend must talk to different farmers, because I have never met a farmer of any type who does not complain about something.

The Prime Minister likes talking about hard choices. Unfortunately, when it comes to farming, the choices that Labour makes are hard not for Ministers, but for farmers. Farmers in the dairy sector are used to long hours, but they are now having to get used to small rewards.

[Mr. Yeo]

Earlier this year, the Government had a chance to help dairy farmers. On 11 March, Agriculture Ministers completed their discussions on common agricultural policy reforms. I am sure that the Minister remembers it well—I think it was late at night. According to The Times of the next day, the Prime Minister's spokesman said that the outcome

"is not satisfactory as far as we are concerned".

I think that, for once, we can all agree with him.

The deal proposed that milk quotas—which currently prevent Europe from responding to growing world demand for dairy products—should continue until 2006, and that, although Britain's milk quota should be frozen until 2003, four other countries—Greece, Spain, Ireland and Italy—should enjoy higher milk quota next year. Increased Irish milk quota damages Britain. Imports of dairy products from Ireland will rise, and thereby undermine British dairy farmers. The deal was bad enough, but when the Prime Minister discussed it with Heads of other Governments later that month, they decided that quotas should stay not until 2006 but until 2008.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): May I ask the hon. Gentleman a question that requires a simple answer? Is it the position of the Conservative party that milk quotas should be completely ended?

Mr. Yeo: Yes. The position is clear. We believe that milk quotas cannot continue in the long term if we are to meet World Trade Organisation obligations and if Europe is to take advantage of increasing market opportunities for selling dairy products. Britain cannot continue to be penalised by allowing Ireland an immediate increase in milk quota next year while ours is frozen for four years.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No. The hon. Gentleman has been noticeable by his absence from agriculture debates over the past year. He has had his chance to intervene.

The deal is bad for Britain. We have some of the best dairy-producing land in Europe, but our farmers are prevented from meeting the demand even of home consumers. In recent years, around a third of our butter and cheese requirements have been met by imports. More than 10 per cent. of dairy products are imported. Ireland, by contrast, produces four times the amount of dairy products needed to meet its home demand.

Farmers might have hoped that the Prime Minister would bat for them and for Britain when he negotiated with his European colleagues, but he has bowled them out instead. With his eyes fixed on the headlines that he wanted about Britain's budget rebate, he allowed the deal, which his own spin doctors had already rubbished, to be made even worse. That is new Labour at work. If there is a chance to help the foreign farmer, new Labour take it. If there is a chance to hit the British farmer, new Labour take it. At the very moment the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was telling farmers that he supported them, the Prime Minister was bashing them.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Following his announcement about ending milk quotas, does the hon. Gentleman realise that removing all quota would make the milk price plummet? He would completely flood the market.

Mr. Yeo: That is not necessarily so. Farmers will be allowed to produce where there is local demand. By their nature, milk products do not travel great distances, and transport costs make it uneconomic too. It is not satisfactory that Britain, which has the potential to produce high-quality dairy products, should be forced to import them because of quotas.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman has had his chance. He has shown more interest in agriculture today than over the whole of the previous year.

Labour's common agricultural policy reforms will mean more food imports against which British farmers cannot compete because of quotas. It is no surprise that Labour has not organised a debate about dairy farming. Previous Conservative debates have helped farmers, forcing the Government to act. On 4 November, during an earlier Conservative debate, the Minister heralded an announcement made 12 days later of an emergency aid package for farmers, worth more than £100 million. On 21 April, during our debate on the livestock sector, the Government announced that specified risk material removal charges would be postponed for a year, resulting in an extremely welcome £21 million reduction in the burden on slaughterhouses, even though the high cost of regulation continues to inflict serious damage.

Today, the Government were forced to act even before the debate had started. Yesterday, the long overdue Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on Milk Marque was published. It had been delivered to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 26 February. More than 18 weeks later, the announcement of an Opposition Day debate was required before the report came out. Even the printers thought that it would come out earlier. The title page of my copy has a sticker on it, saying "July 1999"—but it is stuck over the words "June 1999". The publication of the report is welcome, but publication is not enough. So I trust that when the Minister speaks he will have more to offer.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that July was chosen rather than June, which may have been the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's preferred date of publication, because it is well after the European elections; and that spin doctors who were acting in party political interests blocked No. 10 and prevented publication of the report?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend makes a telling point. There is no doubt that the Government realised that the report was likely to produce a hostile reaction in many rural areas where they were afraid of doing even worse than they actually did in the recent elections.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Given that we have had to wait even longer for the publication of the MMC report than we customarily have to wait for the Prime Minister to provide a straight answer to a straight question—specifically, 130 days—does my hon. Friend agree that it will be an additional source of anxiety and damage to the British dairy industry that the Secretary of State is giving the Director General of Fair Trading some six months to come up with proposals for reforming the system? Does that not threaten a substantial increase over and above the existing forecasts of the likely decline in the number of producers in the sector?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is quite right. It is intolerable that yet more uncertainty has been heaped on the sector after having to wait for so many months. It is now one and a half years since the inquiry began.

I now turn to the contents of the report, which has suffered from having spent too long addressing a fast-moving target. Milk Marque's share of the supply of milk in Britain fell from almost 50 per cent. when the MMC started considering the issue to under 40 per cent. in the current year. That huge reduction is continuing, yet the report's conclusions seem to be largely based on the 50 per cent. figure. In such a fast-moving environment, the long delay in publication has further devalued the document. Despite having wasted so much time, Labour has drawn the wrong conclusion, because the overriding need is for Milk Marque to be able to match its European counterparts and invest in processing.

Producer organisations are important in most large milk producing countries. To remain viable in the face of international competition, they need the benefit of the vertical integration which is currently denied to all farmers who have voluntarily decided to remain in the co-operative that constitutes Milk Marque. Instead of allowing Milk Marque to compete with other bodies at home and abroad, the Secretary of State has dithered. He has stopped short of absolute refusal and is saying instead, "Well, no—unless the Director General of Fair Trading decides that Milk Marque can carry out more processing," thus creating more uncertainty and more scope for bureaucratic intervention.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I remind the hon. Gentleman that I regularly take part in agricultural debates. I also know that the motion on the Order Paper was written yesterday. Given the fact that the MMC found that Milk Marque had exploited the situation, does he still believe that it should be strengthened, as proposed in the motion?

Mr. Yeo: I certainly do, as I wrote the motion myself. I am not persuaded by the allegations in the report that Milk Marque has exploited the situation. Admittedly, I have not read all 580 pages of the report, but I have studied it overnight. I do not find the evidence compelling, nor do many of the people whom I spoke to this morning. I hope that the Minister will tell us what he thinks of that and what effect it will have on dairy farmers.

While I welcome the commonsense decision of the DTI not to split up Milk Marque, which was scarcely necessary given the fact that its market share was declining so quickly, the whole thrust of the document and the Government's response to it is to put downward pressure on prices. Even farmers who are not part of Milk Marque will be astonished by the claim that its activities have kept farm gate prices artificially high. Instead of responding to an alleged but unproven monopoly, the Government should look at why processing costs are higher here than they are in Europe.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I invite my hon. Friend to ignore the comments of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew). Having spoken this afternoon to members of the Cumbrian NFU, I can assure him that the hon. Gentleman does not speak for Cumbria; indeed, on the basis of the local and European election results, he will not speak for Carlisle much longer either.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. The swing in the local elections was indeed startling.

The Government should examine why lower farm gate prices are not replicated on the supermarket shelf; why in some shops milk costs less than water; and why in British shops milk is often cheaper than abroad, unlike some other food items.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I want to reinforce a point that the hon. Gentleman made earlier. Is he aware of the complaint of dairy farmers in my constituency that, having been prevented from operating a vertically integrated producer co-operative, their alternative now is to sell to a company that is a subsidiary of a Danish co-operative which has 95 per cent. of its home market?

Mr. Yeo: The right hon. Gentleman is right, and the present situation will simply reinforce such absurdities.

The Government should examine the disparity between the fall in farm gate prices and the much smaller fall in supermarket prices, even if it means upsetting some of their friends, old or new, in the retail industry. Lower farm gate prices mean more dairy farmers going out of business, others working for less than the minimum wage, and more reliance on imports, which could become more expensive if the pound weakens. That would not be in the interests of farmers, consumers or retailers.

A Milk Marque free to invest in processing would improve competition; a weak Milk Marque, shackled by Government restrictions, cannot do so. Eventually, Milk Marque may no longer be able to act as the buyer of last resort.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I agree with much that the hon. Gentleman has said about Milk Marque. Why did not the Conservative Government of whom he was a member set up a slightly different system so that many of the problems that we have to deal with did not arise?

Mr. Yeo: When Milk Marque started, it exercised a near monopoly. Because of its evolution in the past four years, we should move to the next stage and give it the commercial freedom to act as similar organisations in other European countries do, successfully and without detriment to competition.

If Milk Marque is not able to act as the buyer of last resort, some dairy farmers may find that there is no one to buy their milk. We need a small number of viable producer groups competing vigorously, and Milk Marque should be one of them. I hope that the Minister will be able to persuade his colleagues to see sense.

[Mr. Yeo]

Dairy farmers have been damaged by the Government's failure to achieve a resumption of beef exports. Last November, the Minister triumphantly announced in the House that the beef export ban was being lifted, but eight months later not a single ounce of beef has been exported from the British mainland. The calf processing aid scheme is due to end at the end of July. Scrapping the scheme before beef exports restart is simply wrong. It will lead to huge calf surpluses and cut farmers' returns once again.

Even at this late stage, I urge the Minister to consider extending the scheme. If he really believes, as he said a couple of days ago, that beef exports will start again very soon, why not allow the scheme to run if only for another three months? Does he not recognise that not doing so means that some farmers face the prospect of rearing calves that are worthless, which itself may have animal welfare implications?

Another serious problem for dairy farmers is the growing threat from tuberculosis. Last year, there was a 45 per cent. increase in tuberculosis, but the Government have been slow to implement the Krebs report. Only two out of 10 triplet areas have so far commenced trials, which means that it will be 2004 before the trials are completed.

That go-slow on Krebs is needlessly prolonging the period before decisions are taken on how to tackle the problem. The vast majority of farmers are law-abiding and responsible, but if they see years of delay ahead before the Government make up their mind, a few may be tempted to take matters into their own hands.

Farmers are naturally concerned by recent reports that the European Commission plans to scrap school milk subsidies. The subsidy scheme allows primary schools to provide milk to millions of children across Europe. Although the response has been disappointing in other countries, the scheme has been taken up enthusiastically here.

The European Commission apparently does not regard that as a sufficient reason to continue the scheme. Will the Minister say what the current position is? I hope that he will be willing to act on the matter, as he has not been willing to do on some other European issues. Belgium's failure to inform Britain about possible contamination of Belgian dairy food products passed almost without criticism from the Minister, except for a brief reference in his statement to the House on 8 June. After his missing weekend, the Minister himself was one of the last to know.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nick Brown): In fact, I described the matter in the House as a scandal. My remarks were widely reported in the Belgian press, so the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that it passed without comment is very wide of the mark.

Mr. Yeo: I shall be interested to see the press cuttings on a matter that the Minister says was widely reported in Belgium.

The new Food Standards Agency will not be able to do much to protect British consumers if other countries do not bother to tell us about the possible contamination of imports. If the Minister is so willing to criticise the Belgians, why has he not written a strong letter of protest to his Belgian counterpart? Can he imagine what would have happened if the roles had been reversed? Does he not realise that a written protest might at least encourage the Belgians to contact us more promptly in future?

The issue of labelling has also featured regularly in debates about farming, and it is relevant to dairy farmers. Last month, The Daily Telegraph revealed that Sainsbury supermarkets were selling butter labelled as when in fact it contained Belgian ingredients. That is just the latest in a long line of cases in which British consumers have been misled and British farmers penalised.

"pure, slightly salted English butter"

I know that the Minister acknowledges that the need for better labelling is very urgent. British consumers are too often in the dark about the true origins and contents of the food that they buy and about the methods by which it is produced. Milk quotas prevent Britain from meeting its dairy product needs. Imports will be a fact of life until the quota system is changed, so let us at least have clarity and honesty about which products are imported and which are genuinely produced at home.

Dairy farmers throughout the country will study the Minister's speech today. For some, his remarks will decide whether they remain in business. He must give the House five pledges today to reassure dairy farmers that they have a future. He should pledge that he will fight for an immediate increase in Britain's milk quota; that he will allow Milk Marque to invest in processing; that he will extend the calf processing aid scheme until beef exports resume; that he will start the remaining Krebs trials at once; finally, that labelling of dairy products will be simple, clear and honest.

Any—and preferably all—of those measures would have the Opposition's full support if they were announced today. I commend the motion to the House.

4.53 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nick Brown): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"recognises the economic difficulties faced by the dairy industry; supports the Government's efforts to reform the Common Agricultural Policy during the recent Agenda 2000 negotiations in order to move towards a freer, more competitive market; welcomes the publication of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of raw milk; notes its conclusions and looks forward to a new selling system being in place which meets the needs both of consumers and the dairy industry; endorses the Government's view that the industry itself must help shape its own future; and congratulates the Government for its support for industry initiatives to achieve this."

I am grateful to the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), the Opposition spokesman, for again securing Opposition time for a debate on agriculture. He is right to say that Government time has not been used for such a debate, but, whenever I ask our business managers for a debate in Government time, they tell me that a debate in Opposition time is coming up and suggest that I make my announcements then. The hon. Gentleman is also right to say that I have taken full advantage of that in the past, and the Government intend to do so again now—hence my gratitude to the hon. Gentleman.

The shadow Cabinet is clearly approaching this topic in a singled-minded way. When I looked at the motion, I thought that the speed with which the shadow Cabinet was disowning the approach that the Conservatives adopted to these matters when they were in government was quite breathtaking. In his speech, the hon. Member for South Suffolk attempted to correct the Opposition's position, although their motion gives no hint of that.

In any event, the debate gives us two important opportunities. First, it gives the House the opportunity to debate the way forward for the United Kingdom's dairy industry, which is our largest agricultural sector. Secondly, and more specifically, it gives my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the opportunity to deal with the questions that have been raised by the Competition Commission's report on Milk Marque, and to respond to it. The whole House will be grateful to the Secretary of State for winding up the debate on behalf of the Government and for referring specifically to that report. I will leave that aspect of the motion to him and concentrate on the other matters that the Opposition have raised.

Before I do so, the House will want to know that I have agreed to meet Milk Marque on Monday and the Dairy Industry Federation later that day. I am meeting Mr. Ben Gill, president of the National Farmers Union, immediately after the debate. I also intend to hold discussions with agriculture Ministers representing the devolved Administrations, and with other producer representatives, particularly those from dairying communities.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Before he moves on to another topic, will the Secretary of State recall his warm words to me in answer to a question about the importance of encouraging the co-operative principle in agriculture? Will he draw the attention of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to that important consideration, because it is absolutely fundamental to enabling Milk Marque to compete on a level playing field throughout Europe's processed dairy products market?

Mr. Brown: I strongly believe in producer co-operation. I am an advocate of it. Indeed, I echoed my remarks to the hon. Gentleman in my comments at the royal show on Monday. I said that those points would be taken into account when the Government responded to the competition report and that a statement was imminent.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): There is one important issue in relation to the forthcoming milk round. It is important to clarify it now, given that the Minister will not speak at the end of the debate. Will he confirm that the forthcoming milk round, in which only 36 per cent. of milk sold will pass from Milk Marque, will be unaffected by the recommendations that he announced yesterday?

Mr. Brown: The short answer is yes. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry intends to deal specifically with that point in his winding-up speech.

Mr. Nick Ainger (West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire): I am grateful for the clear consultation on which my right hon. Friend intends to embark, literally in the next few hours and days. Once he has met the industry representatives to whom he referred to earlier, will he agree to meet a delegation from west Wales and other parts of Wales, which have the highest proportion of Milk Marque members, who are clearly directly affected by the publication of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report?

Mr. Brown: I am mindful of the responsibilities of the devolved Assembly and of the Minister there. Nevertheless, if my hon. Friend wishes to bring a delegation of his farmers to meet me, I shall be willing to see them. I make the offer, in as much as I reasonably can, to other hon. Members as well. Although I am willing to meet representative groups, please do not place me under siege. I accept that it is my responsibility to get the industry through. I accept the responsibility that goes with my office.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I welcome what the Minister has said. He will recognise that Cornwall does fall within his area of responsibility—we have no delegated government there yet. I can confirm that, after possibly Pembrokeshire, Cornwall has the largest number of Milk Marque suppliers.

Mr. Brown: I fully appreciate that. During my visits to Cornwall and the west country, that point was made to me over and again. I understand the anxiety. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to see me with some of his farmers—I can see what I shall be doing next week—I am willing to see them as well. This matter is important for the dairy industry because livelihoods are at stake. It is right that the Government not only set out their response to the report but help the industry to get through. I promised the dairy industry that I would work with it to get it through these difficult times, and that is exactly what I am doing.

The Opposition motion begins by referring to the fall in milk prices, the prices received for cull cows and dairy farm incomes. Of course, those are not all one issue. As we have discussed, the problem is partly cyclical and partly structural.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Before he moves on to the generality of the points that he has outlined, may I ask him about the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report? He must realise the great significance of the report to the dairy industry, for which he is responsible. Is he mindful of the fact that, when we talk about milk, we are talking about a commodity? Does he realise how difficult it is, particularly in a modern, competitive world, to handle all the problems associated with a commodity? Having been involved in another commodity for most of my working life, I must say that it is now imperative that anyone in a commodity business is allowed to add value, otherwise, one simply cannot survive. The right hon. Gentleman must have strong words with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, make that point and win it.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman will have heard me say, in the general context of difficulties in the livestock sector, that one way forward is producer co-operation and co-operation to achieve added value, which means vertical integration. That issue is at the core of the problems that we are tackling. We need to see how that can be achieved in the dairy sector and be compatible with competition policy.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have more to say about that when he replies, but please do not think that I have changed my views, or that I will move from trying to help the dairy industry get through what I acknowledge are difficult times, as I have helped other sectors—the hon. Gentleman knows about the pig sector—to what I hope will be better times, to return to profitability and to ensure that those who work so hard in agriculture get a return on their investment and hard work. That is my objective.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) rose—

Mr. Brown: I will give way, but I am conscious that the Opposition were generous enough to allow a Government statement on an Opposition day, which is unusual. Obviously, it is an important statement. I will take interventions, as I know that there is much interest in the House, but I do not want to keep hon. Members out of the debate.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. When he and my constituent, Ben Gill, meet, I am sure that the plight of dairy farmers in the Vale of York will not be far from their thoughts. Milk Marque has made a major investment in its first presence in the Vale of York. Will he ensure that that investment is secure for the foreseeable future?

Mr. Brown: That matter is better left to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I want to ensure that Milk Marque gets through the competition report and that it is possible for dairy farmers to work co-operatively together, through producer organisations, so that, if they decide to do so—these are market judgments for them—they can take advantage of vertical integration. Having seen the report, I doubt whether they will be able to do so with Milk Marque entirely in its present form. I do not want to hold out hopes. However, those are matters for the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way on this important issue. Further to the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), is it not a fact that the industry desperately needs new investment in processing? Is not one reason for the state of processing in this country the fact that there has been no real investment? If we are to compete satisfactorily, we must have more investment.

Mr. Brown: I certainly think that adding value and, therefore, investing in processing, is an important way forward for the domestic industry. I am not pessimistic about the industry's future. Part of the problem is cyclical, and part structural. Clearly, using the opportunities of vertical integration is one way for dairy farmers to proceed. What the hon. Lady says is right.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Brown: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but then I would ask Opposition Members to allow me to complete my speech, unless some matter arises out of it.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. He will be aware that the long-term trend had been towards a 3 per cent. reduction in the number of dairy producers, until the Lloyds TSB report in 1997, which forecast that, between 1997 and 2000, the figure would be 14 per cent. In the light of the announcement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that the Director General of Fair Trading will have six months in which to produce recommendations for changed procedures, can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that he has discussed that matter with his right hon. Friend and made him aware of the possible increase in the number of producers who would go out of business in the interim?

Mr. Brown: Views are shared within government, but decisions on this matter of the competition authorities are for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry alone. The responsibility is not shared. [Interruption.] I am afraid that that is how it works—and how it worked under the previous Government. Of course I am able to express an opinion within government, just as other Ministers can. What the hon. Gentleman says about the long-term trend is right. There is a tendency for farm businesses to amalgamate and to grow larger, and that is particularly pronounced in the dairy sector. There is nothing new about that. The economic cycle may exacerbate that trend. It is my responsibility to ensure that the Government have a policy that helps small and medium farmers get by where they can, as well as concentrating on more market-oriented business operations.

Although the hon. Member for South Suffolk rightly set out the fall in farm incomes and related it to the dairy sector, he did not make very much of the Conservative Government's deregulation of the industry and the intensive competition among processors to secure supplies of milk, which was the immediate consequence of deregulation and which, of course, forced up milk prices. Those pressures have now eased and prices have consequently weakened in the marketplace.

The motion uses the word "collapsed" in the context of dairy farmers' incomes, yet there is still a market for dairy quota. Agricultural land for dairy farming is still traded at a rate of about 2.5 per cent. of farms for sale per annum—a figure that has remained reasonably static since 1993. The size of the national dairy herd has declined only slightly in recent years. Indeed, agricultural land values are rising.

The Government monitor total agricultural bankruptcies, which peaked at about 500 in 1992 and fell back to 222 in 1998. Bankruptcy is, of course, a measure of last resort. Most farmers leaving the industry do so in an orderly way by selling up and realising their assets, including the value of milk quota. There is a steady, long-term trend in the sector towards fewer large dairy farms.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman should let me finish my point; I know what he is going to come back on.

Many people envisage a future for the industry. There is a perfectly proper debate to be had about the industry's shape and structure, and the way in which the common agricultural policy and national Governments should provide continuing support to the sector, as the Government are committed to doing.

Mr. Gray: The industry and the House will be appalled by the complacent nature of the remarks that the Minister has just made about the dairy industry. In my speech, if I am lucky enough to catch your eye Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall expand on the poverty and hardship among dairy farmers in my constituency. In the short term, does the Minister accept that the 8p a pint that farmers in my constituency get for their milk is the lowest price since Labour was last in power in 1979? Is not that a mark of how awful the situation is in the dairy industry?

Mr. Brown: I have accepted that prices are depressed. Indeed, we explored earlier, with the hon. Member for South Suffolk, the Front-Bench spokesman, whether it was Conservative party policy to keep prices artificially high by accepting what is called the traditional European model of agriculture with quotas and tariffs, or to work towards a rational, market-oriented solution. To his credit, the hon. Gentleman endorsed the policy that the Conservative Government followed, which was to work towards a market-orientated solution.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) said that, because I explained that there are people who still have confidence in the industry, the Government are complacent. There is nothing complacent about expressing confidence in an industry and saying that the Government will do their best to get it through difficult times.

Mr. Gray: Farmers are going bust.

Mr. Brown: The figures that I have just quoted—I checked the point about bankruptcy—show that farm bankruptcies were at a peak in 1992, not now. That responds to his point.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall give way first to the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King).

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): I sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman on one problem. He is dependent on the information that reaches him. A lot of the statistics and information that he receives are out of date. In some cases, there is a considerable time lag before the effects of recent events become evident in the statistics. I have represented farmers in this House for 30 years and I have never been more deeply worried about the situation for dairy farmers. I have had the most distressing meetings in farmers' kitchens with farmers and their sons asking me about their future and whether they should stay in dairy farming or sell up now while they can, while their land, their animals and their quota still have some value. As there are no longer any regional advisory boards, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman has a more immediate finger on the pulse of the dairy industry than the statistics that reach him. The industry may be facing a more serious situation than he realises.

Mr. Brown: I accept what the right hon. Gentleman says. He makes his points sincerely and well. He is right to say that there is a lot of uncertainty in the marketplace, particularly in the dairy sector. My duty is to give as much certainty as I can about the public support regime and ensure that people are properly advised on what would be a rational business decision for their future. To say that the entire dairy sector faces ruin, which is the thrust of the Opposition motion, is wrong and goes too far. There are difficulties, we are going through a period of restructuring and the issues have to be dealt with rationally, but it is not right to go further than that and instil fear where it is not necessary.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): I endorse the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King). My dairy farmers in Staffordshire are deeply worried, but it is not just a local phenomenon. In the 15 years that I have represented my area, I have never seen anything as bad. Cheques are bouncing, people are in despair and young people are saying that they have no future. I am still waiting to hear something constructive from the Minister. He has given us a lot of words, but no policy. I have heard nothing in response to the charges made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo). I have heard no answers to any of the questions asked by any of my hon. Friends. It is important that the Minister understands the urgency of the situation and the need for action.

Mr. Brown: I understand the seriousness of the situation. Farm incomes have fallen for two years running and prices are depressed. That is the core problem. I have something to say about those points, but I have also been generous in giving way. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): I shall be as brief as I can. I, too, have met farmers who are very concerned, but I am sure that they would be far more concerned to hear the Opposition's proposals to remove quotas and reduce prices to world levels. Does my right hon. Friend agree with paragraph 2.17 of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report, which suggests that a cut of 30 per cent. would be needed to bring EU prices down to world levels? Would not the removal of quota and a reduction to world prices inevitably produce the collapse in prices that the Conservatives are complaining about?

Mr. Brown: What the motion says and what the hon. Member for South Suffolk has said are not quite the same. The motion refers to an immediate increase in CAP quota. I shall have something to say about that in a moment. We do not know what the world market price for milk is. The CAP supports production in the European Union. The other major suppliers also have support regimes for their products. The totally liberalised market in New Zealand cannot supply the entire world market at the competitive price that everyone says that it would. The big regimes in the United States and the European Union will continue to support the dairy industry, at considerable cost, for many years.

Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): The picture that the Minister painted earlier is not reflected in my constituency. The farmers whom I have spoken to in recent weeks and months are on their knees. I should be grateful for some advice. The conditions should be right. We have the highest average dairy farm sizes in Europe, the safest milk with the highest bacterial quality in Europe and an ideal environment for low-cost fodder production, yet we have the lowest farmgate milk prices. With the best environment for a competitive dairy industry, why is confidence at an all-time low?

Mr. Brown: A range of factors is involved. The explanation is partly cyclical. People are also wondering where the outcome of the CAP round will lead the industry in the medium term. The point about prices being lower in the United Kingdom than in the rest of the European Union is true, but it has been true since 1985.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will my right hon. Friend comment on the response of the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew)? The hon. Member for South Suffolk made it clear that the Tories want to do away with quotas. When he was asked whether that would lead to a collapse in prices, he said that it would not, because farmers would be allowed to sell only in local markets. [HON. MEMBERS: "No he did not."] Check the record. He said that they would be allowed to sell in local markets, which implies a restriction. There is no conceivable restriction that can be used other than quotas. We have blown a hole in Conservative policy on milk pricing. I hope that the farming industry notices what the Conservatives are saying.

Mr. Brown: The Government are not contemplating issuing end-user certificates with dairy quota. As I have explained before, I believe in a reformed dairy regime within the CAP, worked out in discussions with our major trading partners to restructure our support for agriculture.

Mr. Luff: Am I right in saying that the Government—constructively and rightly—formed an alliance with other member states, including Italy and, I think, Denmark to secure the abolition of milk quotas in the most recent CAP round?

Mr. Brown: I am going to move on to that. I see that Conservative Members are so eager with excitement that they are going to sit still, not intervene and let me get to the point.

The flaw in the Conservative motion—although not in what the hon. Member for South Suffolk said to the House, which was closer to the position that the Conservatives adopted in government—is that it complains about the weakness in the domestic market and the fall in the milk prices, then goes on to demand that more dairy quota should be issued immediately in Great Britain, which would increase supply and bring prices down. The motion contradicts itself.

Mr. Yeo indicated dissent.

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman believes that issuing extra dairy quota would somehow put prices up, I am willing to hear his explanation.

Mr. Yeo: The purpose of including that in the motion was to draw attention to the fact that, disastrously, the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman agreed to Ireland getting an immediate increase in its quota, which will send more imports into this country, depressing the prices in Britain. If Britain's farmers were not shackled by the quota for another four years, they would be able to meet that demand. An increase in quota would not reduce prices; it would replace imports.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is on to a good point. He is right to complain about the issue of extra dairy quota, especially to Ireland. The Irish Government's case cannot really be said to have been founded in merit. In fact, it was founded on an agreement made by the Heads of Government in the early 1980s. The beneficiaries of the agreement remembered, and held the rest of us to it. I agree with the hon. Gentlemen that the agreement should not have been made, but let the House remember who made it.

Being stuck with it, I did the only thing that I could in the circumstances, and argued for an equivalent and proportionate allocation of quota for Northern Ireland. My success in achieving that unprecedented concession has been welcomed by the industry in the Province. When did any Conservative Government achieve such a thing?

The United Kingdom Government's great success in the dairy regime element of the CAP negotiations was to make a start on reform, anticipating the changes in world markets that are moving remorselessly towards the European Union's industry. I have said to the House before and I repeat it now, that I would have preferred to have gone further down the reform road and on a shorter timetable.

I believe that the radical proposal for dairy reform made by Italy, Denmark, Sweden and the United Kingdom was the right way forward for the European Union. I confidently expect us to be returning to those issues in the coming years. I attach great importance, as I told the Select Committee, to the review clause that we set for 2003 and to the work that we will put in hand leading up to that watershed.

I welcome the Finnish Agriculture Minister's intention of making the European Union's approach to the agricultural component of the upcoming World Trade Organisation round the main topic for discussion at the informal meeting of European Agriculture Ministers this September.

The reform road is a difficult one for the industry. The alternative, no matter how attractive it may seem in the short term, is to risk being overwhelmed by external market forces. To their credit, the previous Conservative Government recognised that. The Conservative party's motion today represents a significant change in position, but I accept that, during his speech, the hon. Member for South Suffolk pulled back from the worst implications of the motion. The motion implies that the industry should be placed in a straitjacket at the risk of eventually being overwhelmed by market forces.

I notice that the hon. Member for South Suffolk did not spell out what the motion means by "strengthening Milk Marque", but the implication is that it advocates the continuing exercise of unjustified monopolistic practices in the marketplace, in complete defiance of the views of the independent Director General of Fair Trading. I accept that the hon. Gentleman has not yet had an opportunity to study the report in full. I have not had that chance either, but I have the advantage of getting the executive summary from my civil servants and there are matters to which Milk Marque will have to respond.

Mr. Yeo: What I meant by "strengthening Milk Marque" was allowing it to integrate vertically, as other comparable organisations do in other European countries. That would be a strengthening of Milk Marque and that is what the Minister has said that he cannot do.

Mr. Brown: The issue is whether the competition authorities will think it right and fair for the whole of Milk Marque, whether or not it meets the other criticisms, to become processors or whether some other adjustment will be necessary before producer co-operatives can be processors. That is the issue that we must work through with the industry in the coming weeks. I pledge to take a constructive interest in those matters and to do what I can to get the United Kingdom's dairy industry through. That is a perfectly proper thing for the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to want to do.

Mr. Drew: I understand the spirit in which my right hon. Friend will move forward. Does he agree that the way in which Milk Marque and the industry was set up was confrontational and that the only way that we can resolve this is by putting them together around a table and negotiating our way out of this mess?

Mr. Brown: I have repeatedly told those in the food chain that there is no future for any of us in a confrontational approach. I have argued for each section of the food chain—the retailers, the processors, the food producers and even the caterers—to take a constructive interest in each other's well-being and long-term future. Those in the food chain need each other and I have done what I can to encourage co-operation.

The Krebs report is important. The previous Government invited Professor Krebs to undertake that valuable study, and I guess that only a cynic would say that they did that in order to avoid difficult decisions in the run-up to the general election.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): On a point of information, I was one of the Ministers who felt that the Krebs report was important and we were only too well aware that it had been many years since there had been an independent report carried out by people who would be regarded, not just politically but in the scientific world, as having the information and qualifications necessary to produce such a report. It was nothing to do with the forthcoming general election. The report was commissioned long before the general election.

Mr. Brown: Nobody would charge either of us with cynicism, but the Conservative Government had 18 years in which to embark upon this and chose to do so in the run-up to the election.

The Krebs report is of value and I hope that it has been able to inform debate throughout the House. My predecessor had asked Professor John Bourne, a distinguished director of the Research Council Institute for Animal Health, to advise on how the report's recommendations could be implemented. I received Professor Bourne's recommendations when I became the Minister last July and decided straight away to accept his advice and press ahead with the trials. The Government are determined to see the trials through and, at the same time, to take action against tuberculosis in a number of other areas such as a combined package of research which includes the trial, vaccine development, advice on animal husbandry and cattle testing.

I want to make two points absolutely clear to the House. First, hindering or disrupting the trials is in nobody's interest. I urge everyone with an interest in this to co-operate with the trial group. The results, once evaluated, will be shared with everyone with a legitimate interest and, for the first time, we will have a scientific basis on which to proceed.

Secondly, I regard TB in dairy cattle as an animal welfare issue just as much as TB in badgers. The Government are determined to find rational solutions to the problem and not to allow TB to spread in the national dairy herd.

Let me say directly that those who are disrupting the trials are significantly narrowing the range of options available to the Government. Let me say clearly that this is not even in their own narrow sectional interests. Clearer than that I cannot be.

I am making use of this Opposition day to make an announcement. Dairy farmers have asked me whether the Government would agree to an industrywide levy to fund a generic advertising campaign. I am strongly of the view that the most important factors in this consideration are the views of dairy farmers. I can therefore announce to the House that, subject to working out the necessary details with the different parties in the dairy industry, I intend to launch a poll in early September with a closing date six weeks later.

In the United Kingdom, we have the ideal climate for milk production, the highest standards of animal welfare and product safety and some of the finest dairy products in the world.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): It is now several months since the National Farmers Union presented to the Minister a series of proposals to address the problems of TB outbreaks outside the triplet areas while the studies are taking place. When will he respond to those proposals and provide some hope for the dairy farmers outside the study areas?

Mr. Brown: I do not want to set a date. These are important matters. Significant consideration is being given to the suggestions that have put to me by the dairy industry. Clearly, the points that have been made require a response, and they will get one. I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that the Government will not back down from their responsibility to deal with the problem of TB in the dairy herd. If one solution will not work, we shall have to look at the remaining options.

I have been very taken with the point made in the Krebs report that the evidence of a link between TB in the dairy herd and TB in the wild badger population is compelling. That is the phrase used in the report, and that would be the starting point. I would prefer the starting point to be the results of the scientific trial, because we could then all share the evidence and use it as a basis of discussion. However, if that is to be denied me, it does not remove my responsibility to tackle the problem. I give the hon. Gentleman that clear assurance.

Mrs. Diana Organ (Forest of Dean): We are all aware of the controversy about the Krebs trial. I wholeheartedly agree that any interference with the trial only hinders the gathering of the knowledge that we need to address that dreadful disease in cattle. However, there is concern among dairy farmers in my area that the trial is slipping: Professor Krebs suggested a five-year trial, and we do not want it to become a seven or 10-year trial. We need the trial to proceed apace. My other point—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. In view of the shortage of time available, the hon. Lady must not be greedy.

Mr. Brown: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that she seeks. The Government are determined to push on with the trials and to do what is necessary to secure a worthwhile piece of scientific work that will inform the debate once and for all. That is the Government's preferred way forward. However, if that way forward is denied me, and it becomes impossible for us to carry out the trials, I shall still be left to deal with the problem, and I shall have to base solutions on the evidence currently available to us.

Let me draw my remarks to a close. We in this country have a high level of producer expertise and commitment, which is underpinned by strong research and development support from my Ministry.

Mr. McLoughlin: I thought that the Minister was going to make several announcements this afternoon but, so far, if I have heard him correctly, he has made one announcement about conducting in September a poll of dairy farmers that lasts for six weeks. A focus group could have sorted that out for him—is that the only announcement that he is going to make?

Mr. Brown: That is a ridiculous point. Opinions on whether or not the industry should fund a generic advertising campaign for milk should not be taken from a focus group. The people whose opinions matter are dairy farmers, which is why they are to be asked for their opinions in a poll.

Matters arising from the competition report overshadow this debate and, as I said at the start, those will be dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he winds up the debate. I had formed a clear impression that the whole House accepted that report as being not only reasonable and right, but generous on the part of the Government. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was here at the start of the debate—

Mr. McLoughlin indicated assent.

Mr. Brown: He is twitching on the Back Bench, but I cannot tell whether he was present or not.

Mr. Hoyle: My right hon. Friend is known for listening to farmers and the poll is welcome. However, will he also consider visiting constituencies such as Chorley to meet local farmers and so ensure that their voice is heard?

Mr. Brown: Nice try—I can see how this is going to go. I said that I would do my best to visit farmers, especially in areas where dairying is a strong sector.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) rose—

Mr. Brown: I now stand ready to respond to the invitation from my distinguished predecessor.

Mr. Hogg: Before he sits down, will the right hon. Gentleman deal with the question of cull cows? He will know that food chain was fully insured after August 1996; that being so, is there not a real case now for announcing that the 30-month rule will not apply in respect of cattle born after August 1996? That would be reassuring to dairy farmers.

Mr. Brown: I cannot make the announcement now that the right hon. and learned Gentleman seeks, but I can give him the assurance that advice on the 30-month scheme is being prepared for me. As he knows, the matter is not entirely in my hands, but is one of several conditions set for us by the European Union. However, there is logic in his remarks: the 30-month period has now passed, so it is right to consider the future of the scheme. That matter is now under consideration and I await advice before taking it up with others. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's point is well made, but I cannot make an announcement today.

Let me now bring my remarks to a close. We in this country have a strong retailing structure and a catering industry that is now, rightly, regarded as world class. The real challenge facing the dairy industry is the increasing liberalisation of world markets and progress on common agricultural policy reform. The Government's achievement is to be regarded by our European partners as a constructive ally and to be highly valued by our partners outside the European Union for the role we play in that debate. I invite the House to vote for that approach and to reject the approach outlined in the motion tabled by the official Opposition.

5.35 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): As usual, I find the Minister's sympathetic tone very attractive, and I suspect that other hon. Members do as well. However, the content of his speech was bitterly disappointing. I hope that the speech of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at the end of the debate will be of greater substance, and that he, too, has been imbibing the milk of human kindness that was the hallmark of the Minister's speech.

Seventy per cent. of UK milk is processed by 10 companies and 90 per cent. of the butter is processed by just six companies—that is where the real cartel and the real monopoly lie. The previous Conservative Government totally failed to address that situation, although they did introduce a piece of legislation. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is not present, because, like me, he sat through the Committee on that legislation. Neither many on the Treasury Bench nor any on the Opposition Front Bench saw that legislation all the way through its stages. I make no apology for referring to that legislation—the Agriculture Act 1993—because it forms the background to this debate.

Despite that Act, which was intended to address the problem, we still have a market that is dominated by big buyers, not big sellers. As a result, farmers' share of the retail milk price has fallen 10 per cent. since 1994—during the lifetime of Milk Marque. Farmers now receive less than 10p per pint for their milk, which compares badly with consumer prices of about 25p per pint in the supermarkets and 40p per pint delivered to the doorstep. Dairy farmers have been squeezed continually over the past four or five years, and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report does little to address that problem. It contains nothing on ways to improve the return to the average dairy farmer.

I acknowledge—and dairy farmers will welcome—the fact that the Secretary of State did not accept the recommendation to dismantle Milk Marque. However, our confusion is increased by that decision, because the logic of that huge report leads to such a recommendation, and removing that recommendation makes the logic of the report's argument extremely weak. The confusion is deepened by the Secretary of State's partial approach to the recommendations, because, having rejected the logic for dismantling, he accepts the so-called interim measures, set out on page 98, which were intended to secure the argument for dismantling Milk Marque. The Secretary of State must state at the end of the debate what structural adjustment he seeks to achieve through those interim measures; if none, they have no validity whatsoever.

The current position demonstrates the total failure of the 1993 Act to bring about a right balance between farmer, retailer and processor. During the period since the Act, the middlemen have creamed off all the profits available in the market for milk, but neither consumers nor producers have benefited proportionately.

Livestock farmers in my part of the country, to which my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) referred, are mostly small-scale producers. They are extremely vulnerable and they need effective co-operatives to survive, so I was glad to hear the Minister reiterate his support for co-operatives. However, from reading the report, let alone the Secretary of State's announcement, one would not believe that that was Government policy.

It is essential to have a successful Milk Marque if the milk sector is to survive, let alone prosper. We must be able to benefit from the EU common agricultural policy, just as farmer co-operatives do in every other member state. The report provides no endorsement of that objective.

In the current sale period, if sufficient milk is available, of course, the dairy companies will purchase about 90 per cent. of it. The remaining milk will be sold on the short-term daily or monthly market. Expressed as a proportion of the EU milk target price, United Kingdom product prices are now the lowest in the whole of the EU, and they are deteriorating. That is the background to the MMC report before us today.

The Agriculture Act 1993 was far too protective of the huge dairy companies, with their oligopolistic tendencies. Curiously, and ironically—Labour Members may find this difficult to believe—the Conservative Government were egged on by the Labour Opposition to listen to the Dairy Trade Federation, which represents some of the biggest commercial operators in the country. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Workington has left the Chamber. On Second Reading, in Committee and on Report, he kept arguing the case for restricting the freedom of manoeuvre of a producer co-operative in favour of the huge intermediaries.

In my speech on Second Reading, I said:

"We want a producer-co-operative, but not as a fallback position: we want a potential ground breaker which will establish itself as a strong marketing co-operative to match those in other member states. From our experience of agriculture in other member states, we know how effective producer co-operatives are. They are prepared to use their marketing muscle in the market place and to prevent the sort of domination of buying power which results in this country from a small number of processors and supermarkets. A co-operative with the ability to compete in the world of the giants—the supermarket chains and food processors—would be a benefit to producers and consumers. By cutting back on the bargaining power of the middle men, there is no reason why retail food prices should not fall."—[Official Report, 23 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 828.]

In Committee, the three parties adopted sharply different attitudes to milk producers and their collective potential. I made a similar point in Committee about the importance of making Milk Marque a success not only for its sake but for the sake of the consumer. However, the hon. Member for Workington, speaking for the Labour party, wanted to restrict still more its room for manoeuvre. He said:

"I only put the proposition that Parliament has the right to decide whether Milk Marque should be capped if it wants to go into processing activities. A later amendment might attempt to cap Milk Marque even if it does not want to go into processing activities. . . . We are not convinced that Milk Marque will not be able to abuse its position in the market place."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 15 April 1993; c. 12-13.]

The Labour party's emphasis was on protecting the big boys—the intermediaries in the chain—not helping the producer co-operatives, namely, the dairy farmers. I hope that now that it is in government it has seen the light.

Mr. Drew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take a better attitude than that of his predecessors.

Mr. Drew: To hear co-operation mentioned so many times in so short a period is music to my ears, as a Co-operative Member. However, compared to the large producer co-operatives on the continent, our dairy companies are small beer, if the hon. Gentleman will excuse my mixing metaphors.

Mr. Tyler: I endorse that view. I am grateful to have the hon. Gentleman's support and I hope that we will continue to have that support in the coming weeks and months, when the issue will be of considerable importance. That is precisely why Milk Marque should not be compared with the large co-operatives in some of the other member states, with which we compete, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said.

Mr. Andrew George: Further to the point raised by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), does my hon. Friend agree that, under the terms of the Competition Act 1998, from March next year Milk Marque will not hold a dominant position in the market, as it will have a share of less than 40 per cent. of the liquid market. It should not be affected by the Act as it is not in a dominant and monopolistic position.

Mr. Tyler: That is true. I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Since we are relatively near neighbours, he may be reading my mind. I shall come to that point shortly. I wish to deal first with the Agriculture Act 1993.

I regret that the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) is not in his place, although I had a conversation with him yesterday on this matter. He was the Minister when the Agriculture Act went through the House. He said in Committee:

"Our job as Ministers is to ensure that the arrangements which are capable of asserting that Milk Marque will not overstep the mark are able to function effectively. If that happens, the sign up rate, whether it be 17 per cent. or 70 per cent., will be less of a material consideration."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 15 April 1993; c. 28.]

In other words, it is not whether one has a monopoly but what one does with it that is critical.

I do not believe that the case that has been made by the MMC stands up to scrutiny. I have spent a great deal of time reading it in the past 24 hours. The definition of a monopoly in this context is not relevant and I do not believe that an abuse has been demonstrated.

Let us take a comparable situation. I understand that Express Dairies has recently announced the purchase of Glanbia's liquid milk business, giving Express a potential 30 per cent. share of the market. Will that be referred to the competition authorities? It certainly should be. Will the Minister insist that while the matter is being examined, Express Dairies is not permitted to continue recruiting farmers who produce milk and taking them away from Milk Marque?

Our experience since the Agriculture Act 1993 has been deplorable. Milk Marque now markets less than 40 per cent. of Great Britain milk production. That is much less than at the time of the report. It is likely to be as low as 36 per cent.—a point made earlier by the hon. Member for Mid–Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), the Chairman of the Select Committee—in the forthcoming selling round. The MMC did not adequately examine the traumatic events of the summer 1998 and spring 1999 selling round. It is not in the report. I have been through it and there seem to be some quick references to it, but despite the delays in publication, the MMC has not taken that into account.

As hon. Members will know, in both selling rounds, the buyers effectively held the producers to ransom. They have used their monopoly power twice in the past 12 months. The cartel was in place over those few days. The buyers were able to prevent the proper market from operating. The report is stuck in the early or mid-1990s. It has not taken into account the later 1990s. I see hon. Members on both sides of the House from agricultural constituencies agreeing that that is the case. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry must acknowledge when he returns to the Chamber that the report is in a time warp.

The experience of those two selling rounds has convinced Milk Marque that there must be some attempt to address the full extent of the market power of the buyers, which is now held by a very small number of major dairy processing companies. Milk Marque has rightly recommended to us that the way forward must be to develop the sale of milk on more one-to-one contracts—a much more direct contractual basis—and on normal commercial terms. That would allow farmers to invest in the necessary processing capacity, and prevent milk from having to be exported, as it was in spring 1999, simply because there was insufficient manufacturing capacity in this country.

Of course it is true that the market in raw milk is naturally limited by time and transport—it is a commodity that cannot be hung about with—but it was folly for the MMC and the Government to ignore the importance of the EU-wide milk processing market in this context. The two are linked. If there is a surplus in the raw milk market, the milk that goes for processing, which is now Europe-wide, if not worldwide—

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tyler: I must make progress because I am conscious of the fact that the Labour and Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen took more than an hour and I want to leave time for other hon. Members to get in.

A large factor in the collapse of daily farmers' incomes has been the strength of sterling, to which proper reference has not been made today. However, that is an additional reason—I do not want to divert attention from the critical structural problems of the industry—for the Minister to come to the aid of this sector. The considerable gap that has opened between the retail prices for milk and the prices paid to producers must be addressed now; otherwise, more dairy farmers will go to the wall.

The Minister gave some figures, and it is true that there have not been as many bankruptcies—thank God—as one might have anticipated. One reason is that the amalgamations have proceeded at such a pace that there are, frankly, fewer people in the industry, so there are fewer to go bankrupt. However, I give this warning. If the indecision that is likely to follow this report for many months continues, and if there is no clear signal from both Departments that they take seriously the deterioration in the situation since the report was drawn up, there will be many more farmers whose bank managers will be dragging them into the office to say, "We know that you have hung on by your fingertips. You were waiting for the report, but frankly we see nothing in it which would give us the confidence to maintain your overdraft or borrowing requirement."

These farmers may have been able to hang on through the winter, but they will not be able to do so for much longer. As a result of the report, the likely selling price over the next few months in the selling round that is just about to start will be lower again, because of the lack of confidence in the market.

Frankly, I believe that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has fudged the issue of tackling the cartel behaviour of the buyers. I am sure that the Minister, who does his very best to represent the views of farmers, has done his best to influence the Department of Trade and Industry. I have to say that I wish we had been able to get to him earlier to strengthen his resolve and his arm.

In Committee, I made what I fear was an all-too-accurate forecast. I said:

"The restrictions on the possible future of Milk Marque may prove to be its undoing. It will not be as effective, powerful or useful to producers as it might be."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 11 May 1993; c. 253.]

That is what the report has highlighted, and that is what we are debating.

I was delighted to hear the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) say on behalf of the Conservative party that he believes that Milk Marque was shackled. That is a retreat, or a U-turn, from the position of the previous Government, but it is a recognition of the facts which I genuinely welcome. I hope that all parties will now address that issue.

I wish to make brief reference to the issue of bovine TB. As the Minister knows, my constituency is at the epicentre of one of the worst outbreaks of bovine TB, and has been for many years. It is an appallingly difficult problem with which to grapple. Having examined the issue from all sides for a long time, I believe that we are, as a result of the Krebs report, at last grasping the nettle—but what a tragedy that we have had to wait 25 years for that to happen. Successive Ministers, for political or other reasons, have left it late in the day.

We now know that the impact and the cost of TB on the industry continues to grow. Dairy herds are accounting for approximately 50 per cent. of the breakdowns. The National Farmers Union has estimated that, by 2006, the number of TB breakdowns will grow to nearly 4,000 a year. The annual cost of TB to the farms is expected to rise to almost £140 million. This is like the BSE crisis coming back and back again, without any sign of an end. I welcome what the Minister has said, and I hope that it will not be too long before we have a firm statement in relation to the representations made by the NFU on the issue, which cannot be left.

The right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said that some fallout from BSE remains to be dealt with, notably in relation to cull cows and the end of the calf scheme. I hope that it will not be too long before we get an answer to those questions. August is not far away and, as the Minister rightly responded to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that is when we ought to be clear that the 30-month scheme has outlived its usefulness.

That ought to be the case—unless the Minister suggests again that maternal transmission is potentially a real problem. If it is, let him be clear about it, and let him tell farmers. That will fill them with horror.

In the meantime, the Phillips inquiry is an extremely important analysis of what went wrong. The skeletons falling from the Whitehall cupboards are fascinating, and will provide the raw material for some interesting academic studies. However, I hope also that this House can take advantage of the inquiry not only to identify what went wrong, but to ensure that the lessons are learned.

I have referred previously to the problems that those in the dairy industry—and particularly the specialist cheese makers—are having as a result of the use by the Department of Health of the sledgehammer of emergency provisions to deal with hygiene problems with cheese. I invite the Minister, if he has not done so already, to look at the judgment in the case of the Department of Health v. Aldridge. Clearly, there was a complete over-reaction by the Department of Health, which has important repercussions for specialist food producers—especially those processing milk products.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman rightly alludes to a particularly harrowing situation. Is he aware that Mr. Aldridge has yet to receive any apology for the scandalous way in which he was treated at the hands of the Minister for Public Health?

Mr. Tyler: It would be inappropriate for me to go into great detail, but the hon. Gentleman may know that I have twice debated this issue in the House, and we still have not had in the House an apology for the way in which Mr. Aldridge was treated. I understand that the Government are paying the legal costs of the case. That is something, but it does not compensate for the appalling loss of business suffered by Mr. Aldridge—nor for the slur on the reputation of Duckett's cheese in Somerset.

The pledges sought by the Conservatives this evening were valuable and welcome, but of far more value was the way in which the hon. Member for South Suffolk recognised the failure of the 1993 legislation on the marketing of milk. I hope that we can have all-party agreement across the House this evening that it is time to re-examine the legislation. I hope that we can have a pledge from both Front-Bench teams that they will commit themselves to a review and to reform.

Effectively, the MMC report is a confession of failure. We would not be doing our duty by the dairy farmers, the industry generally or the rural communities that depend on the industry if we did not recognise that fact and address it urgently.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will be painfully obvious to the House that there is a very short time left for Back-Bench speeches in what has necessarily been a truncated debate. May I make a special plea for brevity? If hon. Members could confine themselves to about five minutes apiece, it will be possible to get a reasonable spread of participants in the debate.

5.58 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): I will do my best to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There are many dairy farmers in my constituency who are all too painfully familiar with the falling price of raw milk and the falling returns on their hard work.

Our task today, which has not been helped by the motion, is to try to help the industry to reform. I shall refer briefly to some fundamental facts and then to some of the methods we could use to address them.

First, much of the UK offers the best circumstances for milk production in the European Union. We currently produce more raw milk than we use. As in most industries, economy of scale helps—the bigger the herd, the more productive each beast is. That process has increased productivity by 22 per cent. in the past 15 years. However, this, and the decline in the volume of drinking milk consumed, has accentuated price pressures and strengthened the need for product development.

Secondly, although milk quota reform has been deferred, it remains a certainty in the medium term. Any reform should loosen the EU market and benefit the competitive suppliers that we have.

Thirdly, milk and milk products are increasingly international commodities. Currently, UK and EU prices are uncompetitive. The next World Trade Organisation round will almost certainly free the market somewhat. Although the costs of transport and the perishability of the raw product will prevent that from having much impact on drinking milk, it will have a major impact on the industry that uses milk for processing, as processors will increasingly source from global suppliers.

Fourthly, our milk processing sector is already fragmented and inefficient. Reference has been made to the monopoly nature of that sector, but the case is not proven. Of the 10 biggest European processors, none is British. The Office of Fair Trading showed in its earlier study that a dairy processor in the UK cost 4.5p per litre to perform a task carried out in Holland for 2.6p per litre. In Denmark and Holland, vertically integrated farmers co-ops dominate the market.

We are abysmal at product development in this country. Investment has gone into processing, but it has been focused largely on the replacement of antiquated and, sadly—because of the demise of doorstep deliveries—increasingly unwanted bottle plants, not on the development of added value product.

Cheese consumption in the UK is growing. Although we consume a little less than half as much as the French, we produce only one fifth of the amount that the French industry generates. Nevertheless, the profitability of our processing sector is increasing, in marked contrast to that of farmers. This is where the point about monopoly tendencies can be argued.

Finally, the other activities of the dairy farmer have been blighted by BSE. We have discussed that, so I shall not dwell on the matter.

As part of the solution, we need first to encourage the various parts of the milk food chain to discuss together the threats and opportunities that they face. For far too long, the debate has ranged narrowly around the activities of Milk Marque and its machinations. Holstein UK, the representative body of many dairy owners in this country, suggests that "there is a need to actually progress, rather than paying mere lip service to adding value to UK milk production, by product modification, diversification and especially new product development."

Some supermarkets have already started to identify opportunities. Let us ensure that they are met by British milk products. Organic milk remains difficult to source. There are opportunities for longer-life milk products, short of UHT. We have, as I mentioned, a substantial problem in supplying our local cheese market, in which there is a trade deficit, and the same is true of yoghurts.

Secondly, we must help the chain to explore ways in which its processes can be made more efficient and abbreviated. The Minister touched briefly on the role of collective marketing. The role of the Milk Development Council should be reviewed and its brief widened to marketing, if that is what the industry wants it to do.

Thirdly, we must recognise that farmers have to be allowed up the value chain if they are to thrive. By locking Milk Marque out of processing, we may hinder that, and farmers will remain weak sellers in a concentrated market. Falling producer membership, now covering below 40 per cent. of production, as several hon. Members have noted, may anyway break the monopoly relationship to processing, but Milk Marque must recognise its customers' concerns. That is one of the telling criticisms. Traceability of product and consistency of supply are critical in the new marketplace.

Fourthly, we should review the other costs in the chain. The funding of quota purchase and leasing adds about 2.5p per litre to costs. Should we freely allow non-farming quota holders to make a return on an essentially public property? The dairy hygiene inspection charges, like our other agricultural charges, must be compared to those of our EU competitors. We will also need to observe and support the industry's transition from the loss of the calf-processing scheme, and resolve the future of the 30-month scheme. In the medium term, reform and, in my view, eventual abolition of milk quota is essential.

Finally, we must rapidly resolve the remaining uncertainties from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry. That involves further reform of the sale procedures and precise definition of when Milk Marque will cease to be a monopoly supplier, preventing its moving into processing. We should also prepare advice on voluntary steps by Milk Marque that might allow vertical integration to proceed.

Let us look to the future of the sector, which should be a star performer in UK agriculture. Much of the work that I have outlined lies in the industry's hands, but the Government have some crucial tasks. I look forward to the Minister's response.

6.5 pm

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): It is no exaggeration to say that the countryside is in crisis. I agreed with much that the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) said. I shall not deal now with the points on which I disagreed with him as time is short and others want to take part in the debate.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has established a reputation for going around the country, talking and listening to farmers. At the beginning of his speech today, he gave the impression that he would make some important announcement on the future of the dairy industry. Having listened to his whole speech, I was disappointed. The only thing that he promised dairy farmers was a ballot, starting in September and lasting six weeks, on whether there should be a levy for the promotion of milk. No wonder the right hon. Gentleman cannot get the Government business managers—a position that he formerly held—to allow him to make a statement of that magnitude in the House. Perhaps that is surprising, given the way that the Government treat the House of Commons.

If the Minister believes that such a levy will help the long-term future of the dairy industry, he is living in cloud cuckoo land, along with the rest of the Government. The countryside is facing a devastating crisis.

We have heard much about the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report. Yesterday the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry rejected its main conclusions but accepted other parts. As the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said, that is not logical. In the 24 hours since the report was published, I have not managed to study it in detail but I have listened to those who have.

By announcing that he rejects the main conclusions but accepts others, the Secretary of State continues to sow doubt in the dairy industry. The problem is what will happen to dairy prices before he tells us the director general's final recommendation. The time scale on which he has so far dealt with the matter gives great cause for concern.

Let me deal more generally with the crisis in the countryside. I have the privilege to represent a good piece of the Peak district national park and some of the outstandingly beautiful areas of Derbyshire. We have such beautiful countryside because of the way our farmers have looked after and farmed it. I have great fears for the future of the countryside if farmers do not believe that they can earn a living from their farms.

There is a notion that farmers are wealthy people. Some of them are very wealthy, but many are not. Many tenant farmers are finding it extremely difficult to sustain a living off the land. If they were subject to the national minimum wage, the Government would probably close down the farms because they would not meet the criteria.

After a 40-minute speech, the Minister proposed a ballot on a levy to take more money off the farmers. The farmers will be reluctant to see any more money come off their milk price, not because they do not want their industry to be a success but because they fear for their own survival in the long term. What they feel is not annoyance with the Government, but frustration because they can see no way out.

I respect the Minister, but I have to say that I found his speech highly complacent in respect of the position in which a lot of my constituents who are in the dairy industry find themselves—they are struggling to survive. In the Bakewell area, more than 10 have gone out of production in the past few months. Farmers cannot afford to continue producing milk at the prices that they are currently receiving.

Mr. Nick Brown: May I ask the hon. Gentleman candidly what remedy he is urging on me?

Mr. McLoughlin: Some of those that have been mentioned. From the Front Bench, my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) raised five points on which the Minister ought to act—the calf processing scheme is one of them—and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) referred to the 30-month scheme, which he could address shortly. Representations on a number of points have been made to him in the debate and I hope that, because of the number of Members who want to speak, he will not mind if I do not repeat them all.

The fact that the Minister is seized of the growing concern about tuberculosis, which has spread across the north Staffordshire border well into Derbyshire, has come across in the debate. The disease is causing tremendous concern among farmers. I have seen the National Farmers Union letter forecasting the expected growth in TB, but what I have learned about its spread and growth in my constituency suggests that the NFU has probably underestimated the problem we will face. Tuberculosis is a growing problem in north Derbyshire and in various areas below Ashbourne, and it is creeping down to the constituency of the hon. Member for South Derbyshire, which is not too far away. Although I realise that it will take time to get the results of tests, we need them urgently and the Minister ought to consider establishing more trial areas so that conclusive recommendations can be made more speedily.

I want to say a lot more, but we are short of time and many Members want to speak. I say to the Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that we have not raised these matters only because we want to discuss agriculture continually in the Chamber. We think that the Government are getting it wrong in many ways, and the future of the countryside that we love and enjoy is at stake. It is all very well to talk about the protection of sites of special scientific interest, trying to green-up the environment and giving people the right to roam. The way the Government are going, people will have the right to roam because the fields will not be farmed and the countryside will not be in the pleasant state that we expect it to be in. I urge the Government to take action quickly.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in the debate. I freely admit that I am not an agriculture expert and I have spent much of my time in the House dealing with legal reform and working with the legal profession. However, that has given me some insight and I can spot special pleading; when claims are made about the public interest, they are often based on sectional interest.

I have two substantial interests in agriculture. First, there are many farms and agriculture workers in my constituency. Wyre Forest does not contain only trees and towns; it is a beautiful rural area of Worcestershire. When I met the National Farmers Union and dairy farmers last week, they urged me to press Ministers to disclose the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report because that would be the best way to achieve confidence in the agriculture industry. I met my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on Monday and the report was published on Tuesday, although I cannot go back to my NFU members and claim that I had any responsibility for its publication.

My second interest is that I represent about 90,000 people in all, including children. I have been worried about that throughout the debate because the vast majority of my constituents consume milk products. It is tempting to say that consumers have been totally ignored in the debate. Milk is a product; it is put on the market to be sold to consumers. I am concerned that our discussions have centred on the interests of the producers. Consumers have rights as well, the most important of which is the right to a proper, well-regulated and safe supply of milk.

Last year, I had the privilege of visiting the United States. I went to a "Save Family Farms" rally in rural Minnesota. Farmer after farmer complained that his livelihood was being ruined by the collapse of world prices. Two clear points emerged. First, a group in the United States was demanding free trade, flexibility and liberalised markets from every other country in the world, but it complained when those same principles came back to them and were inconvenient. Secondly, complaint after complaint was made against companies that were buying up land and farming at what were freely admitted to be prices with which family farms could not compete. There was opposition to structural change that was taking place in the market and causing enormous damage to family-run farms, but changes in the industry were reducing prices and putting enormous pressure on farmers. Having talked to my farmers in great depth, I wonder whether we are seeing the same sort of structural reform here. That is one reason why there is a price crisis at the moment.

The farmers in my constituency have repeatedly told me that prices are poor. They are—that has been well documented by other hon. Members so I shall not go through the figures—but my farmers also told me that the milk market is being rigged by the dairy companies and the supermarkets. The situation is not straightforward because most of the world trade is in butter and derivative milk products rather than in milk, but paragraph 2.17 of the MMC report confirms that European Union support prices are above world prices and that a cut of 30 per cent. will be needed to bring prices here down to world levels.

Prices in Britain are substantially higher than world prices. Our consumers are paying more, although I have not heard a voice being raised on their behalf. In the years ahead, change will come through the World Trade Organisation and reform of the common agricultural policy. World prices will inevitably come down.

Mr. Gray: Irrespective of what might have happened to consumer prices recently—for all I know, people in this country may be paying the highest consumer price at the supermarket—does not the hon. Gentleman accept that farmers are demonstrably earning less than they have ever earned? Although the supermarkets and the intermediaries may be to blame for the high price to the consumer, farmers are definitely not to blame.

Mr. Lock: I entirely accept that that is right. I urge the Government to listen to the views of my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), who suggested that the way forward is to allow farmers and farmers' co-operatives to add value to their products so that they can retain more of the value that is in the raw milk. They would thus be able to get a true share of the value of what they produce.

Having looked at the MMC report in as much detail as one can overnight, it is interesting that the basic allegation of collusion between the main dairy producers and the supermarkets to keep prices down in the various bidding rounds has simply not been accepted by those who have gone into that matter in enormous detail. I find it astonishing that the report has been rubbished by a number of speakers this afternoon, given that it is doubtful whether anyone has had a chance to look at its detailed substance.

Mr. Tyler: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that work on the report ceased before the latest selling rounds, in which there was clear evidence of the cartel operations of the buyers? I see Labour Members nodding.

Mr. Lock: I obviously accept that that is correct. None the less, the report examined allegations of cartels which were made at that time and then found wanting. Those allegations may be repeated and they may be justified this time.

I want to discuss my farmers' bitter complaints about the cost of quota. Quota has been sold and leased. This is the price that farmers in my constituency are having to pay as part of the overheads involved in the production of milk. It has no benefit for the farmer, or for the consumer; it is purely a price imposed by the system chosen by the last Government in order to introduce quota.

May I make an urgent plea? I feel that, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry considers his response to the report and when my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture considers reform of the quota system, their first priority must be to ensure that the cost goes out of the system. What the farmer receives at the farm gate must surely be the price that he receives to meet his legitimate costs. A process that involves buying or renting quota from a retired farmer, or a middle man who may never have had anything to do with farming in the first place, is simply rigging the market and adding a cost to agriculture that benefits no one except the tiny proportion of people who have quota.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to do all that he can to get rid of that cost, and to ensure that the licence to produce is there only for those who are actually producing.

6.21 pm

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I shall try to be brief, because I know that many hon. Members wish to speak.

I believe that Cheshire farmers have been cheated this afternoon, and that the Government have pulled a fast one by announcing what almost amounts to Government business in Opposition time. In normal circumstances, we would have expected a full statement on the Government's response to the MMC report, and an opportunity to question Ministers; but the subject has been pushed into today's debate. The Government may wish to consider devoting a day's debate to this important issue in their own time. Most hon. Members have not had time to read fully and to absorb the MMC's complicated report, and they would like an opportunity to debate the issues contained in it.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that the dairy industry is experiencing a crisis. Its income is lower than it has been for 60 years, and farming incomes are in free fall. Farmgate milk prices have fallen by nearly a quarter over the last two years—by more than 3p a pint. The situation is disastrous: consumers are not benefiting, but dairy processing companies—the fat cats of the industry—are profiting. The gap between the retail price, which is 25p in stores and approximately 40p for milk delivered to the doorstep, and the price paid to producers—about 10p a pint—has widened dramatically.

Dairy farmers have been disadvantaged by a particularly aggressive market. Some success has been achieved by dairy farmer co-operatives such as Milk Marque, but they face increased concentration of milk processors and retailers. Fewer than 12 major processing companies now exist in the United Kingdom, and there are only four major multiple retailers.

I believe that farmers themselves need to develop processing capacity, and to be able to make the investment that is necessary for the provision of not only world-class processing facilities, but innovation for the future. That investment is also necessary to give producers and farmers a place at the negotiating table. At present, they are excluded from the chain that takes milk from the farm to the shop. That is particularly important in the light of the decision to allocate more milk quotas from 2005 onwards, and the longer-term possibility—I put it no higher than that—of an end to the quota system. We were disappointed recently that the United Kingdom received no increase in quota. Four other countries succeeded—including Eire, which is one of our major competitors.

I am pleased that, at long last, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has published his response to the MMC report, and I am especially pleased that he has rejected the recommendation for Milk Marque to be broken up. Milk Marque does not hold a dominant market position: its share of the raw milk market is only 38 per cent. in the United Kingdom, and only 4 per cent. in European Union terms. What justification is there—what justification could there possibly be—for preventing further moves into processing?

I understand that Milk Marque has been described as a complex monopoly, and that the rules that exist today were established in 1973. The MMC acknowledges that Milk Marque's current processing activities have not been used to enhance its scale monopoly. On what basis do the MMC and the Government conclude that any further advance into processing by Milk Marque would produce a different result? Perhaps the Secretary of State will tell us when he winds up the debate.

Like many others, no doubt, I want a fair deal for farmers, but let us face it: the industry has been left in limbo for many months while the MMC inquiry has been in progress. Nothing erodes confidence in the future more than uncertainty—not knowing what that future holds. Once a decision has been made for better or worse, at least people can plan. At present, however, the industry is in limbo, because the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has kicked the ball back into touch.

Producers are willing to co-operate with processors and retailers alike, and to work together on a commercial basis to bring about the best conclusion for the United Kingdom as a whole. I hope that the Minister, the Secretary of State and others in Government will work towards that end.

I want to refer briefly to two issues that are particularly important to the farming community in Cheshire. The first is the calf processing aid scheme, which has already been mentioned today and whose continuation I consider to be essential. The lifting of the beef export ban was announced in November last year. Since then, not one carcase has been exported to the continent, and the calf processing aid scheme will apparently cease at the end of this month. I think it vital for the scheme to continue until normal export markets have been resumed, and I hope that the Secretary of State or the Minister will give assurances in that regard.

The alternative to rearing calves that would have entered the processing aid scheme would be slaughtering them on farms—not something that any of us would contemplate with an easy mind. That in its turn would lead to a dramatic increase in on-farm burials and, potentially, to animal welfare problems.

There is another compelling reason why the calf processing aid scheme should be retained for the present. Its retention would enable farms that are subject to tuberculosis outbreaks, and therefore to herd restrictions, to prevent overstocking by removing surplus calves, thus avoiding associated animal welfare problems. That factor becomes more telling as the problem with badger tuberculosis becomes increasingly acute.

Those of us who represent dairy industries know of dairy farmers' anxiety about the spread of TB. My hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) said that TB was spreading into the Peak district and into his constituency; my area has also experienced outbreaks in Staffordshire and in Cheshire. The problem is growing at an alarming rate. I hope that the Government will continue to support research into the development of a cattle vaccine, and to investigate all aspects of the origin and transmission of bovine tuberculosis. I endorse all that Opposition Front Benchers have said about that today.

All hon. Members are concerned about what is happening in rural areas. In Cheshire, we have the United Kingdom's foremost dairying county—although I accept that other areas in the United Kingdom might think that they hold that position. In my own area in Cheshire, we farm very productively and very close to large population centres, such as Stoke-on-Trent, the Potteries, the Manchester area, Liverpool and the midlands.

One of the problems facing Milk Marque is the cost of transportation, and the fact that it collects milk from every part of the United Kingdom, including south Wales and the west country. It is very easy for more local dairies to pick off local farmers, as their cost of transporting milk from Cheshire farmers to a dairy in Manchester, for example, is minimal compared with Milk Marque's costs. However, those dairies do not cover the entire United Kingdom.

I hope that more investment will be made in processing, which is a vital element for the future of our dairy sector. In the past, there has been very little such investment and, currently, the private dairy companies are making very little of it. I trust that that situation will be put right.

For all hon. Members who support rural areas, and the part that those areas play in our country—no one could have summed that up better than my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire—I should simply like to say that we are concerned; we wish to see action; and we trust that the Government will, as a priority, act to address our concerns.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): I am pleased to be called to speak—albeit it latterly and speedily—in this very important debate. This morning, I was speaking to a dairy farmer in my constituency, Nick Loftus, who told me of his grandfather, who had farmed a dairy farm in the Fylde, near Blackpool, in the 1920s—when, he said, similar problems existed in the dairy industry. Local dairy farmers had been threatened with a reduction in the milk price from 1½d to 1¼d per gallon. Those local farmers took it into their hands to fight the local dairy by feeding the milk to pigs or pouring it into the drains.

At that time, that method worked, and the dairy backed down. I suspect, however, that such methods would not work now, as the cartel of dairy processing companies would have milk from other locations on site within hours. Over the years, the position of producers has been weakened considerably.

I should say that one is often confused when giving examples from the dairy industry, as some people talk in litres, whereas others talk in pints. Nevertheless, Nick Loftus farms about 1,000 acres, employing five men. Those who are familiar with arable farming will realise that five men are about five times as many as one would have on a comparable-sized arable farm. His farm is in Essex, near Finchingfield, which is alleged to be the most beautiful village in Essex, if not in East Anglia. Nevertheless, although the aspect may be pleasing, the economic returns are very poor indeed.

Nick Loftus's view is quite simply that, if producers are to be strong in the market, they have to combine and to have a processing arm. Throughout history, producers have been in a weak position, but processors and retailers have been in a strong one.

[Mr. Alan Hurst]

Recently, we received the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on Milk Marque. If Milk Marque is a monopoly, it is a very poor one—as its market share has now been reduced to less than 40 per cent. I should much prefer the whole matter to be referred to a body, if there were one, called the cartel commission, so that those who are really milking the system—the producing dairy companies, and perhaps even our friends the supermarkets—might be dealt with. The retail price remains constant, but the producer price falls, and that pattern is occurring not only in the dairy sector.

Whatever faults Milk Marque might have in some aspects of its operation, it is not the key to the problem. It is very surprising to hear suggestions that it would be quite wrong for producers to have a processing arm. As we have heard in the debate, Denmark's milk co-operative has more than 90 per cent. of the Danish market, and it not only produces, but processes.

Moreover, the Danish co-operative—which is now the owner, or part owner of M and D Foods—is processing not only in Denmark, but in my own constituency. Therefore, it is vertically integrating not only in Denmark, but in the United Kingdom. Our own producers are being discouraged from vertically integrating, from adding value and—to put it into English—from going into a profitable part of the sector, so that they might be able to spread their costs and risk.

I am reassured that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture will be examining the matter further, and talking to the interested parties. However, I am sure that I am not alone when I say that we hope that producers will get a fair deal in the sector, and that profits will not simply be skimmed off and taken from producers—not to the benefit of consumers, but to the advantage of those who go between producers and consumers.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I should first declare an interest, as I am the president of a creamery in my constituency. However, I am an unpaid president, with no pecuniary interest in the business.

I follow the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) in saying that, currently, we should be concerned primarily about producers, who are going through a very difficult time. If there are no producers, there will be no consumers. I do not have to remind the House how important the dairy sector is to Wales, as it constitutes 30 per cent. of Wales's agricultural gross domestic product. In the past 20 years, the number of dairy holdings has been more than halved, from 9,000 to 4,000. Two years ago, there were 4,576 such holdings; now, there are 4,078.

Unquestionably, there is a crisis in the dairy sector. Last year, the sector's net farm income fell by 25 per cent. In the past two years—combining the dairy and livestock sectors—average annual net farm income has dropped from £18,527 to £11,524 in 1997–98, and, now, to a mere £6,854. Needless to say, some farmers must be below that average.

The average weekly net farm income is only £130. We cannot build an industry—or expect young people to go into an industry—with those figures. Something has to be done. The net margin per cow is a telling figure—from £333 in 1995–96, to £93 in 1998–99.

At the South Caernarfonshire Creamery, we are concerned that, recently, the market value of our cheddar has decreased by £500—or 20 per cent.—per tonne. The decrease is a consequence partly of imports, and partly of our inability to export because of the value of the pound, which has already been mentioned by other hon. Members. Ironically, in dealing with United Kingdom agriculture's difficulty in competing with Europe's agriculture, only the United Kingdom dairy sector is receiving no European Union agrimonetary compensation.

Plaid Cymru Members welcome the fact that, yesterday, at long last, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report was issued. I am not sure what delayed the report, but at least we have it now. Our reaction to the report must be mixed. We welcome the fact that Ministers will not split up Milk Marque, as now is not the time to add additional uncertainty. Although there may be arguments for considering the matter in the future, we should not consider them now.

We regret very much that the report seems to favour denying Milk Marque the right to develop new processing plant, as such plant is greatly needed. A two-year scheme is about to proceed in Felinfach, investing millions of pounds and creating 70 new jobs, but it seems likely that that scheme will be undermined by the Government's decision. We should very much regret that.

A number of issues have to be addressed urgently. We all understand the problems caused by the high value of the pound—it is hitting not only the dairy sector, but others—but something has to be done about it. We also have to extend processing capacity. We therefore believe that that matter will have to be rethought by both the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

The calf processing scheme, which is due to end on 31 July, must clearly continue because of the difficulties that face the industry. The Government must fund the British cattle movement service beyond 30 September. We also need an urgent review of the anti-competitive impact of the supermarket chains, which is causing farmers great difficulties, but from which consumers do not appear to benefit. Now that the report has been published, I hope that action will follow.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I have two unremunerated interests to declare. I am a vice-president of Devon young farmers—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry may laugh, but there is youth in me yet. Secondly, six months ago Milk Marque put into the public domain an application for a processing plant in Cullompton, giving me a keen constituency interest in the report.

Given the report's importance and the number of questions tabled by both sides of the House, a statement from the Secretary of State would have enabled him to answer questions, and that would have been better than tagging himself on to the end of a Conservative debate on the dairy trade. I shall listen carefully to what he has to say.

We have sought to persuade the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food of the urgent situation facing the dairy trade. The Minister has a reputation for listening, and I felt that he was trying to respond to the crisis when he spoke. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) testified to the devastating experiences of their constituents, and I could add to what they said. My first Trade and Industry question from the Dispatch Box flagged up the urgency of the problems facing dairy farmers, many of whom see this month's selling round as the time at which to decide whether to stay in business or call it a day.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Does my hon. Friend accept that dairy farmers hanging on by their fingernails and preparing to decide during the next week or two whether to remain in business will be dismayed by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report, which creates another six months of uncertainty over the structure of Milk Marque?

Mrs. Browning: Indeed; my hon. Friend is right. The Government's response to the report is inconsistent, and further delay faces farmers. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry should take the opportunity provided by the debate to unlock the grip on the industry and to set some fears to rest. I hope that his response will be long on action and short on rhetoric.

Raw milk processing is a large industry, but we have been slow to change in favour of the culture of farmer co-operatives adopted in many European countries. Labour Members may think it strange that mere Conservatives should praise co-operative movements, but my advocacy is not new. My background is in marketing, and in considering how value can be added to products brought to market, I have admired examples from across the channel of farmers coming together to invest in packaging, marketing and transport in order to take a larger share of the single market. Lessons can be learned from those examples, and my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) was right to say that farmers in the dairy trade are increasingly prepared to work that way.

The Minister of Agriculture said that vertical integration should be encouraged at the core of industry. I agree. Milk Marque makes a good case for wanting to process. A presentation in support of Milk Marque notes that there is no UK dairy processor in Europe's top 10, despite the UK position as the third largest milk-producing country in the EU behind France and Germany. Of the top 10 EU processors, six are farmer-controlled co-operatives. It is a tried and tested path.

The UK produces 14 billion litres of milk a year, but no UK company processes even 2 billion litres. By contrast, in Holland, a country that produces only 11 billion litres of milk a year, two companies—Friesland Coberco and Campina Melkunie—dominate the scene. Both are co-operatives, vertically integrated from farm to factory. In Denmark, the same pattern applies, with 90 per cent. of milk produced on Danish farms and processed and marketed in that way. Our sector is asking to operate on the same level playing field, and it is unbelievable that we must wait to find out whether the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will let British farmers and companies take their product to market. If the single market is to mean anything, our farmers must have the same opportunities as others.

The Minister of Agriculture questioned our motion's desire to strengthen Milk Marque. There is nothing ambiguous in that. My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) has pointed out, and I shall reiterate, that Milk Marque wants to process so that it can take products to market with value added. The Government's amendment says that "the industry itself must help shape its own future".

What more can it do? It has not come to the Government with a begging bowl, but is asking to be allowed to compete and to develop its product in the same way as its competitors.

The Prime Minister was questioned on that point by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) this afternoon. It was extraordinary to hear him say that the contents of the report meant that allowing Milk Marque to expand and to process its own product would involve Government subsidy. The Minister will want to put his Prime Minister right, as the latter seems not to be up to speed. There is no question of Milk Marque's asking for public money.

Mr. Nick Brown: I am trying to follow the hon. Lady's argument. Is she urging the Government to reject the MMC report?

Mrs. Browning: In considering breaking up Milk Marque, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry must consider carefully whether or not to accept the report. It is in his gift to decide. I ask him to consider Milk Marque's request on processing, which would allow it to take its place in the market.

When it comes to import substitution, value-added products will appear on supermarket shelves, which are a huge growth area for the dairy sector. If those products are not British, they will be imported products. Some may even have been produced from UK milk. Earlier this year, the Dutch bought liquid milk from the UK—there are no borders because we are in a single market—but the UK consumer and producer will find those products back on our supermarket shelves.

When new Labour came to power two years ago, Labour Members' bleepers continually told them to repeat two words at us in every speech from the Front or Back Benches—fairness and justice. Milk Marque and British dairy farmers are asking for no more than fairness and justice. They want fairness in the marketplace so that they can compete on a level playing field, and justice so that United Kingdom producers have the opportunity—it is down to them at the end of the day—to put their products on the supermarket shelf so that we do not have to buy from foreign competition.

I hope that the Secretary of State will use the opportunity to release the industry from its shackles, as it is in his gift to make sure that the industry can compete and is viable so that British dairy farmers can look to the future instead of considering whether to call it a day.

6.50 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Stephen Byers): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) on her promotion to shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I am sure that the whole House is pleased that her personal circumstances allow her to accept a well-deserved promotion and take her rightful place on the Opposition Front Bench.

[Mr. Stephen Byers]

The MMC report is a substantial document. I welcome the opportunity of accounting to the House for my decision on the report on the supply of raw milk in Great Britain and of answering some of the questions that have been raised during this afternoon's debate.

Let me start by explaining to the hon. Lady why I did not make a statement to the House yesterday. She will be aware that when an MMC report contains commercially sensitive information, it is not the subject of a statement to the House, since the City would have notice of such a statement's being made and that might not be appropriate. That practice has been adopted by successive Governments.

The MMC report was clear. It found that Milk Marque was operating in a way that was against the public interest. In my view, that related to the conduct of its sales procedure. The MMC identified two possible remedies to address the abuse by Milk Marque of its monopoly position. It recommended an enforced break-up of Milk Marque. I rejected that recommendation. However, I accepted the view that we should address what I consider to be the key issue—the selling process that Milk Marque has operated.

It was not an easy decision, as it not usual to disagree with a clear recommendation from the MMC. It is one reason why the report took longer to publish than I would have liked; I understand the concerns expressed by many right hon. and hon. Members this afternoon and by the farming community, particularly the dairy farmers, about the delay in its publication. I wanted to publish the report as soon as possible and I have done that. I would have liked it to be sooner, but I wanted to make sure when it was published and I had put on record my decision that all avenues had been properly investigated.

When I gave evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry some two and a half months ago, I said that I would ensure that the report was published by the summer recess. I am pleased to say that I have managed to do that with some two weeks to spare.

I was not prepared to accept the MMC recommendation to enforce the break-up of Milk Marque because I believed that it would lead to a period of uncertainty. That would be the last thing the dairy industry wanted after the uncertainty of recent weeks.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. Although I applaud his decision not to break up Milk Marque, at least a break-up would have allowed the various companies within it to develop processing. Will he look again at the serious issue of allowing Milk Marque to carry out processing?

Mr. Byers: I shall address processing and vertical integration specifically as the issue has been raised by several right hon. and hon. Members this afternoon. The hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) referred to the need for diversification and vertical integration in the processing industry.

In 1992, the Conservative Government decided not to allow Dairy Crest, the processing subsidiary of the former milk marketing boards, to be transferred to Milk Marque. They decided that it would not be appropriate to allow vertical integration. Since then, vertical integration has occurred in two areas. The MMC specifically addressed the point of whether vertical integration should take place, concluding:

"Although we did not find that Milk Marque was exploiting the scale monopoly situation in respect of its current vertically integrated processing activities, we consider that the planned enlargement of its vertically integrated processing capacity will give Milk Marque the ability to exploit still further the scale monopoly situation in its favour and it may therefore be expected to operate against the public interest."

In the light of that clear recommendation, I decided that there should be no expansion of its milk marketing operations unless sanctioned by the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Tyler: What level of market share can or should Milk Marque fall to before the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to review the position?

Mr. Byers: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the review is decided by the director general of Fair Trading. The rules were established by the previous Government. It is a matter for the director general to refer Milk Marque to the competition authorities. That power was conferred on him by the previous Conservative Administration.

I turn to the point that was raised by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) about the difficulties that would be created by the adoption of the interim remedies that I have put in place. I was particularly aware of the difficulties caused by the report's being published at this time, just as the new selling round was about to commence. I have received strong representations, including from Mr. Ben Gill, the president of the National Farmers Union, about the difficulties that would be created if we were to implement the interim remedies immediately. I have taken the view that it would be unfair to impose them at such short notice. I therefore propose that the interim remedies recommended by the MMC should not apply to the selling round that is about to begin. However, I shall require the director general to report to me within three months of the publication of the report on the undertakings received from Milk Marque.

Several hon. Members have also raised concerns about the six-month period in which I have asked the director general to discuss with Milk Marque and other interested parties the reform of the selling process. It is not a maximum of six months. If agreement can be reached sooner rather than later, I shall be pleased to receive recommendations within the six-month period. It would be great for the industry if agreement were reached before the next selling round early next year, and if the industry and the director general made some positive proposals. I hope that Milk Marque recognises that opportunity. I look forward to the day when it proposes a selling round and a process that can be agreed by the director general, since that would make an important contribution to ensuring that Milk Marque had a strong future ahead of it.

As our amendment makes very clear, we wish to strike a balance between the interests of the dairy industry and the interests of consumers. It would have been totally irresponsible of me, as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and in the light of the MMC report, to ignore its findings. By rejecting the imposed break-up of Milk Marque, but by allowing further time for consultation and discussion about the selling process, I have sought to balance those—sometimes conflicting—interests.

I look forward to the time when, in partnership, we can meet the consumer's interests through a healthy and thriving dairy industry. I believe that the decisions that we have taken following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report will provide us with the facility to do precisely that. I urge the House to reject the motion and support the amendment.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Clelland and
Mr. Mike Hall.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises the economic difficulties faced by the dairy industry; supports the Government's efforts to reform the Common Agricultural Policy during the recent Agenda 2000 negotiations in order to move towards a freer, more competitive market; welcomes the publication of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of raw milk; notes its conclusions and looks forward to a new selling system being in place which meets the needs both of consumers and the dairy industry; endorses the Government's view that the industry itself must help shape its own future; and congratulates the Government for its support for industry initiatives to achieve this.

Education (Choice and Diversity)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): We now come to the second debate on the Opposition motions. I must advise the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.13 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the reduction in choice and diversity in education caused by the Government's abolition of grant maintained status, introduction of ballots to close grammar schools and restriction on the ability of schools to determine their own ethos; notes with concern the threat posed to school sixth forms by the Government's review of post-16 education; condemns the pursuit of uniformity at the expense of diversity; believes that the increasing bureaucratic burdens placed on schools, teachers and governors by the Government and its practice of holding back funding at the centre, to be allocated on the basis of a complicated bidding process, have a particularly adverse impact on rural schools; and further believes that these policies will damage children's education.

I welcome the opportunity to start this debate—particularly as the Government have not initiated a separate debate on education for the best part of a year—and to set out the damage that the Government are doing to education. Schools and children are suffering as a result of the increases in bureaucracy and centralisation, and of the reductions in choice and diversity. The abolition of grant-maintained status, the ballots to close grammar schools, the restrictions on schools' ability to determine their own ethos—all those policies are aimed at establishing greater uniformity and permitting less choice.

The Government make rigid policy prescriptions from the centre, for example on class sizes and on how money can be spent. That, together with increasing bureaucracy from the centre, has caused real problems for schools. Nowhere are such problems felt more keenly than in rural areas. Small rural schools are under particular threat. Reduced class sizes, and hence lower school numbers, have led to cuts in funding, while prescription by Government takes no account of the different needs of rural schools. In addition, increased bureaucracy is especially difficult for a small school with few teachers.

It is time that the Government woke up to the reality of their policies and realised that, despite their rhetoric, the reality is that education is being damaged and children are suffering.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): I note that the motion states that education will be damaged under the Government's policies. Will the hon. Lady comment on the record of achievement of the previous Tory Government? While that Government were in power, the number of exclusions rose, as did illiteracy levels. There were also more unqualified school leavers, and class sizes grew. Under the Tories, did not choice in education mean education for a few, and poor education for the many?

Mrs. May: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was about to give the page number from which he was quoting in his brief. I am more than happy to comment on the introduction of the national curriculum, which the Labour Government accept, as they accept standard assessment tests, Ofsted and many of the other things that the previous Government introduced.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): My hon. Friend referred to the difference between rhetoric and reality. Last Friday, I visited St. Joseph's school, a small Roman Catholic school in my constituency. The headmistress told me that she had been led to understand that, under the Government's proposals for the so-called national grid for learning, the amount of money that she would receive would be properly assessed. However, the reality was that she was given a formula funding that took no account of her many hours of hard work to present her case for the school. Does that not support my hon. Friend's contention?

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising the issue of what happened at that school. It supports what I have said, and what I intend to say later in my speech, about the Government's lack of flexibility. The Government constantly prescribe from the centre: Whitehall, and not the schools, decides how the money will be spent.

Liz Blackman (Erewash): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No, I shall make progress.

Since the Government came to power in May 1997, there has been a lot of activity with regard to education, but it is a pity that so much has been destructive. The focus has been on damaging good schools and on drawing power away from local level and into the centre. That much is borne out by the example given just now by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack).

We should make no mistake: in the past two weeks, with regard to local authority spending and the post-16 review, the Department for Education and Employment has taken further "steps to reinforce its unenviable reputation as the most centralist Department in government", and brought forward proposals that

"represent a centralist approach, with significant powers and budgets controlled by unelected people responsible to Whitehall, not local communities."

Those are not my words, nor even the words of a Conservative Member. They are the words of Sir Jeremy Beecham, chairman of the Local Government Association and Labour's most senior councillor. [Interruption.] They are a sad comment indeed on the way in which this Government are taking power away from local level—from local education authorities, schools and parents.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Did my hon. Friend note the scornful reception that Sir Jeremy Beecham's name received among Labour Members?

Mrs. May: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment, and I agree that the reception was scornful. Sir Jeremy has given years of service to his party as a councillor. I am sure that other Labour councillors, and Sir Jeremy Beecham himself, will have noted how his views are being cast aside.

That happens all the time. The Government are not interested in the views of people who understand what is happening in schools and local authorities. They are interested only in their own rhetoric, their own press releases and their own headlines. The Government are interested more in telling parents and teachers what to do than in raising standards.

[Mrs. May]

As I have said, the Government do not take any notice of what actually happens in schools. Ministers take no notice of what teachers say and have turned their back on the teaching profession. I know also the ridicule with which my next comment will be met: perhaps they should take heed of today's comment from the National Union of Teachers:

"The Prime Minister and his Government are caught in the web they have spun for themselves. They cannot gain the respect of the profession through imposition."

Jacqui Smith (Redditch): Does the hon. Lady still think that the literacy hour is too long?

Mrs. May: The hon. Lady will have to come up with something better than that. I suggest that she looks at the research from the university of Warwick, which suggests that the literacy hour should be split into different sessions, rather than all being in one session. I suggest that she looks at the impact of the hour on more able pupils, because it is failing them.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: I will take one more intervention and then make some progress.

Fiona Mactaggart: On that point and on the hon. Lady's point about how the NUT is right, did she share my concern about the NUT suggestion that the literacy hour should be an entitlement for teachers to train in, rather than an entitlement for children to learn in?

Mrs. May: One of the problems with the literacy hour is that it takes professional judgment away from teachers. We all believe in raising literacy standards, but I suggest that the hon. Lady asks some teachers in primary schools about the matter, as I do frequently. One said to me that the hour was an insult to teachers. I suggest that she thinks about that.

I shall look in more detail at the impact of Government policy in several areas. GM schools have found to their cost that all the Government's protestations, when the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 went through, that they would level up school funding so that GM schools did not lose out were just so many words. Throughout the country, former GM schools find themselves with budget cuts, forced to look at sacking teachers, increasing class sizes, stopping classes—a variety of measures are having to be taken as a result of Government policy.

I have several quotes from GM schools setting out their problems. A primary school in Derbyshire says:

"The gap between government rhetoric and economic truth is breath-taking . . . the children in most need are the ones most threatened by these actions".

A school in Bolton says that the policy will mean an estimated 15 per cent. reduction in teaching staff. Gloucestershire primary schools say:

"we would not be able to maintain the current level of teachers per class plus non-teaching head, a reduction in non-teaching staff and no time for staff to monitor teaching and the curriculum".

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): Is the hon. Lady prepared to accept that those comments from the schools were prior to my decision and announcement at the Association of Heads of Foundation and Aided Schools conference, which now incorporates GM schools? Just 10 days ago, the announcement was welcomed by Bob Lloyd, the new chair of that organisation, who said:

"This is good news for all schools. We are delighted that David Blunkett has listened to the concerns. He is now taking action to ensure all schools are properly resourced".

Does that not show that, although she may been told those facts by schools before I made the announcement, she is now entirely wrong?

Mrs. May: I do not accept that I am entirely wrong because those are problems that the schools are facing today, regardless of the future extra funding that the Government have said that they might put in place. Following his statement to that conference, the word that I am hearing from GM schools is that they are very concerned about the future. They still have to face difficult decisions and budgetary problems in relation to the future of teachers and classes, despite what the Secretary of State has just said.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): On the same point, does the hon. Lady accept that, under the previous Administration, the vast majority of schools in Britain made those comments because, under her party's policy, additional money went to a few schools that were grant maintained, at the expense of the vast majority, which had to pay for that?

Mrs. May: That comment does not deserve a response. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the money for GM schools in addition to the money that was given to local authority schools was spent otherwise on bureaucracy at local authority level.

Sutton Grant Maintained Schools Finance Group has written to the Secretary of State. It has pointed out that it has nearly £1 million less than is required to maintain staffing and curriculum just at last year's levels. In Liverpool, there was concern that changes in the budget "would result in larger class sizes and possible loss of smaller subjects from the curriculum, thus producing a detrimental effect on pupils' education".

In Warwickshire, GM schools have spoken about having to do some or all of the following: increase class sizes; lose a second language in key stage 3; reduce option choices at key stage 4; more teaching of second subjects by teachers and the use of non-specialists in some areas; reduction of some special needs support; post-16 reduction in schools with sixth forms; some schools having to consider redundancies this year and the next.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: I will in a minute.

Whatever the Government may say about GM schools funding, the blame lies fairly and squarely at the Secretary of State's door. I quote a letter to the Secretary of State from a head teacher of a GM school in Kent:

"The fundamental working principles that are emerging from the Department, which are being cascaded down through the LEA to schools, is increasing bureaucracy, reducing delegation and restricting school management. In an attempt to curb LEAs' control of funds and educational management, the Department appears to be moving towards even greater centralisation."

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): That is exactly the experience that two head teachers from my Leicestershire constituency recounted to me at the end of last week. Far from the Labour party policy of education, education, education producing good results, it has been translated directly into lose a teacher, lose a teacher, lose a teacher.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that intervention. He points out again to the Government the reality of their policies.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. May: I have not finished responding to the intervention.

The Government's policies mean that teachers are being made redundant, schools are increasing class sizes, and some courses are having to be stopped or taught by non-specialist teachers. The blame lies fairly and squarely at the Secretary of State's door.

Miss Johnson rose—

Mrs. May: I apologise to the hon. Lady and give way.

Miss Johnson: Will the hon. Lady comment on the decision of the new Tory leader of Hertfordshire county council, who, at the policy committee on 1 July, told the new council that it would not be spending all the 6 per cent.—£27 million—extra that the Government will allocate to Hertfordshire next year on education, but would be cutting the increase to schools? Does she support that new Tory leader, or will she dissociate herself from those actions?

Mrs. May: The budget that was set for this year by Hertfordshire county council was the budget that was set by the Labour authority, to which the Secretary of State had to write to complain about Labour councillors' decisions.

All the GM schools that I have quoted will, I am sure, do their best for the children in their classrooms.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No. I will make some progress.

As GM schools suffer from the impact of Government policy, so that impact will ultimately fall on children in the classroom. Abolishing grant-maintained status reduces diversity.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. May: I will make a little more progress, if my hon. Friend will allow me.

Threats to grammar schools also threaten diversity, as do the actions of a number of Labour-controlled councils that have chosen to refer policies of partial selection to the adjudicator.

Earlier today in Prime Minister's Questions, the Prime Minister tried to put the blame elsewhere, but parents know that he said two years ago in the Wirral:

"A Labour government will not close your grammar schools. That is my personal guarantee."

His Government introduced ballots that are rigged in favour of those who want to get rid of grammar schools. In some ballots, parents of children at the grammar school will not even have a vote. And now we hear—surprise, surprise—that Labour activists are fighting to abolish grammar schools throughout the country.

Good schools should not be closed down; they should be encouraged and, where appropriate, helped to expand. We should preserve the best and improve the rest, not abolish the best and prescribe for the rest.

What of the part played by Labour councils, which are now referring partial selection policies to adjudicators and trying to abolish even that limited selection? Once again, Labour shows that it has no interest in providing the right education for each child. That move by Government—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. May: It is a long time since I had offers from four men all at once. I think that I saw the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) rise first.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): The theme of this debate is choice and diversity. In my constituency in Kent, there is no choice of secondary education because there is only a selective education system. There are no comprehensives within that system. If the hon. Lady believes in choice and diversity, will she join me in the campaign to introduce comprehensive education to Kent so that we have choice and diversity?

Mrs. May: I assume that that means that the hon. Gentleman will be one of the Labour activists out there fighting to abolish grammar schools in his constituency. I hope that the parents let him know exactly what they think about that.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware that 90 per cent. of all my secondary schools in Gloucestershire are grant maintained? They chose to become so because they wanted to manage their own affairs. Now, they are being penalised. There will be larger class sizes and we will lose teachers because of the Government's policies. Is that not a disgrace?

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is right, it is a disgrace and it is children who will suffer. Children's education will suffer because of the Government's dogmatic intent to get rid of grant-maintained status.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) rose—

Mrs. May: I shall make a little progress before I give way.

[Mrs. May]

That move by Government to reduce choice and diversity is linked with a reduction in flexibility at local level. Lack of flexibility—for example the lack of flexibility in infant class sizes—is hitting rural schools particularly hard. That policy means, for example, that at Broomley First school in Stocksfield, Northumberland, a rota is being proposed in which three pupils from the 33-strong year 2 class will drop down to year 1, which has only 25 pupils, for three two-hour sessions a day. That migration involving nine youngsters a day would allow both classes to remain below the Government's 30-pupil target.

The director of education for Northumberland county council has said that he believes that many other schools will find themselves struggling when 30-pupil limits become mandatory in 2001. The director said:

"Mr. Blair promised that all early years children would be in classes of under 30, and while that sounds great at the ballot box, it causes real difficulties in practice.

Broomley was faced with a dilemma . . . From 2000, all year one and two classes will have to be below 30, and what you're seeing here could be multiplied many times over because of the rigidity of the Government rules. I think the Government ought to rethink this particular policy."

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): An avalanche will descend on the Government's shoulders judging by my experience with primary schools in my constituency, some of which are the best in Buckinghamshire. Parents are writing to me about that very matter. Years 1 and 2 are being mixed up to meet totally barmy criteria. Sometimes, three or four children are being moved from classes when there was no difficulty in teaching 33 or 34 children previously.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is right. Yet again, it is due to the fact that the Government will not allow schools to decide what is best for children at the local level. Schools that have been providing good education for their children are having to disrupt themselves and move children around in that way. Some parents are finding that their parental choice is being taken away.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): May I clarify the Opposition's policy? Is she telling my constituents that it is all right for classes to be greater than 30? My head teachers tell me that the Government's policy of 30 children to a class is working and is giving more diversity and better education to their children. Is the hon. Lady saying that it is Conservative policy to increase class sizes and to have more than 30 in a class?

Mrs. May: It is important to have flexibility at local level to decide class sizes. That is the policy that we adopted during the passage of the School Standards and Framework Bill. Unfortunately, the Government have set their face against that flexibility. As a result, schools such as those in the Buckinghamshire constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) have to turn children away, move them between classes or introduce mixed age groups when they had not had them before, all of which could disrupt children's education. That is the reality of what is happening and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman considers what is happening throughout the country as a result of the Government's policy. It is a question not merely of disruption in the classroom, but of potential teacher losses.

Again, I am about to do something that will cause laughter on the Labour Benches because I am going to quote another teacher trade union, the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, which surveyed a number of schools in England and Wales. The results showed expected job losses of 2,051 teaching posts nationally. A member of the ATL from Sefton borough council said:

"Class size reduction policy has given huge amounts to two primary schools to build extra classrooms and reduce the intake . . . of all other schools. The result is that the two . . . schools now take over 900 pupils while the rest crumble."

Again, that shows the reality of what is happening at the grassroots.

The Government may well say that it is all right because they are putting much more money in to reduce class sizes. However, it is not as easy as that. In The Times Educational Supplement last week, Mike Baker wrote an article about the problems of his local primary school. He said:

"the schools where I live have a very high proportion of primary classes of 30-plus pupils. Under pressure from the Government, the council plans to reduce class sizes . . . If my daughter's school cuts class sizes it would be turning away even more children from a good and popular school."—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must not have these exchanges—in particular the sedentary exchanges between those on the two Front Benches.

Mrs. May: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Mr. Baker continued:

"It has no space to expand and has too many 'temporary' classrooms which have been there for decades."

The school had a policy to deal with that problem: the junior school would move into the infant school and a new infant school would be built. However, the infant school was to be built on a playing field and the Government's playing field policy came into play. So, as Mike Baker says:

"you can see why this issue has become a spaghetti junction of contradictory national policies: class sizes, popular schools, playing fields".

He continues:

"It is sobering to realise that as Whitehall and Westminster increase their centralising power over education, it is local education issues which most excite parents. At a time when some question the role of local authorities, it is interesting to see how it is often locally-elected councillors who feel the heat generated by conflicting national policies."

That is a view with which Sir Jeremy Beecham might, I suspect, agree.

Today, I heard of another problem resulting from the class size problem. In the village of South Marston in Wiltshire, we have a school with 96 pupils. Because of the class size pledge to reduce classes to 30 children, the school needs an extra teacher and an extra classroom. The Government have given it money for an extra teacher, but have turned down its two applications for an extra classroom. What is the point of having an extra teacher if there is nowhere for them to teach?

It is in rural areas that so many of the problems are now coming to the fore. Indeed, the Local Government Association is mounting a three-phase campaign to highlight the difficulties encountered by rural schools, many of which are faced with closure. In March 1998, the then Minister for School Standards, the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers) announced on television that he was introducing "tough new protection for village schools".

The Government, he said,

"have put in place safeguards and measures that will protect rural primary schools".

He should try telling that to the parents of children at Berkley Church of England school in Somerset, or the nine-year-old who has written to me about the closure, saying:

"I was shocked and upset to hear the proposal of the closure of my school . . . I can't see how Somerset county council can shut down our school that has just had an excellent Ofsted and Distinction in our last Choral speaking Exam. We put on plays and concerts in St Mary's Church and each time extra seats need to be provided.

I have had a great time and Education at Berkley and all other Pupils will say the same, another thing we all agree with is that we are PROUD of our School and won't let anyone Close it."

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): Before the hon. Lady continues as the new champion of rural schools, will she say something about the 500 that her party closed when it was last responsible for the governance of schools? Will she particularly say something to those in my home county of Norfolk about the 100 schools that her party closed? The £2 million that this Government are investing to reduce class sizes is helping rural schools in my environment, as is the building work that is going on. For the first time in 20 years, there is a feeling of optimism in our Norfolk villages.

Mrs. May: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman tells that to the residents of Potter Heigham, where their school is closing.

The Government simply do not understand the needs of rural areas, such as the high cost of school transport and the necessity for many parents to use their cars to take their children to school. Funding is an issue in rural areas. It is not only shire counties and shire unitary authorities that have done badly from the Government's funding settlement.

Mr. Blunkett: Just to show that we all know exactly what we are doing, perhaps the hon. Lady will tell me how many children attend Potter Heigham school, which she has used as an example of how badly we are doing?

Mrs. May: The Secretary of State will know that the impending closure of Potter Heigham school and the impact of the Government's decisions on it caused considerable concern in the village. [HON. MEMBERS: "How many?"] In fact, such concerns—

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): Potter Heigham school is in my constituency. The failure of the Labour and Liberal Democrat-controlled local education authority to support that school led many parents to take their children away from it. [HON. MEMBERS: "How many?"] The school has almost closed thanks to this Government's policies. [Laughter.] Government Back Benchers' laughter is a absolute disgrace and will horrify many parents living in Potter Heigham.

Mr. Blizzard: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for hon. Members to conceal the truth from this House that Potter Heigham school has three pupils?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair; it is a matter for debate.

Mrs. May: In rural areas, funding has always been an issue, but the Government have never understood the funding problems faced in many of them. That is why the Minister for School Standards wrote to North Yorkshire county council to explain that Hull gets more funding per pupil because of social deprivation—as if rural areas have never suffered from deprivation. Rural areas face particular challenges, but they differ greatly. That is why flexibility is especially important.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No. I have taken many interventions, so I want to continue.

Many rural schools are most frustrated at the way in which the Government are holding back funds to be spent on projects chosen from the centre, and not on those that would best suit the needs of children in such schools. Many rural schools are worried about the possible closure of school sixth forms as a result of the review that the Government are initiating, which allows for two options for funding—both of which rely on the Secretary of State telling the bodies concerned how much money to spend.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Three pupils!

Mrs. May: There are many problems in education today. Through their opposition to school freedom, local decision making and the provision of education that is right for each child, the Government are reducing choice and diversity in pursuit of uniformity. Teachers and schools are weighed down by the Government's bureaucratic burdens and the constant flow of prescription from the centre. In all of that, those who will suffer most are the children.

Mr. McNulty: Three!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not want again to have to call hon. Members to order for repeated seated interruptions.

Mrs. May: I think that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) was marking his own interventions.

I want schools to be set free, teachers to be allowed to get on with teaching, parents to be able to choose for their children and children to be helped and encouraged to develop their full potential. I object to the Government's policies not just because they restrict schools, prescribe to teachers and reduce parents' choice, but because they damage children's education. I encourage all hon. Members who are interested in children's education to vote with me in support of the motion.

7.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): I genuinely wanted to be able to congratulate the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) on her first speech from the Front Bench as shadow Secretary of State. I thought that she was doing fine until she mentioned Sir Jeremy Beecham. At that point, she misunderstood an "Ooh-ah Cantona" as an attack on Sir Jeremy rather than an echo of Opposition Members' applause for him. We all agree that local government is critical and that we should ensure maximum flexibility locally, but I want to make one or two things clear before I respond to the hon. Lady's speech.

If local authorities like Tory-controlled Buckinghamshire or Northumberland cannot manage to operate our class size pledge without causing the disruption that the hon. Lady has described, we will do it for them. If they are not capable of managing it, they should let us know. The task of coming up with the plans, with the schools, has been devolved to them. It is decentralist. It is not bureaucratic; it is not being run from Sanctuary buildings. It is being run in conjunction with schools and authorities.

Secondly, if Opposition Members are to give the hon. Lady information and she is to use it in this House, she should for God's sake ensure that she has done her homework on it. If she uses an example of a school in north Norfolk in which there are only three pupils—[HON. MEMBERS: "That is not the point."] It is exactly the point; this debate is on diversity and choice. Who has made the choice of which school their children attend in north Norfolk? The parents have made that choice.

Mr. Prior: It was the choice of the LEA to close that school. Following that decision, it was not surprising that parents chose to send their children elsewhere.

Mr. Blunkett: But why was the decision made to close the school? [Interruption.] I am hearing interesting heckling, but I am addressing my remarks to the hon. Gentleman. Why was the decision taken? Was it because the school was succeeding and parents were flooding it with their children, or because the school was struggling and had received a particularly unfortunate Ofsted report and parents had ceased to support it by sending their children there? That is the essence of the debate about diversity and choice. If we want choice and diversity to be in the hands of parents, they should be able to take the decisions to back that up, including having a vote on whether they want a selective system for children aged 11.

None of that comes as a surprise. The hon. Member for Maidenhead is very charming. I do not mind saying that because her husband is here tonight and I want to protect her from the slur that she has made against herself by saying that it was a long time since four men at once were after her. I wondered when the previous time had been. Last year, in her previous Front-Bench Opposition job, she said famously that we had inherited a golden legacy. I have thought about that a lot since. The Conservatives' golden legacy started with early years. They refused initially to accept that nursery provision was necessary for anyone but the better-off, who could pay for it. When they changed their view and reverted to the commitment made by Baroness Thatcher in the early 1970s to expand nursery education, they decided to do it through the voucher scheme.

What was the impact of the voucher scheme? It started to create market chaos in which providers were put out of business, particularly in Norfolk. The previous Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), would never accept that she was damaging her county by undermining choice where diversity did not exist. Expanding to ensure a nursery place for all four-year-olds and putting in place admissions policies for infants which ensure that children cannot be denied a place because they had not gone to the nursery school attached to that infants school has increased choice and diversity.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that in rural areas such as Staffordshire, which has small villages without local schools, the voucher system enabled nursery groups to be set up? With the abolition of the voucher system, those groups have had to close, resulting in the children either being unable to go to nursery schools in neighbouring larger towns or being shipped in by parents at great cost?

Mr. Blunkett: But 900 playgroups closed in the last year of the Conservative regime. We have intervened to put an extra £500,000 in, expanding the amount of money available to the Pre-School Learning Alliance. Whatever the attacks on the Government, we shall continue to support that diversity. As we double the number of nursery places for three-year-olds over the next three years, we shall create even more places in rural as well as urban areas.

The golden legacy on class sizes left 500,000 youngsters aged five to seven in classes of more than 30. We are taking the positive action that parents have demanded.

Mrs. May: The Secretary of State talks about the figures for closures of pre-school playgroups. Will he accept the figures produced by the Pre-School Learning Alliance that over the past two years 1,500 pre-schools have closed and there is an expectation that 1,700 will close over the next year?

Mr. Blunkett: I do not accept those figures, because we have to consider those that are opening as well as those that are closing. We have to take into account the resources that have been put in, the opportunities that have been gained and the working party that has been established to ensure that we provide diversity. We can give a clear role to the Pre-School Learning Alliance and other bodies in providing for younger children as well as for four-year-olds. That is linked to our child care strategy. We are linking nursery with other playgroup activity and providing an opportunity for parents to make the decision.

In the end, parents will choose. That is what the debate is about. If they have a choice between a pre-school group and a nursery and they choose the nursery, who am I to intervene? I ask rhetorically, of course, because we are all in favour of diversity and choice. We are in favour of it for those 500,000 youngsters who, through no fault of their own, found themselves in classes of more than 30 at a crucial moment in their education when class size makes a difference. We know that it does because everybody tells us—Ofsted tells us, research tells us, those who buy in the private sector tell us—so we are doing something about it by expanding the number of places in popular schools. We have already added 12,000 places. By September we shall have removed 300,000 of the 500,000 youngsters from over-sized classes in infants schools. That is a good record that I am proud of. If there are hiccups, we shall help the schools and the county councils to sort them out with extra facilities and extra teachers.

What about choice and diversity and the golden legacy of the two out of every five children who could not read, write and add up at the age of 11 when we came to office? What about our terrible imposition of a literacy hour and a numeracy hour? Yes, a full hour. Some 90 per cent. of heads have said that it is working and they welcome it. On Monday, when I went to Wesley Green school on the Blackbird Leys estate in Oxford, I found that the teachers were over the moon, the pupils were enthusiastic and the school had doubled the number of children reaching level 4 in literacy this year and trebled the number of children reaching level 4 in numeracy having piloted the numeracy programme. That is real choice and diversity that offers proper standards rather than rubbish for some and excellence for others.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept the criticism that has been levelled against the Government by schools in my constituency that every hour of the literacy hour requires at least three or four hours of preparation by the teacher? That takes them away from being in the classroom.

Mr. Blunkett: That would be a shame if it were true, but the literacy framework and the materials provided with it have given a structure and the back-up to help all teachers, including newly qualified teachers. I meet NQTs all the time and they say that it is a phenomenal change and a real improvement. Linked to a new induction from September, it will make an enormous difference to them. They do not have to reinvent the wheel, but simply have to use what works best across the board.

Dr. Stoate: When I visited Knockall school in my constituency, I found those there delighted by the literacy hour. I took part in it with the children and the teachers. They were even more delighted about piloting the numeracy hour. I was astounded by the numeracy of the children in year 5. I was at Fleetdown school this morning, which was also doing extremely well in the literacy hour. Those schools are examples of success in delivering excellent education to children.

Mr. Blunkett: Quite right. I am sure that the chief inspector of schools would not mind my referring to his comments this morning on Radio 4, when he said that the literacy and numeracy hours were not an imposition and were not bureaucracy, but were clearly working in the interests of children.

Mr. Willis: And the chief inspector is always right.

Mr. Blunkett: I am being heckled, but just for once I shall not rise to the bait.

What about the golden legacy of no basic curriculum for teacher training, no new deal for schools, none of the investment that we are making in transforming the environment for schools and no learning grid?

I was interested to learn tonight that there have been grumbles from St. Joseph's primary school about the way in which the learning grid resources are being allocated. I thought that we were supposed to rely on the diversity of local government to arrange that allocation with schools. I thought that we were being chided for being too centralist and for running everything from Sanctuary buildings, and we are told that we should let county councils and schools run everything. However, on every scheme that we are not running from Sanctuary buildings, we are chided for what is happening at local level, which is the fault of the county council.

Here is another conundrum: every time we have formula funding, we are criticised, as we were criticised tonight in respect of St. Joseph's, and when we do not have formula funding, we are criticised for making the funding too specific. What do the Opposition want? Do they want formula funding, or do they want funding to be specifically provided to schools? Do they want the local authority or the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to determine that funding? Do they want a literacy hour and a numeracy hour, or would they like to leave two out of five children languishing without a decent education, as they were before?

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): I have a positive suggestion to make, and I want to know whether the Secretary of State will subscribe to it. Given, as he rightly says, that the key problem is that by the time children move on, at age 11, to secondary school, too much damage has been done by insufficient levels of literacy and numeracy, does he accept that it would be in everybody's interest if national performance tables were published, showing the results of the tests at age seven, so that one could find out which schools were succeeding and which were failing? Would it not be helpful also if the tables contained a register of how much cash was being spent per pupil at each school and the average class size at each school? We would not then be having these debates in a vacuum; we would have solid data and people would know what was working and what was not.

Mr. Blunkett: I thought that we were being criticised for taking too much time and spending too much money on measures that are not directly related to teaching in the classroom. We are criticised for collecting too much information, for asking too much of schools and teachers and for giving them too many forms to fill in, so that too much information is coming out of Sanctuary buildings. We have been so hurt by that criticism that I have asked the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), to spend a great deal of his time unravelling that process and making sure that we do not place greater demands on schools. The Conservatives sent out 80 separate documents when they organised the national curriculum, but we have reduced that to one document.

We are doing our utmost to respond to the needs of teachers and schools. I am hurt by the terrible fact that whatever we do, we cannot get it right. The only consolation is that we are turning things round and making a difference. We are changing what is happening in schools and motivating decent teachers and lifting their morale. We are ensuring that schools are building their confidence. They will have the resources to do that over the next three years. They are having their buildings repaired. They are getting a learning grid that never existed under the Tories.

This August, there will be 1,200 summer schools that never existed under the previous Government. There is a new excellence in cities programme. There is a new pay and performance programme with £1 billion of extra resources to pay teachers. There is a new admissions code that tries to unravel the shambles that we inherited which has bedevilled the delivery of education at a local level and undermined choice and diversity for parents.

Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): I seek the Secretary of State's advice and guidance on an area of the legacy to which he is referring. There is a lack of choice in rural areas, such as my constituency in west Cornwall, because as a result of the Rotherham judgment, of which the Secretary of State will be aware, parents can no longer choose to send their children to the school in whose catchment area they live. What action will the Department take to ensure that parents do not have to bus their children to the nearest market town instead of the local school that they want their children to attend? That has been the result of that judgment and previous Tory policy. Will the right hon. Gentleman continue to follow that Tory policy?

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reminding me that in the admissions code and the regulations that have been published, which take effect from this autumn, we are establishing local admissions forums and providing an independent appeals process for parents. We shall ensure that there is adjudication over school reorganisation and that parents living near the school can exercise their preference, which they must do at the beginning of the process. That process will be open and transparent, and we are building in new information requirements for parents. All that will help enormously.

In the end, parents can only state a sensible preference and have any semblance of choice if we raise the standard of education in schools across the board. People will then make preferences based not on the fact that some schools provide an awful education—in which case supply and demand are out of kilter—but on the diversity to which Conservative Members have referred. If we raise the standard of all schools, choice will be made according to the ethos of the school, not the standard of education on offer. While demand for and supply of schools is not in equilibrium, we are letting down parents and children. Some parents will get their child into a school at the expense of someone else's child.

What we heard from the Conservatives earlier was tragic because it was all about the few, rather than the many. It was all about what had happened to a small number of children. I have made it clear that we value children, teachers and parents, wherever they are and whatever their status. It is no good the hon. Member for Maidenhead or her colleagues going over old ground. They can refight the 1997 election on grant-maintained schools and selection as often as they like, but it is a dead agenda. It has been dead from 1 May 1997. The GM schools have moved on and so have the parents. We have all moved on to ensure that we raise the level of funding in all schools to the level that GM schools had, not the other way round. Those schools respect and accept that, and I am proud that we have managed to reach an accord with them.

In the end, all that matters is that children get a decent education. It does not matter whether we fall out here tonight or whether we knock spots off each other. We shall be judged on whether we have made a difference.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): The right hon. Gentleman will need no lessons about the fact that secondary school heads are extremely busy people with onerous responsibilities. Twenty of them came from Surrey to lobby their MPs, and they included heads of grant-maintained schools who are struggling with the change and have experienced a cut in resources per pupil. However, that is not the point that I want to make.

All those heads agreed that the difficulty that they face is in controlling and getting access to resources so that they can decide how to allocate them in their schools. They said that the complicated bidding process, in which they must bid for money for all the different little schemes, is an enormous bureaucratic burden. Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to allow the Under-Secretary, who is examining that process, to consider how funding is allocated to schools and to free up the secondary school heads in Surrey and elsewhere so that they can use the resources as they and their governors see fit?

Mr. Blunkett: I am going to surprise the hon. Gentleman by saying yes. I am very keen to ensure that we consider sensible suggestions about how to deal with genuine problems. Surrey received an extra £21 million, which is an increase of 6.3 per cent. We need to make sure that the money reaches schools. That is why I published the tables two weeks ago. We need to make sure that there is an additional delegation of at least 5 per cent. per pupil from next April. We need to examine how the standards fund and other resources reach schools, and make sure that they do so in the least bureaucratic fashion possible. Surprise, surprise—I am prepared to listen and to take action in the interests of children.

We are in favour of diversity and we are in favour of choice. In the end, those will only be possible because of the resources and changes that we have introduced.

We are determined to pursue our policies because they are working. More failing schools are coming out of special measures than are going in, and they are doing so in a shorter period of time. We are delivering excellence by spreading it between beacon schools, from where it spreads out into the community. We are already doubling and will double again the number of specialist schools, and placing them under an obligation to share that specialism with the community and with other schools.

We are proud of what we are doing and we are going to carry on doing it. We shall continue to ensure that we put pupils and their parents at the heart of this debate. That debate cannot be about going backwards or arguing about the divisions of the past: in the end, it is the standards of the future that matter.

8.10 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): First, I welcome and congratulate the new Opposition Front-Bench team. I also welcome the Secretary of State's thoughtful speech, although he was somewhat generous in his comments on the speech made by the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May). He was absolutely right to say that most of her speech and most of the Opposition motion was concerned with going over old ground. Wordsworth put it slightly differently, writing of:

"old unhappy far-off things, and battles long ago."

I have to tell the hon. Lady that she was fighting battles of long ago and touting an ideology that has been seen to fail and has let down the children of this country for a long time.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: If the hon. Gentleman is about to defend that old policy, I shall be delighted to hear from him.

Mr. Swayne: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, however old the battles may be, they are being fought because Members of Parliament such as myself are continually and constantly approached in our constituencies by head teachers expressing precisely the problems to which we are drawing attention?

Mr. Foster: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention and I am sure that the House looks forward to hearing a thoughtful speech in which he tells us of the many head teachers who want to go back to how things were under the previous Administration. I shall be extremely surprised if he can seriously tell me that there are many teachers who want to return to a system that was designed to ensure nice schools for nice kids and the scrap heap for the vast majority. If he points out that there are some head teachers who are not entirely happy with everything that the Government are doing, that will not surprise me at all—indeed, I intend to express some of my concerns about Government policy. However, it would be foolish to deny that the new Government have introduced several measures that have brought about real and positive improvements in our education system.

The Liberal Democrats welcome the scrapping of nursery vouchers and the assisted places scheme, both of which added to bureaucracy and, as the Secretary of State is wont to say, gave something to the few but not the many. We welcome the recent White Paper on post-16 education: we believe that the vast majority of measures outlined therein will result in a real improvement in education for that age group. We especially welcome the statement made today by the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), about ways of providing additional support to children from disadvantaged areas. If the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) believes that measures such as those are not popular with head teachers, he must have been talking to an extremely select sample of head teachers.

However, in a debate such as this, it is important to draw attention to those areas of Government policy that cause us concern because they lead to a reduction in choice or in diversity. The Secretary of State has referred to the literacy hour and the numeracy hour. I was not entirely happy with the introduction of the literacy hour and I am still not satisfied on that subject. It is absolutely right for the Government to provide through their website and by other means support, advice and worked examples to teachers. However, to impose on teachers a specific way in which literacy must be taught detracts from the professional autonomy of our teachers in carrying out a task for which they have been trained. Nevertheless, I am delighted that the numeracy hour has been introduced in a way that appears to acknowledge that the literacy hour was overly prescriptive—it is important that such lessons are learned.

I hope that the Secretary of State accepts that our schools are denied choice if they are denied the funding to carry out their work. He has suggested that a lot more money is getting through to schools, but the reality on the ground is that schools are not getting that extra money—it is almost as if the cheque is still in the post. He might want to claim that that is the fault of local education authorities, as he tried to do in respect of the league tables that were published a few days ago—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State says from a sedentary position that I have said it for him.

The Secretary of State would be wrong to make such an accusation. There are two reasons, the first of which is that, according to the Audit Commission—whose figures I hope the right hon. Gentleman accepts—the amount of money per pupil being made available to our schools has gone down by an average of £50 since the Labour Government entered office. The additional money is not coming through. We know that education spending as a percentage of gross domestic product has declined in the first two years of the Labour Government. We also know that the share of total Government spending on education has decreased. Without sufficient money, one's choices are restricted, but by all three counts education spending has gone down, so schools' choices are increasingly restricted.

Even if I am right about the reduction in money in the first two years of the Labour Government, it should be noted that the Secretary of State said today—and it is precisely stated in the Government amendment—that there is to be an increase in funds of £19 billion. That figure is incorrect. That assertion is based not on my analysis of the Government's statement, but on the report produced by the Labour-dominated Select Committee on the Treasury.

The Government are suggesting that £16 billion of the £19 billion will come to England; but the Committee says that the true figure for the real-terms increase is only £8 billion, and that that £8 billion does not represent a significant increase on the previous Government's education spending projections. The Committee's analysis goes further and shows that it is possible that, with that £8 billion, education spending will reach 5 per cent. of GDP by 2002. That was the percentage of GDP spent on education under the previous Administration, so that is no improvement. Of course I am grateful on behalf of my constituents and those of many other hon. Members for the fact that some increase in funding is promised, but it is wrong of the Government to try to pretend that the sum is greater than it is.

This debate is not only about the school-based education system. We must recognise that the reduction in spending has been experienced in other parts of the education service. It is interesting to note that, based on the Government's own figures and despite their introducing a fees system, current projections indicate that the amount of money per student in higher education is also set to fall during the first term of the Labour Government.

I am concerned that the Government are possibly denying choice in our schools in several other areas. The first relates to something of which the Secretary of State is in part rightly proud. I and my party have supported the Government's moves to try to reduce class sizes in key stage 1, but we are genuinely concerned that class sizes in other key stages are rising. They are rising in key stage 2, and in our secondary schools the averages are now at an all-time high for the past 20 years. We hope that when extolling the virtues of reduced class sizes, the Government will bear it in mind that they must start to move as rapidly as possible to put a stop to the increase in other parts of the education sector.

Another area in which the Government are denying choice relates to their target-setting agenda. It is appropriate for the Government to set targets for themselves, for individual schools, for LEAs and even for what happens in individual classrooms, but I am sure that the Secretary of State and Ministers are concerned about what the previous Prime Minister described as the long tail of underachievement. We must do something about children from less-well-off backgrounds with poorer educational provision. As I have said in the Chamber before, it is of real concern to me that no targets are being set at key stage 2 for the bottom 20 per cent. of pupils in literacy and the bottom 25 per cent. in numeracy. If there are no targets for children at the bottom end, there is nothing for them to aim at and nothing to motivate and support teachers to help that group of pupils along. I hope that the Government are prepared to reconsider their policy of not providing targets for that section of the pupil cohort.

Mr. Blizzard: Now that the hon. Gentleman has outlined a number of deficiencies, as he sees them, in our education system, would he care to say how many of them could have been put right by increasing income tax by 1p? Is he saying that his party would increase income tax by 1p to put right some of the things that he says are so wrong?

Mr. Foster: I began my speech by talking about old battles and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman wishes to return to one. We have made it clear that we would increase income tax to increase investment in education. The hon. Gentleman surely knows that it would not require increased investment to introduce targets for pupils at key stage 2. That is a matter not of investment but of educational common sense. It is a straightforward and positive suggestion.

Another issue that does not require increased investment is early-years provision. The Government rightly want diversity of provision to involve the private sector, the voluntary sector and the maintained sector. We very definitely welcome that move. Nevertheless, we are concerned about the way in which the system has been set up. As the hon. Member for Maidenhead rightly pointed out—let us not argue about the figures—there has been a significant reduction in the number of pre-school playgroups available to participate in the partnership between the three sectors.

Solving a further problem, again without additional resources, could improve choice. The Secretary of State was perhaps somewhat unjustifiably proud of the new admissions code of practice. Some parents find themselves almost forced to put their child into a reception class to ensure that the child can get into year 1 of that primary school. When I first raised that problem with the Secretary of State, he promised to examine it. He subsequently came up with what he described as a solution. It was that a spare place could be kept in the reception class, thereby allowing the child to move in not from the reception class but from wherever else early-years provision had been made. However, that is not a realistic proposition because the tight funding regime under which schools currently operate means that no school will want to leave a place open if it will not receive funding for it. I ask the Secretary of State and the Government to look again at that choice.

In two other areas the Government could make a change of policy that would increase rather than reduce choice. The first relates to the way in which money is currently allocated. When the Government the other day accused many LEAs of holding money back at the centre and not passing it on to schools, they demonstrated a degree of hypocrisy. The Labour Government are increasing the amount of money that they are holding back at the centre and reducing the amount that they give to LEAs. The Government's own figures demonstrate that, in the first four years of a Labour Government, there will have been an increase in the Government's share of education spend from 38 to 42 per cent. and a corresponding 4 per cent. reduction in the amount that LEAs will have to spend. That is exactly what the Government accuse LEAs of doing. The Government are holding money back centrally and denying choice to the LEAs. That could be changed, as could the way in which the money that they hold back centrally is allocated.

As I am sure all hon. Members are aware, much of the money held back centrally is now allocated through a complex bureaucratic bidding system. Since the Government came to power, LEAs have made 25,000 separate bids for money. Only 9,000 have been successful. There is a one in three chance of being successful. Two thirds of the bids have required a huge amount of bureaucracy on the part of LEAs, yet some LEAs see nothing for it.

The distribution of the money is incredibly patchy. If one analyses where bids have been successful, one can find no logical pattern. They are not more successful in rural, urban, deprived or wealthy areas.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): What the hon. Gentleman has mentioned is a real problem. Does he accept that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in answer to the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) that he would look at the problem? Everyone accepts that there is a problem in the bidding process.

Mr. Foster: The Secretary of State made that remark, but the concerns have been drawn to his attention for a considerable time and we see no change in the procedure. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support in pointing out that the system has to be changed. I make my remarks as a positive contribution to the debate.

In some respects, the Government have got the provision of diversity almost but not quite right. We welcome the provision of specialist schools and beacon schools. However, we do not accept that there is a need for such schools to maintain the selective system that the Government promised to get rid of before they came to power. They are now going to continue it under the guise of selection by aptitude, yet not a single Minister has yet been able to explain the difference between selection by aptitude and selection by ability. We would far prefer specialist schools to be set up in an area and open to all pupils in that area. If it is a specialist music school, all pupils in the area—whether they are from a musical background or not—could benefit from that specialism. We do not need a selective system to run alongside the selective school approach.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): Does my hon. Friend accept that, for such schools to work, parents must be able to get their children into them, safe in the knowledge that they can fall back on the catchment schools? We still have a problem whereby if the catchment school is full with other first preferences, the kids are bumped off to a school that is perhaps many miles away.

Mr. Foster: My hon. Friend is right. He will know that in Committee we constantly argued against both the Rotherham and Greenwich judgments—another area of denial of choice for local education authorities.

In conclusion, we are in favour of choice and diversity, but we do not want the chaos and division that we had under the previous Administration. We very much hope that, under the new Labour Government, choice and diversity will not lead to centralisation and direction. At the moment, sadly, there is evidence that that is what is happening.

8.31 pm

Liz Blackman (Erewash): The bottom line in any debate on education is that parents must be in a position not to have to make a choice in terms of good-quality education for their children. Every parent wants that for their children, and it should be an expectation and a right. Clearly, that entitlement is not on offer universally, as the evidence shows. The Secretary of State referred to the shocking figures that we inherited in 1997, which showed that two out of five 11-year-olds were not reaching the expected standards of their age group. I was concerned, but not surprised, that that was not mentioned by the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May).

In government, the Conservatives expressed concern about the need to improve standards—I acknowledge that. However, their analysis of how to raise standards was to implement a crude, market-driven mechanism—the internal market. Much was made of the exercise of choice, and some parents applied to get their children into high-performing schools, as any parent would do. The money and resources went with them.

The corollary was that there was no choice for the many. The children and parents who remained in poorer schools did so often because money was not available to ensure that they could travel to the schools that, in their perception, were performing better. Sometimes they were slow off the blocks, and did not understand the system. Sometimes the schools were full, and sometimes the children were turned down. The poorer schools were often left struggling with diminished rolls and diminished pupil funding, and they faced a multiplicity of other problems that were not necessarily all of their own making.

All of this took place against the backdrop of national underfunding, no national strategy to address poor national results and no recognition of the needs of particular communities, some of which were far more severe than others. Teacher morale was at an all-time low. Ofsted has, and had, a place. However, without the support that I have outlined, it was difficult to work effectively to improve performance. Without making education a clear priority, Ofsted was, in the past, the diagnosis, but not always the treatment.

Our clear objectives are to inspect, measure and demand, but also to support. We have set them out clearly. All sectors of education and lifelong learning have been and will be supported, and there has been recognition of our policies from Opposition Members.

The Government made a choice—in our early years—to support the early years and the infant sector, and rightly so. There is no more critical time than when children are young and at their most receptive. Early-years education in my constituency is purposeful, appropriate and thriving. All four-year-olds are guaranteed a place, and many three-year-olds have access to good-quality education.

As a teacher, I can tell the House that class size does matter, especially with little ones. There was no choice in Derbyshire when we tried to teach children in class sizes of more than 40 in many schools in my constituency. We would have welcomed a policy from the centre to supply resources and to reduce class sizes, which were truly appalling.

Erewash schools, and the children in them, have benefited enormously from reduced class sizes through the abolition of the assisted places scheme. Erewash has benefited from money for new classrooms, and for the additional teachers who were essential to accommodate those reduced class sizes, as promised. That money has been forthcoming.

Schools have been maintained and improved, and the worst are beginning to be replaced. The £5.4 billion of new deal money is beginning to help. A pleasant environment without leaking roofs and with decent classrooms is not an add-on—it is an absolutely essential part of teaching children.

We targeted areas of special need where terrible social and economic problems abound, and we proposed partnerships. The sure start programme reaches out and embraces children and their families, to support them and to create a positive attitude to learning, right from the start. Education action zones lever in not only more resources, but innovative approaches to drive up standards.

I wish to refer to the literacy hour—the most innovative of all our policies. It has been planned and supported, and the resources have been put in place. It is producing stunning results. I agree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) that teachers work incredibly hard and put in a lot of extra time. However, any new change as revolutionary as the literacy hour demands extra time. It demands commitment, but the results are so positive that teachers consider the effort worth while. They see that all the planning and preparation will pay off in the long run. The sheer hard work and grind will ease, as the programme continues to evolve.

The training and resources for numeracy hour that are coming on-stream in my constituency are extremely encouraging, as has been acknowledged. The preparations are going well and in many schools in Erewash, it is being tried out, with positive results.

Teachers in the primary sector of the national curriculum, who a few years ago struggled with innumerable folders, welcome a planned, structured timetable in which to deliver numeracy and literacy hours. The benefits are reflected not only in the children's progress in those core skills, but in a positive classroom attitude to children's learning generally.

I spent 25 years in a comprehensive school before I came to this place, and I can tell hon. Members that children have no choice whatever if they cannot read or write and if they are not numerate. They cannot access the curriculum, so it becomes irrelevant to them. They become frustrated and disaffected, they waste their time—unwittingly—and they waste teacher time, drawing teachers away from delivering learning, as they are supposed to do. Other pupils become frustrated as well.

Dr. Julian Lewis: I entirely agree with the hon. Lady's last point. Does she accept that such damage is done long before the age of 11 is reached? Will she, therefore, join me in recommending that the results of the tests that are already done at seven should be published, so that parents can put pressure on failing schools at that stage?

Liz Blackman: No, I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman, for two reasons. First, I agree that the damage is already done by that stage. That is why, when the Government came into office, they specifically targeted the early years and the infant sector. Secondly, the Secretary of State spoke about the Opposition's complaints about additional bureaucracy. Other measures are in place to support teachers and drive up standards.

There is no choice for children who cannot access the curriculum, and because they leave school with such poor core skills, there is limited choice when they move into the world of work.

Mr. Don Foster: If the hon. Lady shares my concern for the bottom 25 per cent. of pupils, does she agree that there ought to be a set of targets for those pupils in literacy and numeracy?

Liz Blackman: I agree that when teachers deliver literacy hour, they should take account of the diverse ability of their charges and the point that the children have reached in their learning, as all good teachers do. In certain elements of the literacy hour, teachers can do that.

I am not against choice or a fair admissions policy that allows choice. I am certainly not against high standards across the board, as that gives real choice. I am not against diversity. I have a beacon school and a specialist school in my constituency. Challenging and appropriate work ought to go on from early years, right the way through school, including literacy hour.

I am extremely pleased with the Government's initiative which allows an alternative curriculum for pupils over 14 if it is more appropriate for them. Some of the children in school are disaffected or unable to access the curriculum for all the reasons that we are discussing. They would be better served by a tailor-made curriculum, designed in co-operation with local colleges and other education providers.

Every school should have its own ethos, and does in my constituency, but the Government should take responsibility for determining standards. There has been a standards vacuum for the past 18 years. There ought to be central guidance, as there are many changes to be made.

A great deal of work is being demanded of teachers. A large part of the teaching profession is committed to that. Radical change cannot be introduced in any walk of life without commitment and hard work, but if the changes are worth making, it is worth asking teachers to go that extra distance to deliver the positive results that we already see speeding through. The benefits of national literacy hour and of numeracy hour as it comes on-stream will be enormous, not only for this generation, but for generations to come.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): None of us, whether speaking as a Member of Parliament or as a parent, would disagree with the hon. Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) that we should be doing all in our power to help to raise educational standards, in particular those of children who are not the most able. I agree that they have been neglected by decision makers in politics and in education for decades. However, I confess that I would have listened to her with greater sympathy had she paid due regard to the various initiatives of the Conservative Government: the introduction of independent inspection, regular testing, the publication of test results, league tables and the supply of information to parents. Ministers are now willing to take many of those initiatives on board in some form or other, even though they fought them tooth and nail from the Opposition Benches as Conservative Ministers took them through the House.

A number of colleagues hope to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall concentrate on two issues: grammar schools and sixth forms, both of which are of particular interest to my constituents. I must take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). In response to one of my hon. Friends, he referred somewhat disparagingly to what he described as nice schools for nice kids. He used that expression to caricature the approach of those of us who argue for selection in education, whether on academic abilities conventionally measured or on aptitude. I believe passionately that he is wrong to do so.

I was a governor of a north London comprehensive some years ago and I found that the way to guarantee that the so-called nice kids—the children from the well-to-do families—attended the nice schools was to confine parental choice to the neighbourhood catchment comprehensive so that selection was by parents' ability to afford a mortgage in the catchment area of the right school.

Mr. Don Foster: Although I thank the hon. Gentleman for drawing me back to the Chamber to listen to his contribution, I fundamentally disagree with him. For every grammar school, we needed three secondary moderns; people tried to tart them up and call them something else. Surely we want to end competition between schools. We need choice within each school and all schools providing high-quality education rather than choice between schools.

Mr. Lidington: That was the dream of the champions of comprehensive education in the 1950s and 1960s, when they advocated the end of selection. The trouble was that it did not deliver the improvement in educational attainment that the advocates of the comprehensive system had argued would take place. To deliver a wide choice of subjects in a single school, people were led ineluctably to argue for the creation of large secondary schools, which entailed all the difficulties of pastoral care, schools on split sites and, in some cases, keeping order.

As the hon. Member for Bath knows, my county is the only one to retain an entirely selective secondary system and the only one to maintain, without a break, overall Conservative control of its council. I believe that the model of selection that is developing there is true to the vision of R. A. Butler and the Education Act 1944. This country went wrong when, in the old days, it looked on secondary modern schools as a dumping ground and thought that only the grammar schools mattered. Nothing could have been further from what Butler wanted to achieve.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, even though he is in full flow. I cannot resist asking him a simple question: how many parents in Kent, where people are so proud of the selective system, have contacted him to say that they want their child to go to a secondary modern school?

Mr. Lidington: As I am not a Kent Member of Parliament, the question does not really arise.

I have found that certain schools in my constituency are achieving better results—as measured by public examinations—than comparable comprehensive schools in Hertfordshire and Milton Keynes. We would expect grammar schools to achieve higher standards—and they are: that has been acknowledged by the chief inspector of schools, who has singled out a number of Buckinghamshire schools, both grammar and upper, as demonstrating excellence. Even the Government have recognised the achievement of those standards: they have nominated Aylesbury high school, a selective girls' grammar school, as one of their "beacon schools".

In other schools in my constituency, children are being very well educated in conventional academic subjects and—especially in the sixth form—being educated in general national vocational qualifications. That is introducing a new enthusiasm among both students and staff.

Dr. Stoate: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a fully selective system poses a danger? Schools that are non-selective, such as secondary modern schools, tend to involve a high level of special needs and are, therefore, greatly disadvantaged when it comes to competing. Because schools in my constituency, such as Dartford West high school for boys, have extremely high special needs levels, they receive the worst reports from the Office for Standards in Education. As a result, they are branded as special needs schools, and the county council closes them, or attempts to close them. That reduces parental choice.

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on a point that is by no means specific to a selective system of education. In my constituency, the problem that he mentions applies to individual schools with certain types of catchment area. The hon. Gentleman will probably agree that he would find comparable problems involving the disproportionate concentration of children with special educational needs in an all-comprehensive system, because that is the nature of a system that relies on catchment areas.

The selective system in Buckinghamshire works well. It is achieving results: my county is at or near the top of the Government's league table in regard to both A-levels and GCSEs. It is wrong for the Government to create the uncertainty that they have created with their legislation on grammar school ballots, leaving schools unsure, year by year, whether they will have to engage their energies in fighting to maintain their current status. Moreover, local education authorities must always bear in mind whether they are likely to face a huge financial and organisational upheaval.

The Labour party has gone a bit quieter—in the Chamber, if not in Buckinghamshire county council—about its opposition to selection, but I was pleased, from a constituency point of view, to hear the hon. Member for Bath restate so firmly his party's opposition in principle to selection in education. That is something that Liberal Democrat councillors in Buckinghamshire tend to keep mum about at every opportunity.

It is nice to hear, from time to time, the honesty of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). I suppose that, by analogy, he must imply something less than honesty on the part of Liberal Democrats councillors in my local education authority.

Mr. Hilary Benn (Leeds, Central): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lidington: I will give way briefly.

Mr. Benn: I thank the hon. Gentleman.

If comprehensive reform has been such a failure—and that seems to fly in the face of the evidence of a rise in educational attainments and achievements since its introduction—will the hon. Gentleman explain why there is absolutely no evidence that parents wish to return to a widespread system of selection? Does he accept that, as the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) suggested, no parents want their children to attend secondary modern schools?

Mr. Lidington: The evidence with which I am most familiar—from my own constituency, where a selective system has been maintained consistently—shows that there is considerable public support, as demonstrated in local election results, for a selective system. The approach in areas that have opted for a comprehensive system should be to develop the initiatives of the previous Government, by allowing greater specialisation, in specific subjects, in individual comprehensive schools within a local education authority area.

[Mr. Lidington]

Sixth forms were one of the subjects dealt with in the Government's recent White Paper. I should, at the outset, say that I think that the idea of encouraging co-operation between local education authority schools and colleges is sensible, and that, equally, I fully support the Government's announced emphasis on trying to raise the standards of those who are not the highest fliers academically.

One of my fears—I hope that, in his reply, the Minister will allay some of them—is that the Government have a hidden agenda. Despite the assurances that the Secretary of State gave in his statement, the current edition of The Times Educational Supplement remarks that only "A last-minute intervention by the Prime Minister . . . saved small sixth forms from abolition", that

"The original plans for this week's White Paper on post-16 reforms intended that sixth forms and colleges should be given equal funding", and that that

"change would have left small sixth forms vulnerable."

The article goes on to say that the Prime Minister

"called for changes"— not out of principle, but—

"because any perceived attack on sixth forms would lose votes in Middle England."

I have several fears about the Government's options for the future of sixth forms. It is proposed that, at the very least, local education authorities should be subject to departmental guidance on how they plan and manage post-16 education. One of the options is that, rather than local education authorities being funded by revenue support grant, they should be funded by the new learning and skills councils.

One fear is that the Government are in danger of throwing the baby out with the bath water. The Government have promised to maintain sixth form funding at current levels in real terms, but they have already said that they will not provide extra money to school sixth forms to cope with the proposed new A-level curriculum. I wonder whether Ministers have a similar plan to cap sixth form grant or expenditure in subsequent Department for Education and Employment initiatives.

Mr. Blizzard: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lidington: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not, as other hon. Members wish to speak.

There is a risk of a top-down system that relies not on the preference expressed by students or their parents, but on the decisions of central planners on a regional committee.

What will happen to capital expenditure decisions? Who will take them? I am very interested in the answer to that question, as the population of Aylesbury—and of mid-Buckinghamshire generally—is growing fast and, at some point in the not-too-distant future, my constituency may need another secondary school. Under the Government's new proposals, how would a decision on accommodation for post-16 education be taken?

Do the Government have a view on the minimum size of a viable sixth form? In the previous Parliament, when I was on the Education Select Committee, one expert witness said that 250 was the bare minimum.

Mr. Don Foster: Three in a primary school.

Mr. Lidington: Am I am being bid up to 300 by Liberal Democrat Members?

A minimum limit of 250 would have very serious implications, particularly for sixth forms and for secondary schools in rural areas. I hope that the Government, in future plans, will take account of the fact that many parents prefer school sixth forms to colleges—because of the pastoral care that they can provide, and their ability to offer minority subjects, such as classics, and opportunities in music, drama and sport, which many employers think help to provide a rounded candidate, with the right core skills, when it comes to selecting an applicant for a job. Such concerns have been expressed to me by education managers and teachers, and I hope that the Minister will respond to them.

9 pm

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): I welcome the debate on choice and diversity. Soon we shall approach the end of the century, our first of full democracy and citizenship. Universal suffrage came for the first time, and this century enjoyed the advent of the welfare state and the national health service. The provision of state education also arrived for primary school children and, with the Education Act 1944, for secondary school children, too. It is interesting to note how recently state secondary education arrived.

We ought to try to relate two sets of themes. Equality and fairness sometimes seem to conflict with diversity and choice, but they need not. The new agenda facing education is how we relate those two themes to each other. The advent of state education for every child brought the principle of equality into practice. Each and every child was important and deserved good state education. The left and right of British politics may have talked differently about equality, focusing on equality of opportunity or some more fundamental form of equality, but all of us agreed on the goal of equal provision for every child.

It is useful to review the results of our first century of citizenship and democracy. I do not have the time to do a full audit, but there have been successes and failures. Numeracy and literacy have risen and more of our children have been able to achieve good GCSEs and A-levels. It is fantastic that about a third of our children will go to university. One day it will be 40 per cent., and perhaps one day 50 per cent. That is a remarkable success story.

However, the success is blended with some failure. Gross inequalities have continued in our society in education and in many other matters. It is a sorry fact that knowing which house or estate a child came from, or knowing his or her postcode or his or her parents' occupations, allowed us to make a good—though not always accurate; there are many exceptions—stab at predicting that child's educational outcome. We could also predict the child's broader life chances in health and in many other areas.

The annual report of the Universities and Colleges Admission Service shows that only 10 per cent. of university entrants came from social classes 4 and 5, although those classes represent nearly a quarter of the population. That is a gross inequality. The youth cohort study shows that by 1996, eight out of 10 state school pupils from professional families gained at least five good GCSEs, while only a fifth of children from households in which no one was in paid employment achieved the same. Despite our successes, which I applaud, at the end of our first century of state education, the system still mirrors inequalities rather than breaking them down.

Equality and fairness are among the great themes of our century; diversity and choice provide the other important strand. The 1944 Act had its own agenda on diversity and choice. Although it brought in secondary schools, it also brought in grammar schools, technical schools that never developed in any great quantity, and secondary modern schools. Later, Labour Governments in particular pushed comprehensive schools and we got into the debate about the comprehensive school versus the grammar school. I agree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) that that debate has become rather old-fashioned. Equality and diversity appear to have been in conflict in the public and private sectors.

Although many working-class children go to grammar schools, there is still an equation between socio-economic background and access to grammar school. I was struck by the evidence printed in Hansard on 20 May that used free school meals as an indicator of socio-economic disadvantage. It tells us how many children at grammar schools receive free school meals and compares that figure with the number of children in the relevant local education authorities who were receiving free school meals. In Barnet, 16 per cent. of children attending secondary schools receive free school meals, compared with 1.4 per cent. of those attending grammar schools. In Bromley, 14 per cent. of children receive free school meals, compared with 1.2 per cent. of children at grammar schools. In Birmingham, 34 per cent. of children receive free school meals, compared with only 5 per cent. of children at grammar schools. In Liverpool, 39 per cent. of all secondary school children receive free school meals, compared with just 6 per cent. of children at grammar schools. In Buckinghamshire, which is a pretty wealthy county, 7 per cent. of children receive free school meals compared with just 1.6 per cent. of those at grammar schools. The point is proven.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends ask those who support grammar schools to say more about the children who never get to grammar school—in other words, most children. We have to recognise the skew in terms of socio-economic background. It is not surprising, but it is worth emphasising.

Let me change gear now and say that the Select Committee on Education and Employment, which I have the honour to chair, is interested in these themes. We are about to undertake an inquiry into the relationship between public and private education. Owing to the involvement of the private sector in education action zones and other developments in which—perfectly properly, in my view—the Government are trying to bridge the gap between public and private education, we feel it appropriate and timely that the Select Committee should undertake an inquiry into the role of private companies in the management and supply of state education services. We take our first evidence on 10 July and I hope that our report will be of interest to the whole House.

Another illustration of the need for diversity and choice is the necessity to pay more attention to highly able children. The Government prefer the term "gifted" children. I am not worried about the terminology, but we are all concerned—as was the Select Committee when we published our report—by the fact that most schools neglect highly able children. To put it rather graphically, a number of potential Nobel prize winners are sitting in our schools rather sulkily, bored out of their minds because they are not being stretched. That is partly because schools are often more concerned with helping children who are struggling and with average standards.

We neglect the highly able child at our peril, however. The Select Committee made the strong recommendation that every primary and secondary school should have a senior member of staff as a co-ordinator, looking out for the highly able boy or girl.

I said at the beginning that this was the end of the first century of democracy and citizenship in our society. In the education agenda, we find ourselves hovering rather anxiously between three centuries. I do not think that anyone would have predicted in 1944, or at the beginning of this century, that two of the major concerns of Parliament and Government at the end of the 20th century would be literacy and numeracy.

That was the agenda in the 19th century, when primary education was introduced, yet here we are—perfectly properly, because too many children do not get to grips with reading, writing and arithmetic—introducing literacy hours and numeracy strategies. There is something sad and ironic about the fact that we are tackling a 19th century problem when we are trying to summon up the energy to enter the 21st century. The 21st century education agenda should be about creativity and new technology unleashing all sorts of benefits for our young people.

How are we to relate the two important themes of equality and fairness, and diversity and choice? Parents and children want choices. What policies and practices will enable us not to take sides but to pursue the two themes together? That is the challenge in education today.

9.11 pm

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): Education is rightly put at the heart of the political debate. It affects everything, from the nation's competitiveness, skills and employment to the social conditions of our society. I cannot put it better than the headmistress of Parkstone grammar school in my constituency, in a recent letter:

"Education is the single most effective route out of poverty."

The Secretary of State said that he wanted to talk about the many, not the few. I want to do the same: the whole issue of diversity and choice is about the many, not the few, as Conservative Members have said. There are 39 schools in my constituency. Above all, we have choice. There are seven secondary schools and active sixth forms, with two grammar schools, Parkstone and Poole. Many of our schools feature regularly at the top of the league tables. For good measure, we have one independent school. Four of the seven secondary schools are grant maintained.

In my election pledge, I stated that "we owe it to our younger generation to give them the best start in life to succeed in a competitive world.

There must be choice and opportunity for all abilities so that we can all be members of a skilled and prosperous workforce, embracing the technological revolution."

Two and a half years later, I stand by those words; but can the Government claim to have stuck to their words and pledged intentions?

The 1997 Labour manifesto stated:

"Labour will never force the abolition of good schools whether in the private sector or the state sector".

I believe that the Government's plans for grammar schools renege on that pledge. The plan to allow the fate of grammar schools to be decided through a ballot of parents from feeder schools is a centralist plan imposed on a local community.

The question is not balanced, as in some schools parents will not be able to vote, yet parents with children at feeder schools, who may not want to send their children to the grammar school, will have the final say on the future of other people's children. The proposals will alter who has a say on the issue, and are thus unfair: after all, if one asks a loaded question, one tends to get a loaded answer.

Above all, this country needs choice in education. The right to decide is imperative for a parent. Every child is different and parents know best what is right for their child. Not all children are academic, and vocational skills must be taken into consideration. Taking away choice and diversity limits the opportunities that will best suit the child.

The whole community should decide the fate of a school. A constituent wrote to me recently:

"Why do we need a ballot, (surely a good school will thrive and a bad school will wither.) If there are 5 people chasing every place at a grammar school—the choice has been made, the school should be kept."

We also have excellent non-selective or grant-maintained schools in my constituency which produce superb results and are equally popular, and which have equal standing in the eyes of the community and of parents, who have a valid role to play in the diversity and choice in the education that they have chosen for their children.

If a school's status or the choice available to parents is changed, repercussions will inevitably be felt in an area's whole education system and in the pattern and structure of admission numbers. However, the cost of the exercise could easily render it a wasted effort when it comes to raising pupil achievement.

Mr. Alex Clark, the headmaster of Poole grammar school, told me:

"If the Government genuinely believes in the overriding priority to address standards and not structure, why does it not at least postpone the issue of grammar school ballots by three or four years? This will allow the maximum effort to meet the required standards by 2002. In that time they may . . . come to realise the very important dimension to education provided by grammar schools."

The irony is that certain members of the Labour party have, in the past, exercised choice for their own children. There is nothing wrong with that, but the drawbridge is being pulled up after them to prevent other parents having the same choices and opportunities.

I turn now to the Liberal Democrats in my constituency. Unfortunately, they run Poole council for the time being. However, East Dorset and Purbeck councils have been Tory since May, so there at least we can express an opinion about education. Sadly, the Liberal Democrats still run Dorset county council. If they remain in power, they will have the choice to pursue their agenda, but parents will not have a choice.

The Liberal Democrats have made what they think about grammar schools clear. During proceedings on the School Standards and Framework Bill, the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) said:

"We make it clear that we are opposed to grammar schools and selection, partial or otherwise."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 February 1998; c. 616.]

The Liberal Democrats say that they are opposed to ballots as well, so what will people in my constituency do when the time comes for the two grammar schools to be subject to a local ballot, as will happen? The position of parents will not be represented fairly. Given that the Liberal Democrats on the council are not in favour of a ballot and they do not agree with selection in schools, the parents will be on a hiding to nothing.

Mr. Don Foster: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: No, as I promised to keep my remarks brief.

I am afraid that my constituents whose children attend those grammar schools will be sorely misrepresented by the present council.

Regulations stifle diversity. The increase in bureaucracy has involved 322 new directives in the two years since the Labour Government took office. The fine words about cutting red tape and raising standards have evaporated into a thick fog of regulation that has had an adverse impact on schools.

I visit a lot of schools in my constituency, and have got to know the head teachers. They have made it clear that increased bureaucracy could seriously damage children's education, rather than improve it. Head teachers repeatedly tell me of the frustration they feel. The ever increasing amount of regulation and change comes at the expense of work at the chalk face. After two years of the Government's management of the education system, teachers have come to realise that the real agenda is to control the country's 25,000 schools directly from Whitehall, and to stifle all local initiative.

Another constituent wrote to me last week, as follows:

"Although the Government has repeated the mantra of 'standards not structures', the barrage of initiatives which has been launched this year by the Government seems to have left the central theme of pupil achievement by the wayside."

In my speech, I have used real quotations from constituents. They are concerned about education: it is their children who must use the schools in my area. I want the Government to tackle the genuine anxieties that they have expressed. The Government have dismantled the framework and management of grant-maintained schools, and the preoccupation with staffing and financing that has been unleashed is very often to the detriment of children.

Schools in the new unitary authority of Poole must also deal with reassessing their needs and sorting out what happened under the old local education authority. The relationship with the LEA has naturally overlapped with what is being undertaken now.

The process has not been easy. Schools must now deal with the Government's new fair funding system, but they are coping. However, Dorset has lots of rural areas, and schools in the rural part of my constituency are not being treated so well. Mr. Stuart Clarke, a head teacher there, has written to me on the subject. He is the head not of a grammar school, but of a comprehensive school—Lytchett Minster upper school. He voiced his concerns when he told me that "rural schools such as mine which attract neither urban nor rural priority . . . are located in an authority which delegates funds at a lower rate than most other authorities."

He said that such schools

"find themselves in a funding vacuum that prevents them from forging ahead with new initiatives. The Government is also determined to ignore them."

In Dorset and the borough of Poole, we have a problem with lack of funding; it is an issue. Despite that, the range of schools in my constituency do well, as they are well-managed and offer not only excellent academic standards but a true choice that reflects the diversity of the community that they serve. I would like that to continue.

9.20 pm

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): At its heart, the Conservative motion supports not a diverse but a divisive education system, the aim of which is to increase selection, to protect GM schools and to make the post-16 debate into a campaign to save sixth forms—a choice for a few, but not the many. That may be the real world in a small part of the country, but that agenda bears no relationship to the country as a whole—a country which, under the previous Government, saw unbridled competition leading to sink schools, large classes, schools in disrepair and poor standards. As many hon. Members have said, there were appalling levels of numeracy and literacy, which effectively debarred any child from achieving anything. There were real-term cuts in school funding.

The new Labour Government have set about modernising the education system, based on the comprehensive principle and social inclusion. That will mean real choice and diversity. We have new money for books and buildings, numeracy and literacy strategies, class size initiatives, increases in the standards fund, and money to improve pay for teachers.

May I tell the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and the Minister for School Standards why I am proud of the new Labour Government? We want excellence, academic success and achievement, but we want it for every child. That is why so much of what the Government are doing in education links with their other social policies. If we want to tackle under-achievement across the board, we will have to tackle the problems of social exclusion and social failure and the context in which schools operate and work.

That is why sure start is so important, starting when children are at an early age alongside nursery education. That is why the new deal for communities and excellence in cities, education action zones, health action zones and the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 are so important. All those things will be crucial if we want to tackle the under-achievement that is endemic in half our schools.

The new educational maintenance allowance is crucial, but if we could extend it to all pupils, it would help more to go into further education. Relaxation of the key stage 4 curriculum is important, too. It gives the vocational element to 14 and 16-year-olds where they become particularly disaffected. They have something more tangible to be at school for. The post-16 White Paper, protecting sixth forms but looking to extend and to expand opportunity for all, is another important move. That is real choice, real diversity, a celebration of success, while meeting head on the challenge in the most difficult areas.

I go on to a pet theme of mine. If we really want to do something to improve achievement in our secondary schools, we will have to look at the curriculum in terms of 14 to 19. We will have to get some of our people to stay on at 16 if we hope to get them into higher education.

The Tories seem to want to protect only the privilege of a few, but we seek to extend opportunity for the many. So much will depend on the joined-up nature of all that.

On teachers, of course, the contract needs modernising. I say to many of my friends in the teaching profession: for years, the cry was that a teacher could get promoted only out of the classroom—they had to take a management responsibility to get promoted. Under the new contract, they can get promoted for being a good teacher and then stay in the classroom. That will do much to improve standards. Alongside that, it is important that we do not set a quota on the number of teachers who can cross the threshold. If they are good enough, they should be paid and allowed to pass through.

One legitimate concern, which I know the Minister shares, is the work load. We need to take account of the fact that teachers are telling us that they are finding it difficult. If we can continue our efforts to find ways to reduce bureaucracy, it would be helpful. We need to keep talking and negotiating to achieve a just outcome. I met some head teachers in Nottinghamshire on Friday. The work load was the issue to which they drew my attention—it was more important to them than pay and many of the other issues that are often raised.

This Government will go down in history as one of the truly radical Governments—a Government who have sought to deal with the social context in which schools operate, as well as the operation of schools themselves. If we want to raise achievement, it is essential that we realise that schools cannot continue to operate as social hospitals, with teachers being asked to deal with almost every social problem that can arise. Of course, teachers and schools have a responsibility and duty to do something about the problems that come to them, but schools need the support of the community around them. They need the other policies that we have mentioned if they are to achieve their goal of raising standards.

The Tory objective is simple. People often say that there are no differences between the Labour and Conservative parties—it has been said to me. In all honesty, people who read the Hansard of this debate will see clear water between us, and I am proud of that. In essence, the Tory party today is standing for more selection, the protection of grammar and grant-maintained schools, and the protection of an education system that is rooted in the past. That policy would allow some schools and pupils to achieve, but it would not give opportunity to all children.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on being part of a team that has recognised that, if we are to achieve what we want in our schools, we need to tackle social exclusion and to ensure that all pupils have the opportunities to which they are entitled. We need to ensure that all schools succeed and that none are written off, as they have been in recent years.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): I will be as quick as possible. I want to make a brief contribution about the need to apply the principle of choice and diversity in Wales. I would argue that diversity ought to apply territorially, especially at this time, and not specifically in relation to the Government's proposals for the teaching profession.

That subject was recently debated in the National Assembly for Wales, of which I am proud to be a Member. I spoke in that debate to a Plaid Cymru motion that rejected the notion of payment by results and called for an alternative approach to be developed in Wales. During that debate, it became evident that a clear majority in the Assembly were in favour of the Plaid Cymru motion. The motion that we tabled certainly reflects the majority view in Wales as a whole.

As was said in that debate, Plaid Cymru accepts that the system of teacher remuneration and professional advancement needs reform. I agree with the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) about that. It is important that teachers should be rewarded for remaining in the class room and for being good teachers—I agree 100 per cent., speaking as a former teacher who never left the classroom for a management position. For that to happen, it would require an evaluation of teacher's performance—their expertise, commitment and professional development.

We are not arguing at this stage—we would not want to close off options for the future—for a separate pay bargaining structure for Wales, or for disparities in pay levels. However, we are arguing that Wales must be allowed to identify and apply criteria and processes for professional advancement and higher pay that might be different from those to be implemented in England. To make it clear, one element that we find totally unacceptable in the Government's proposals is the link between teachers' remuneration and pupil performance—or outcomes. That is certain to lead to injustice and to undermine teamwork. I am sure that many in this Chamber would agree with that.

We also reject the notion of linking teachers' eligibility for annual increments to the process of annual appraisal, as is stated in the technical notes that were published in both England and Wales. That would be intensely bureaucratic and time consuming and undermine the useful role of the annual appraisal when it is used well in schools. That process is based on trust. It is about identifying teachers' strengths and weaknesses, about teachers confessing, as it were, to their weaknesses, and about identifying means by which strengths may be developed and weaknesses corrected.

However, I do not want to get into detailed consideration of the merits and demerits of the Government's proposals, which are, by the way, just about identical for England and Wales, even though we have had a separate Green Paper. I emphasise that it would be entirely unacceptable if Wales, especially now that it has its own National Assembly, were forced to swallow the Government's nasty medicine in order, according to the Government, to make us better.

The suggestion has been made—it was made just before the election by the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain)—that, unless we in Wales agree to implement the Government's package in total, including payment by results, resources to improve teachers' pay will not be made available. That is totally outrageous. If it were applied, it would arouse fury in Wales and would be very damaging to the Government party in Wales, which has already suffered some damage, although there may be more to come.

In the debate in the Assembly, our group showed that it was prepared to be flexible. We did not oppose the amendment tabled by the Government of Wales, which was weaker than our motion. We suggested inserting the adjective "crude" before the sentence on links between pay and results. Ironically, both the Tories and the Liberal Democrats in the Assembly voted against the Government amendment, whereas we abstained.

We were flexible on the understanding that the relevant Assembly Committee and its Cabinet would develop an alternative set of proposals, based on a Welsh consensus, that addresses the needs of Wales, and that the Assembly would be able to implement such a set of proposals. It should be clearly understood that, if that does not happen, and if the Assembly Cabinet merely develops proposals that simply toe the United Kingdom Government line, the Assembly can and will defeat the proposals.

In this debate, I merely wanted courteously to ask the Government to ensure that the Assembly be given the flexibility—freedom is the right word, I think—to do what it regards as best for teaching and learning in Wales. That is no more or no less than we deserve.

9.34 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): This has been an important and valuable debate, which has highlighted the way in which the Government's policies are curtailing choice and opportunity in education. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) began the debate with a powerful speech, in which she described the damage that the Government have caused, and are threatening to cause, not least to pre-school provision, rural primary schools, sixth forms, grant-maintained schools and grammar schools.

My hon. Friends have made some excellent speeches. My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) made a very thoughtful speech, outlining the threats posed to Buckinghamshire educational system and to sixth forms in his constituency. He made some thoughtful points about the unconvincing assurance given by the Government on future funding of sixth forms and the possible problems in coping with future demands on them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser) touched on some important issues for his constituency and its two grammar schools. My hon. Friends the Members for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) and for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) have been listening attentively, and I know from previous debates, including an Adjournment debate last week, that they are very concerned about the threat to local grant-maintained schools and their funding.

It is always a great pleasure to hear from the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). The theme of his speech was moving on. Thinking back to our debates on the Education Bill in 1993, when the hon. Gentleman spoke at length, I found it hard to identify how he had moved on. He was still saying that the Government were not spending enough and the Liberal Democrats would spend more. I listened for long enough and eventually we heard about the magic penny as well. I agreed with the hon. Gentleman on targets for the lowest 20 or 25 per cent. Without going into the overall merits of target setting, we need to have high expectations for all our pupils, including the lowest 20 or 25 per cent.

After praising the Government, the hon. Gentleman then attacked them on their education funding record, pointing out that the Audit Commission had said that funding per pupil had gone down under this Government. It is difficult to know what the Liberal Democrats found to praise after the hon. Gentleman attacked the central pillar of the Secretary of State's case.

I also listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks). I did not agree with all of it, but he made an important point about the need to increase the number of children from lower income families who go on to university. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that we must look with concern at the effects that the Government's package on tuition fees and maintenance grants has on the number of children from those backgrounds who have the opportunity to go on to higher education.

I am afraid that I do not have sufficient time to mention all the contributions from Labour Members. Suffice it to say that I think that there was a narrow majority of those who had the benefit of a grammar school education over those who with the benefit of a public school education.

The Secretary of State also took as his theme the need to move on. On grammar schools and grant-maintained schools, the Government have moved on most from the promises that they made before and immediately after the general election. We heard this afternoon about the promises that the Prime Minister gave to the voters of Wirral, South in 1997 that parents there need not worry about a Labour Government doing away with their grammar schools. Barely a month before the general election, he promised in The Times Educational Supplement that "grant-maintained schools will prosper". In her analysis of the funding position of grant-maintained schools and her long list of schools throughout the country that have had difficulties, my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead gave the lie to that.

After the general election, we were told by the then Minister for School Standards that the Government's aim was to level up, not level down. He told the Standing Committee considering the School Standards and Framework Bill:

"We have said that our objective is not to cut the amount being spent on pupils in GM schools, but to increase the funding for pupils in other schools. We are therefore levelling up."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 12 February 1998; c. 461.]

If that was the Government's objective, they have failed. Nobody has admitted that more clearly than the Secretary of State, who said that there was a need to introduce cash protection and transitional funding for grant-maintained schools to protect them from the budget shortfalls that they have experienced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead cited grant-maintained schools throughout the country that have experienced serious difficulties because of budget deficits, causing great problems for the education of their children. My hon. Friend could have added to that list schools in my constituency, including Wroxham school, which I visited this morning. The Secretary of State spoke of moving on, but all that have moved on from Wroxham school are classroom assistants and learning support assistants, who have been forced to do so by the school's £30,000 deficit.

Miss Melanie Johnson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: Yes. Perhaps the hon. Lady will tell us about the difficulties experienced by schools in her constituency.

Miss Johnson: I want to ask the hon. Gentleman the question that I asked the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) earlier. Does he support the present Tory leader of our county council, who proposes not to send an extra 6 per cent. of funding to schools next year? Those schools include ones in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and mine, which will have to make cuts as a result of the failure to send on the extra money that the Government are spending on education, or that they would spend if Tory-run councils would let them.

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Lady knows that the budget for Hertfordshire was set by the so-called administration group, which was Liberal-Labour controlled. The Secretary of State had to write to that group to complain about the amount of money that it was withholding from schools.

Schools have suffered up and down the country. The Secretary of State prayed in aid the words of Mr. Bob Lloyd of the grant-maintained schools joint monitoring group. That is the same Mr. Lloyd who provided us with an analysis of the position this year, rather than next year, which the Secretary of State was talking about. Mr. Lloyd describes the present position in grant-maintained schools and the practical consequences of the Government's policies. The average grant-maintained secondary school on cash protection—two thirds of them are on cash protection—is £96,000 worse off, which equates to approximately four teaching posts. Grant-maintained primary schools are, on average, £22,000 worse off, which equates to one teaching post.

Wroxham school in my constituency is aware of the Secretary of State's announcement about next year, and it is hardly dancing with glee about his alleged generosity in providing the school with barely enough of an increase to match inflation, when the school is already suffering a serious deficit in its budget and the classroom and learning support assistants have already gone. That is the overall picture for grant-maintained schools and, if that is prosperity, goodness save us from this Government and their idea of prosperity.

[Mr. Clappison]

The Prime Minister has clearly moved on from his promises about grammar schools made before the election. He said:

"The reason why I don't say it's part of the Government's policy to get rid of all grammar schools is that I think if a school's doing a good job, then you don't want to get rid of that school."

Having listened to this debate and heard speaker after speaker express hostility to grammar schools, I know that the Prime Minister's sentiment is not shared by the vast majority of his Back-Bench colleagues or, apparently, by many Labour activists.

Dr. George Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: No. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about ballots?"] Hon. Members mention ballots. The Prime Minister told us today that there was no need to worry because there had been no ballots and there was no need for scaremongering. In fact, ballots cannot be held until September. The Department for Education and Employment has received inquiries from campaigners against grammar schools, many of whom are Labour party activists, about petitions to get rid of grammar schools. The Minister will be aware of newspaper reports about Labour activists throughout the country using Labour party offices, presumably with the blessing of some of the MPs who have spoken this evening, for their campaign to get rid of grammar schools.

I agreed with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury. What do those activists think will be the effect on children and teachers in those schools of the prospect of upheaval of months and months of campaigning? Nothing could be more calculated to damage the provision of education in those schools.

What will be the consequence in the long run? [Interruption.] Hon. Members do not want to know, but let me remind them of the likely consequences of the upheavals that they propose. Eric Hammond, former union boss and governor of Gravesend grammar school, who is battling to keep selection in Kent's grammar schools, said:

"I wouldn't like to see selection by merit replaced by selection by purse."

That is one of the possible outcomes.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North talked about free school meals and gave us a sociological analysis. There could be no clearer division than the one that we face if those activists have their way because, if those schools become independent, the only people who will go to them are those who can afford to pay full fees. The Government are delivering educational opportunity for the few at the expense of educational opportunity for the many, as Labour Members might say.

When one looks at the picture and sees what the Government have done to take away opportunities, by abolishing the assisted places—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I appeal to hon. Members to calm down and listen to the hon. Gentleman. I also appeal to the hon. Gentleman to calm down.

Mr. Clappison: Labour Members are displaying the vigour with which they wish to abolish grammar schools. That is how the Government pursue their ends—often by stealth, but always with vigour, but so that the Prime Minister can hold up his hands, say, "Not me, guv—it's all scaremongering," and give bland reassurances about the future. Meanwhile, his Back Benchers and his party outside Parliament work and campaign to undermine the promises he solemnly made to voters before the last general election.

When I look at what the Government have done to take away opportunity, especially from those who are less well-off, by abolishing assisted places and attacking grant-maintained schools and grammar schools, I have to ask, what is it that the Labour party has against the less well-off that it wants to take educational opportunities from them at every turn? This debate has highlighted the real threat that the Labour Government pose to choice, opportunity and diversity, with their almost Cromwellian determination to sweep across the country attacking any adornment or centre of excellence in the state education system.

I invite Ministers and Labour Back Benchers to think about the damage that they are doing to schools, the uncertainty that they are causing and the teachers and classroom assistants who might have to be made redundant. The Secretary of State boasted that the Government are making a difference, but, for all too many children in our schools, that difference is that they will receive an inferior education because of the Labour Government's policies.

9.47 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on his appointment to the Opposition Front Bench. In the past two years, there appears to have been rapid turnover in the shadow Education and Employment team. I think that this is the third team we have faced; let us hope, for their sake, that they do better than the previous two.

It would appear that one of the qualifications for appointment to the Opposition Front Bench is selective amnesia extending back over the 18 years of Tory rule. In his first speech as an education spokesman, the hon. Gentleman spent nigh on 15 minutes talking about two subjects, and two subjects only: grammar schools and grant-maintained schools. From their speeches today, I gather that the great thing that the Conservatives achieved during 18 years in office—the thing that they most want to defend, the thing that they most mind losing and the thing that, to them, encapsulates diversity—is their policy on grammar schools and grant-maintained schools. Let us see what they achieved with that policy.

The result of the Conservatives' policy on grammar schools was not a grammar school in every town or an expansion of grammar schools, but a steady contraction of grammar schools as the Tory years rolled on. When they left office, they left 160 grammar schools, compared with thousands when they took office in the 1970s. If grant-maintained schools were the second strand of their diverse education system, it amounted to only 1,000 schools. So what the Tories are celebrating today is having left a system that was meant to be diverse and was made up of two elements—160 grammar schools and 1,000 grant-maintained schools. All that after 18 years! If that is what the Tories come to the House today and talk about with pride, with not one word about the 23,000 other schools that make up the English education system, it is not surprising that they lost the last election with such great force.

The Conservative Government fiddled with creating 1,000 grant-maintained schools and thought that that would solve the nation's problems, but they left the nation not an education system rich in diversity but one in which four out of 10 11-year-olds could not read and write properly; in which more than half of 16-year-olds could not achieve five or more higher grade GCSEs; in which 2.3 per cent. of schools were failing; and in which one in 10 schools had serious weaknesses and a third were not as good as they should have been. They left a £4 billion backlog of repairs and an expensive and wasteful nursery voucher scheme. They put a standstill on the expansion in higher education numbers. Schools had to cope with reduced budgets year after year under the Tory Government.

There was no system for dealing with failing LEAs. The Conservative Government had no levers to raise standards. That was what their vision of diversity brought about. That was what Tory diversity and choice was all about—a system that let down too many of the nation's children.

Mrs. May: The Minister has just said that there were no levers for raising standards under the previous Government. Does she accept that we introduced tests and the Office for Standards in Education? The Government are able to talk about standards in schools only because we introduced a rigorous inspection regime that publishes accountable statistics about the standards in schools.

Ms Morris: The hon. Lady talks about that, but the truth is that the Tory Government only did half the job. Tests and inspection reports reveal the problem. The real levers for raising standards are the action taken when the problems have been identified. In cases where inspection has revealed that a school is failing, we now have clear targets for improvement and options for action if it is not made. Where performance tables show a shortfall in the performance of schools, we have targets for improvement. There is monitoring, support, pressure and action where targets are not reached. Those are the levers for raising standards that are needed. It is not a case of letting someone else find the information and turning one's back on it. The Government must accept responsibility to use the levers for raising standards.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the hon. Lady tell the House how she and her party voted on the introduction of Ofsted and the inspection of schools?

Ms Morris: I was not a Member of the House at that time so I did not cast a vote. The Labour party did not vote against Ofsted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks) was right when he said that as we approach the millennium the challenge for the educational system is that which it has never been before. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) also intimated that. The challenge is not about raising standards for a few or sectioning off certain schools and giving them more funding. It is about raising standards for all children and making sure that every youngster who leaves school does so with the basic skills, committed to lifelong learning and with the attitudes that will serve them well in adult life. That is the sort of choice and diversity that we have been acting on in the past two years. That is why we turned our back on the old, sterile arguments that were for the last century, not the next. That is why we have taken action to double the number of three-year-olds in nursery places and guarantee a place for all four-year-olds. We have introduced a sure start programme with £450 million. We have made sure that in 18 months' time there will be no five, six or seven-year-old in a class of more than 30.

We have put money into measures to reduce exclusion. We have made sure that every teacher will be trained to use information and communications technology, that every school will be connected to the national grid for learning and that we shall have a teaching force and school system that is kitted up to do the best that it can to meet the challenges of ICT.

The hon. Member for Bath was right. We wait for the Tories to adopt the new and pressing agenda for the nation. Not one word from the Opposition today gives me any confidence that, after two years in opposition, they have learned that lesson. The parents of this country want a Government who face the future and do not look back to the past. What we have heard today is a Conservative Opposition who harp on about arguments that they have lost. They lost with parents, they lost with teachers and, two years ago, they lost at the ballot box.

Conservative Members referred to the 160 grammar schools, and we will leave that matter to the parents. The Conservatives took action at central Government level to abolish more grammar schools than any other party did in a similar time scale.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Morris: No, I am nearly out of time. Grant-maintained schools were about differential funding—not on the basis of the needs of children, but on the basis of the status and structure of schools. We have put that argument behind us.

The saddest thing was that, having failed to adopt the new agenda and having wasted three hours talking about grammar schools and grant-maintained schools while the rest of the world has moved on, the Conservatives could not even embrace the success of the literary and numeracy strategy. The hon. Member for Maidenhead quoted out-of-date figures and painted a picture of what teachers feared would happen at the start of the year. All the evidence from Ofsted, the National Foundation for Educational Research and teachers themselves shows that 90 per cent. of heads feel that it is a good system and 80 per cent. of teachers believe that it will raise standards.

I know that the hon. Member for Maidenhead does not believe the Ofsted evidence or the research from the NFER. What I know she likes is evidence quoted in teacher union magazines, so I shall quote from one of her favourite sources—the journal of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers. Adam Gibson, starting his third year at a new primary school in Derby, said of the literacy hour:

> "Most primary teachers feel the literacy framework is at worst a superb scheme of work and at best a genuine educational innovation."

I rest my case. Those words are not based on Government research. They are the words of the hon. Lady's tried and trusted friends—those who write in trade union journals.

[Ms Morris]

The hon. Member for Hertsmere not only has a selective memory—he was ungracious in his comments. I was waiting for him to turn away from his sterile arguments of the past and to acknowledge that, in the past two years, we have spent £1.8 million to reduce class sizes in his constituency. In his own area, 2,500 fewer infant children are in classes of over 30. In his own area, there will be 102 extra teachers and nine new classrooms this September to deal with infant class sizes. In his area, £9 million is being put in for capital expenditure to repair schools.

If we throw in the constituencies of the hon. Members for Maidenhead and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), we find that 4,000 five, six and seven-year-olds are in smaller classes. Between the three constituencies, there are 35 extra classrooms and 200 extra teachers. Between them, they have £35 million capital to repair their schools. That is what two years of Labour has done for three Opposition constituencies. Multiply that many times over, and that shows the nature of the choice and diversity that we have created.

Our policy is not about separation or favouring the few, but about real choice for parents between excellent schools. Our policy on diversity means that parents have the option of out-of-school learning activities, and can choose schools on their strengths. However, the policy is not just about choice and diversity, but about standards. We will be judged by that and by nothing else. All the evidence shows that so far we are making good progress. Over the next few years we will see something happen that has never happened before: we will have an education service that is fit and ready for the next millennium.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's success in cutting infant class sizes after 10 years of rising class sizes and the successful introduction of the literacy hour, which is restoring phonics, spelling and grammar to the primary school curriculum; notes the plans to extend daily numeracy lessons nationwide from September, which will place strong emphasis on mental arithmetic; recognises the Government's strong commitment to diversity through the rapid expansion of specialist schools and beacon schools; welcomes the success to date of the Government's policy in support of failing schools; supports the considerable work already undertaken to reduce bureaucracy in schools following years of neglect; supports the Government's new code of practice on school admissions; welcomes the new White Paper on reform of post-16 education and the clear guarantees it offers on sixth form funding; supports the Government's plans to reward good teaching; and believes that the extra £19 billion allocated to education is beginning to make a real difference to the money available to schools, not least in tackling the substantial repairs and maintenance backlog.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

CIVIL AVIATION

That the draft Stansted Airport Aircraft Movement Limit (Amendment) Order 1999, which was laid before this House on 16th June, be approved.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

Question agreed to.

Preston Guild Community Health Trust

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

10.26 pm

Audrey Wise (Preston): In 1990 the then Preston health authority appointed Mr. Les Howell as general manager. He is now suspended and has been informed that his contract has been terminated. The purpose of tonight's debate is to examine that situation and relate it to wider concerns about mental health and community services in Preston.

When Mr. Howell was appointed, his remit was to merge two directly managed units—one covering mental health and the other dealing with community services—that would together form the priority services unit. The previous general manager of the mental health services had been dismissed and the services provided were variable to poor, except for those covering learning disabilities, which were good. Mental health services were in a disgraceful condition.

The trouble had been long standing. In 1972, there was a major statutory inquiry—the Payne inquiry—into Whittingham mental hospital. The report showed abuses and ill-treatment of patients. One patient died as a result of ill-treatment.

On taking over in 1990, it appeared to Mr. Howell that little had changed. As always, some staff were doing their level best, but in general the standards at Whittingham hospital were appalling. For example, toilets on the corridors were locked to stop patients accessing them. Sexual abuse of patients was discovered, a senior psychologist was dismissed and a charge nurse was sent to prison for two years for having unlawful intercourse with a patient. Pornography was found, and attempted suicides were frequent and sometimes successful. In one case a 16-year-old girl was found hanging from a shower rail.

In 30 years in the national health service the new general manager, Mr. Howell, had never experienced such a bad situation and seriously considered leaving six months after his appointment. However, he stuck it out, successfully integrated two management teams and created the new combined unit and later the Preston Guild community trust.

The closure of Whittingham hospital was successfully managed. It included negotiations with 46 other organisations to achieve the successful transfer of patients and resources. The closure programme was agreed at 36 months and delivered on time with only 18 compulsory redundancies, although 760 staff had been declared at risk.

Although hospitals such as Whittingham certainly needed to be closed, there are many unresolved issues. In the case of Whittingham, unusually, local people supported the existence of mental health facilities on the site. Mr. Howell proposed developing the site into a health park that would provide a comprehensive range of mental health services such as forensic services including high security, also palliative care, and a range of holiday and respite facilities for mentally and physically disordered people.

The idea was presented to the regional chief executive, Professor Tinston, received politely, and deferred. Mr. Howell formed the view that it was not favoured. That may be because it is preferred that the site should be sold for housing development, which is very much against the local community's wishes and will not help to meet any of the clear needs for improved facilities for mental health services. I would much prefer an imaginative idea such as Mr. Howell's, and I regard it as characteristic of the man that he was working on such a proposal.

My hon. Friend the Minister suggested to me that the trust should "build on its past record".—[Official Report, 8 June 1999; Vol. 332, c. 460.]

That implies that there is a record worth building on; and there is. The Guild trust has a unique facility for the care of patients with advanced Huntington's disease, which is a genetically carried severe degenerative disease—one of the most distressing diseases that there is. Frank Gardham house is the only dedicated facility in the country; the only other one in the world is in Melbourne, Australia.

It is generally acknowledged that the inspiration for Frank Gardham house came from Mr. Howell. It was designed and developed and is managed jointly with carers. Last August, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health presented Mr. Howell with a special NHS 50th anniversary award to the trust for Frank Gardham house. The only problems are that it should be replicated elsewhere and that North West Lancashire health authority should fund more beds for local people. Current funding allows for only three or four people from our area.

As the local Member of Parliament, I am painfully aware that that is insufficient. As with all genetic diseases, there can be area clusters, and Preston is such an area for Huntington's disease. Unfortunately, the health authority does not share the view of the NHS or the Secretary of State about Frank Gardham house and I have had to raise questions about funding and provision for my constituents that have not, in my view, been dealt with satisfactorily.

I am sorry to say that the situation has worsened since Mr. Howell's suspension last autumn. Indeed, I have since been informed by the health authority that "The Authority has consistently maintained that, as far as possible, services for people with this condition should be provided in the community."

In 1995, I made representations about the need to admit a patient with Huntington's who was living in a night shelter. I have copies of correspondence that show a complete lack of understanding by North West Lancashire health authority of the needs of patients with Huntington's. There was even a claim that their needs could be met by a social care package from social services.

There was considerable unwillingness to pay for a suitable service. In a letter to me, the chief executive, Mr. David Edmondson, simply passed the buck to the Guild and blamed it for failure to admit the patient. He did not tell me that the Guild had already raised the patient's plight, nor did he then make it clear that the health authority really did not like paying for the provision and would prefer it to end.

I now understand from both the acting chief executive of the Guild and North West Lancashire health authority that the Guild is reviewing its range of provision

"with a view to moving towards a more community based service in the future, thus reducing the need for residential places."

Frank Gardham house is a small specialist unit with deeply involved carers. In my view, it is part of the community; but of course it costs more than care in the patient's home or a nursing home.

I have already informed my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that I intend to fight hard for the maintenance of the service. I consider that Mr. Howell's removal was seen as an opportunity to worsen the service. One of the criticisms levelled at Mr. Howell is that he has a bad relationship with Mr. Edmondson. I strongly suspect that that may be connected with Mr. Howell's propensity to want more funding for services such as Frank Gardham house, arising from his passionate concern for patients.

The Preston area contains many people from minority ethnic communities. Under Mr. Howell's leadership, very good relationships have been built with those communities. Projects include jointly organising workshops and local conferences sponsored by the Guild trust. They have helped local communities express their views on how to make services more accessible and appropriate for their cultures. Projects have included mental health, women's issues and services for children, and the results have been recorded in various languages and reported back to the communities. That is why there is such support for Mr. Howell among the ethnic minorities.

Last September, a national conference on health care for minority ethnic groups was organised by the Guild trust, with the co-operation of six other trusts, and three universities and colleges. Unfortunately, the appropriate health authorities, including North West Lancashire, declined to take part.

Apart from a conference organised by the Department in 1997, that was the first national conference on the issue. Having participated, I can vouch for its resounding success. It was informative, constructive and thought provoking at every level. It involved both professional and lay people from all communities in the UK, and it crossed the health and social services divide which, as my hon. Friend the Minister knows, is usually all too wide.

I do not believe that that conference would have taken place without Mr. Howell's inspiration and guidance. It was intended to be the first step towards setting up an institute of minority communities health and social care, but I have not observed any progress towards that aim since his suspension.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Audrey Wise: No. The hon. Gentleman had an Adjournment debate a few weeks ago, and should be satisfied with that.

Since Mr. Howell's suspension, I have received many expressions of support for him from all sections of the minority communities in Preston and throughout Lancashire. I have also received expressions of support for him from carers of trust patients.

One of those who wanted to get rid of Mr. Howell described him as "very clever, imaginative and passionate about the Health Service."

That is quite a good reference from an opponent. However, a person who brings single-minded commitment to his job, which entails sorting out problems such as I have outlined, is apt to make enemies, and Les Howell has clearly done that.

Now the opportunity has been taken to get rid of him. How did that opportunity arise? As is not uncommon in organisations dealing with mentally disturbed patients, incidents have taken place that have sparked concern and inquiries.

Two such incidents occurred in 1996. The first involved two patients, Julie Byelong and her husband Douglas. Douglas Byelong was on conditional discharge by order of the Secretary of State, the condition being that he lived in his flat, which he failed to do. Julie Byelong absconded on unsupervised leave granted as part of a medical decision. They committed the serious offences of attempted murder and kidnap. Both had been patients at the Langdale unit, a medium-secure forensic unit for Lancashire and south Cumbria. The majority of its patients are detained under the Mental Health Act 1983, and most suffer from severe mental illness.

A detailed report into the matter states:

"The service has been historically under resourced."

I regard that as a very significant statement. Various recommendations were made and were being progressed according to plan, but it seems to me that problems of under-resourcing almost certainly persist.

The second incident involved a discharged patient, Daniel Holden, who later committed murder. The court found that he was not mentally ill at the time of the murder. It was agreed—by the court and by a subsequent inquiry—that the trust bore no responsibility for the fact that he committed murder. However, the inquiry found that there were deficiencies in the care that he had received in the community while a patient, and made some recommendations about that. Surprisingly, it also imported into the report some strong criticisms of the chief executive. I have analysed the report carefully, and those criticisms do not seem to me to be properly justified by the report's factual findings.

Mr. Howell took exception to the report, and made what I consider to be a mistake in the way that he handled it. That gave his opponents an opportunity, and they took full advantage of it.

Mr. Howell replied to the draft Holden report before he consulted the board, although he did consult the then chairman. Mr. Howell's reply was a defence of the trust as well as of himself. It was understandable and probably justified, but it was a lapse of judgment to send it before consulting the board. The chair, Mrs. Diamond, was then pressured into suspending him on threat of a vote of no confidence in herself as well.

The Galbraith inquiry was then set up. Mr. Howell had understood that his suspension was without prejudice and he was in favour of an inquiry. However, the inquiry panel interpreted its terms of reference as meaning that it should set aside all issues of Mr. Howell's achievements and consider only whether there had been a loss of confidence in him.

Every other inquiry had given lists of those who gave evidence and had made detailed reference to factual matters and documents. The Galbraith inquiry did not disclose who gave evidence, nor any documentary back-up, nor the basis on which it decided whom to interview and whom to refuse to interview. Having confidence in Mr. Howell was given no weight, but losing confidence in him carried great weight.

The then trust chair is heavily criticised for having too much confidence in the chief executive. Insinuations are made about the capability of the then human resources director, who has now successfully obtained a position with another trust, but who also had, apparently, the fatal flaw of having confidence in the chief executive.

Two non-executive directors, Mr. Nelson and Mr. Mallidi, had been very reluctant about the suspension in the first place, but three non-executive directors had favoured it. Therefore, the margin was not exactly huge, but the impression has been given that no one had any confidence in the chief executive and that he was unable to work with other people.

Some staff were critical. I have discussed that with some of them, but they did say to me that Guild trust services were second to none and far better than others in Lancashire, and that they had a staff training system that was also second to none. However, they apparently gave the chief executive none of the credit for that of which they approved, and all the blame for what they did not like. Most of what they did not like appeared to result from changes in the NHS through the establishment of trusts, many criticisms of which I agree with.

The Galbraith report established that some people have lost confidence in Mr. Howell, but not whether that loss of confidence was well founded or justified. I have never seen such a shoddy or flimsy document on which to base serious action. Mr. Howell has been thoroughly victimised. He has faced no specific charges, so has had no opportunity to rebut specific charges. Vague assertions of loss of confidence are not the same as being guilty of wrongdoing that justifies the deprivation of a person's livelihood, yet that is what is happening.

The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), told me that "the proper procedures have been followed" and that

"there has been proper consultation with the regional office."—[Official Report, 8 June 1999; Vol. 332, c. 460.]

I wonder whether he really thinks it is permissible for the NHS to sack an employee without disciplinary procedures. I think that, on reflection, he will decide that it is not.

A chief executive with a difficult job to discharge may become unpopular with some people, especially if he finds it necessary to complain about some of their work. Mr. Howell had indeed complained about the work of two of the executive directors—the director of finance, Mr. Tomlinson, and the then director of nursing, Mrs. Hedley. I have details of that available, but no time to elaborate here.

As I have said, the board was divided. Three non-executive directors opposed Mr. Howell, while the then chairman and two non-executive directors supported him, although they reluctantly agreed to the suspension.

At first, Mr. Howell was extremely anxious to return to the Guild trust. His first reactions were a robust desire to vindicate himself and the work of the Guild trust and to resume his work. However, his health has subsequently been badly damaged by what has been a long and bitter dispute, and by his feelings of injustice and victimisation. He has been isolated, had no access to papers from which to prepare a case and, indeed, no one to whom he could present a case. He was, and remains, strongly of the view that there should be a proper public inquiry into all those circumstances. However, as I said, his health has been badly damaged and he wishes to take early retirement on medical grounds, to which he may well be entitled. A proposal for early retirement had been put to him and he has accepted it, subject to clarification which was never received.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has now appointed a new temporary chair and a new board. I have been astonished to find that, without even seeing Mr. Howell or his representatives, it has decided to terminate his contract. It has even ignored the fact that he is probably entitled to early retirement on medical grounds, which would not involve the trust in any expense. Instead it has issued press releases publicising its decision, even while ostensibly allowing Mr. Howell a right of appeal. Incorrect statements implying that Mr. Howell had been demanding large sums of money have been allowed to gain credence and his reputation has been damaged—in his opinion, irreparably.

Mr. Howell has played an important part in building an improved service in my area. He has committed no misdemeanours or offences of any sort, he is passionately devoted to patients and their families and to the national health service, yet he is rewarded by being deprived of several years' employment. That is damaging to the NHS as well as a great injustice.

Mr. Evans: Let the Minister reply.

Audrey Wise: I do not expect the Minister to give me a definitive reply and I am aware that I have left him little time, but I hope that he will earnestly reflect on what I have said. Indeed, I am sure that he will do so.

10.46 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): I should begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) on obtaining this Adjournment debate. The events at the Guild Community Health Care national health service trust have generated a considerable amount of public and political interest. Indeed, this is the second time that the House has debated events at the trust in just under a month.

My hon. Friend has spoken of the good work of the trust and the achievements of the former trust chief executive, Mr. Les Howell. His contract has recently been terminated and he has appealed against that decision. Obviously, hon. Members will understand that it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the correctness of the action or the appeal that is pending at this time.

The trust's difficulties have been widely discussed and reported in recent weeks, but, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, they go back much further than that. The former chairman's decision, formally to suspend the chief executive on full pay and without prejudice from 5 October 1998, followed successive inquiries and reports by different, independent panels, all of which had identified unsound practices and failure to follow the appropriate procedures.

The effect on a trust whose patients are often disturbed and vulnerable people was obviously a matter of the utmost concern to those who commission its services, to the local community and to the people who work in it.

At the risk of repeating some of the history, in early 1997, the North West Lancashire health authority received the report of an inquiry that it had commissioned into an incident involving a patient who had absconded from the Langdale unit. That report made 44 recommendations for improvements to the clinical, nursing, administrative and security services at the trust. The report also referred to some poor external relations, most notably the relationship between the Guild and the lead commissioner of its services, North West Lancashire health authority. Furthermore, the report observed that "the provision of community services" had

"evolved in an unplanned and inchoate fashion".

The draft report into the care and treatment of Daniel Holden, however, which East Lancashire health authority received in the summer of 1998, precipitated the actions to suspend, and subsequently to dismiss, the chief executive. Daniel Holden was on the Langdale unit's supervision register when he murdered a neighbour in Darwen in March 1997. Since the patient was an East Lancashire resident at the time, it fell to that health authority to launch an independent inquiry in line with statutory requirements. The report concluded that the chief executive's

"responsibilities had not been adequately discharged" and that the board should, therefore, consider how to bring about changes in management style that would enable the trust to make a fresh start.

The inquiry had been conducted over six months, and its final report, the Holden report, itemised failures by the trust to carry out certain fundamental procedures correctly, if at all. By last summer, there were indications that the trust had taken steps to address the recommendations of earlier reports and that some of the clinical, nursing and administrative inadequacies identified had been put right.

On 20 August 1998, however, East Lancashire health authority invited the trust to check the draft Holden report for "any factual inaccuracies, so that a final report could be produced and formally received and considered by the Health Authority."

I am advised that the response of the trust's chief executive to the draft report was the cause of concern for some members of the trust board.

On 1 October, three executive and three non-executive directors of the Guild visited the regional offices of the NHS executive to voice their concerns to the chairman of the north-west regional office and the regional director. On 2 October, the three non-executive directors gave the chairman, Mrs. Diamond, a letter in which they called for Mr. Howell's suspension.

Regional officials met Mrs. Diamond a week later. She had already spoken to Mr. Howell and advised him to stay at home on extended leave while the trust board considered how to respond to the Holden report. The regional director explained to her that, unless Mr. Howell were formally suspended from his post, he would remain the accountable officer for the trust and that that would not be satisfactory. As a consequence, Mrs. Diamond wrote to Mr. Howell suspending him on full pay and without prejudice from 5 October.

The trust board then unanimously agreed to commission an investigation into the specific criticisms of the chief executive in the Holden report. The regional office offered advice about suitable candidates to undertake this work; a list of several names was put forward for consideration, and the chairman and non-executive directors took the final decision.

The inquiry team consisted of a chairman, Mrs. Ann Galbraith, former chair of a major trust in another region, and one other panel member, Mr. Neil Campbell, chief executive of the Dumfries and Galloway health board. The terms of reference were agreed unanimously by the trust board on 20 October.

The panel drew up a list of people to be interviewed and then offered all Guild employees, by means of a special edition of the staff bulletin, the opportunity to give confidential evidence to the inquiry. The panel's report, known as the Galbraith report, was completed just before Christmas. It upheld many of the findings of the Holden report and concluded that the chief executive's position was "untenable". The report refers to people being "keen to record their appreciation of Mr. Howell and to illustrate his achievements during his employment at the Guild", but it also stated:

"The panel is greatly concerned by the sheer weight of opinion showing a lack of confidence in the management style of Mr. Howell."

The panel advised the trust board that Mr. Howell had lost the confidence of a significant number of the individuals and organisations with whom and with which he had had regular contact.

At a meeting on 29 December 1998, the chairman and non-executive directors agreed to accept the report's first recommendation, which indicated that Mr. Howell's position had become "untenable". After discussing her own position with the regional chairman on 9 January 1999, Mrs. Diamond resigned as chairman two days later. Between January and March, the non-executive directors had further discussions and on-going negotiations with Mr. Howell's representatives.

On 19 April, the Secretary of State met Mrs. Kirk, the current chair of the trust, and concluded that she was the right person to lead the trust. She agreed to take up the post for six months with effect from 17 May. The Secretary of State and Mrs. Kirk discussed the need for a fresh start, and the House will know for reasons that I have previously outlined that three non-executives were subsequently removed from office and two resigned. A new non-executive team was appointed from 18 June.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Denham: No, I cannot possibly give way at this time.

After looking into the background to Mr. Howell's suspension, Mrs. Kirk concluded that the need to establish strong leadership was paramount and that the trust's genuine attempts to negotiate with him had stalled. She recommended to her trust board that Mr. Howell should be dismissed. It unanimously approved that course of action and the chairman wrote to inform Mr. Howell that his appointment would be terminated from 11 June. He has since exercised his right of appeal, and I understand that a meeting has been arranged for 13 July to exchange documentation and agree the process for the appeal and the dates for the hearing.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Denham: No. The hon. Gentleman had an extended Adjournment debate just a few weeks ago.

[Mr. Denham]

The appeals panel that has been established by the trust consists of Mr. Ian Pirnie, the former chairman of Ashworth high security hospital and present chairman of Morecambe Bay health authority, Dr. Nuala Swords-Isherwood, chairman of Stockport Acute Services NHS trust and Mr. Mike Deegan, chief executive of Warrington Hospital NHS trust, who was previously director of human resources for the NHS Executive. The panel is charged with establishing whether the chairman and non-executive directors of the trust have acted appropriately in terminating Mr. Howell's contract of employment. The dispute is between Mr. Howell and his ex-employers, and it is for the panel to judge whether the interests of natural justice have been properly served.

This has been a unique and difficult chapter in the history of NHS trusts, but our overriding objective throughout has been to ensure that the patients and staff of Guild Community Health Care NHS trust are provided with the best possible conditions in which to receive and deliver treatment and care. I hope that matters will be brought to a satisfactory conclusion as quickly as possible, that all the people affected by the events of recent months can resume their normal lives and that the trust can get on with the business of providing good quality health services to the local community.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

New Deal

1. Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): How he proposes to improve the promotion of self–employment through the new deal. [88964]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): We are promoting the self-employment option through personal advisers. By the end of May, 1,800 young unemployed people had started on new deal business courses, 800 had started test trading and more than 100 were independently running their own businesses. The very best promotion for the new deal self-employment option is the success of young people themselves, such as Mark Venning in Plymouth, who has not only started his own business through the new deal, but is now poised to recruit his first new deal employee.

Mr. Pond: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Is he aware that my hon. Friends in north Kent and I have carried out an inquiry into the operation of the new deal in our area? Generally, the response from those involved has been positive and enthusiastic. However, the concern is—it is certainly the perception—that the potential for self-employment has not been fully exploited. In building on the success of the new deal, and in developing the new ONE service, will he give the House an assurance that he will consult organisations such as the Prince's Trust, to ensure that young people with a good business idea can use their energies, talents and abilities to move out of unemployment and into self-employment?

Mr. Smith: I congratulate my hon. Friends on their work locally, which builds on the extensive involvement of hon. Members in the new deal. That has been something of an innovation, and has greatly contributed to the success of the programme. We are working closely with the Prince's Trust Business, and I was pleased recently to announce, with the support of all parties in the House, an extra £50 million of matched funding, which should enable an additional 30,000 young people to start their own businesses over the next five years. A significant proportion of those 30,000 will be new deal young unemployed people.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): The Minister's statement is encouraging for those who have taken advantage of new deal opportunities. Does he agree with me and many colleagues present that there are individuals throughout our constituencies who did not achieve much academically at school, but who after leaving school have, with initiative and support, become successful in self-employment? Does he further agree that organisations such as the local economic development enterprise groups in Northern Ireland, which encourage new business start-ups, could provide support; and that, through the new deal, placements could be found for business start-up in such organisations?

Mr. Smith: Yes, I do agree. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support for the programme, which, if it can help to tackle the historically high unemployment in his constituency and in neighbouring areas, will make a big contribution to overcoming the sectarian divisions that must be overcome if we are to make a success of the peace process, which we all want. I commend the efforts of start-up bodies, the Employment Service in Northern Ireland and local businesses, which are doing their bit in a great partnership effort to give new hope to young people who have had a rough start in life.

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): My right hon. Friend has recently announced continuous improvement targets for next year of 6 per cent. to boost the number of young people going into unsubsidised and subsidised jobs. They are good, fair targets. Will he confirm whether similar improvement targets have been set for the self-employment option, given its importance within the new deal programme? If not, will he consider doing so?

Mr. Smith: Yes, indeed. It is actually a 6 percentage point improvement, which could mean an increase of as much as a third in some of the poorly performing units of delivery, and an increase of about 8 per cent. even in the best performing units. People who are securing self-employment through the new deal self-employment option are included in those targets.

I shall give further thought to the question of whether we need specific targets for self-employment. I would inject a note of caution, however, because self-employment is not a realistic aspiration for everyone, and it is important that young people who start up their own business do so with their eyes open and with the right degree of support.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): We welcome any chance for new deal recruits to end up working for themselves, especially as most of them have had little chance to end up working for anyone else. On the right hon. Gentleman's own admission, more than 16,000 recruits have gone back on benefits, almost 40,000 have disappeared to destinations unknown, and three quarters have failed to find employment. The Business Services Association, which started by supporting the scheme, says that the new deal has not proved effective at matching candidates to job vacancies. What guarantee can the right hon. Gentleman give the House that his latest scheme will not be as big a failure as his previous botched efforts?

Mr. Smith: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his appointment to the Front-Bench team. It is the first opportunity I have had so to do—[Interruption.]—although my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) says that the hon. Gentleman is obviously still in the gateway stage.

As the new deal has already helped 100,000 young people off benefit and into jobs and cut long-term youth unemployment since its introduction by two thirds, and as this country now has the lowest youth unemployment for 25 years, I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would support the efforts of the Employment Service, our partners, and employers throughout the country to make the new deal a success—offering hope and opportunity for young people—rather than try to undermine it.

Schools Collaboration

2. Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): What steps he is taking to improve the level of communication and co-operation between schools in the same locality. [88965]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): We regard better communication and co-operation between schools and particularly the dissemination of good practice as a vital part of our drive to raise standards in schools. Among the Government's initiatives are the beacon schools initiative, specialist school schemes, "Excellence in Cities", education action zones and a range of other ideas to that end.

Mr. Sheerman: I welcome the Administration's announcements over the past two years, but as my hon. Friend will be aware, we have a legacy of poor co-operation between schools which we inherited from the former Administration. Will he look at innovative supply chain techniques in business and apply them to the relationships from the earliest school—pre-school—to universities? Will he come to my constituency of Huddersfield, where, led by the further education sector, we have achieved amazing results in improving quality, from pre-school to the local university?

Mr. Clarke: I accept what my hon. Friend says about the achievements in Huddersfield. May I draw attention to the early-years development schemes, our development of school organisation committees, and the post-16 White Paper that was published last week, all of which are designed to generate co-operation between all aspects of education and to achieve what he mentions?

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): I entirely endorse the philosophy that local schools should co-operate. On schools in the Vale of York area, which is now within the city of York, there was excellent co-operation at the level of North Yorkshire county council, which—I say it for the House's benefit—is Conservative controlled. I regret that, since it has had its own Labour-controlled local education authority, the city of York has not even developed a long-term education strategy to deal with the real problem of surplus places in the town. What will the Government do to correct that matter?

Mr. Clarke: I have met delegates from the city of York and the local Members of Parliament to discuss those issues. The educational development plans focus precisely on the means of developing co-operation to address those issues; but it is a bit rich of Conservatives, who positively promoted division between schools when in government, to make criticisms on that front. We are trying to build co-operation.

Pupil Mobility

3. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): What assessment he has made of the effects of pupil mobility on standards in schools. [88966]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): We are supporting a research project into pupil mobility and its effect on schools, conducted by the migration research unit at University College, London. We expect preliminary results from the project to be available this month. We hope that the outcomes will provide more information on the issue of pupil mobility and the impact on standards in schools. We will keep the House informed of progress.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. May I give him an example from a primary school in my constituency which highlights the problem? I take the most recent year group to leave that school. During its four-year passage through the school, there were 123 pupils, yet of that number, only 40 were on the roll for the duration of those four years—a 67 per cent. mobility rate. A high proportion of those transient pupils suffer serious under-achievement, given the number who are on records of support, and it is much harder for the school to teach the 40 regulars, if I may call them that.

Will my hon. Friend consider making resources available from the standards fund, once he has evaluated the research, to help schools to develop and to implement strategies to deal with the problem?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The answer to his question is yes, we shall consider that, once we have evaluated the research. The fact is that mobility is very high in many surprising places: in seaside resorts, such as those in his own constituency; in inner-city areas, where there has been surprisingly high mobility; in places near armed forces, such as schools in Catterick; and in travellers' areas, migration areas, and rural inland areas. We have to understand pupil mobility far better, and then decide how to target resources so that they make a difference.

Excluded Pupils

4. Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): What support has been made available to schools to help them reduce the number of pupils who are excluded. [88967]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): In 1999–2000, £57.4 million has been made available through the standards fund to help local education authorities and schools reduce levels of truancy and exclusion and move towards a full timetable for those out of school. Overall, £500 million will be made available over three years. Other measures to tackle truancy and exclusion include requiring authorities to set targets to reduce truancy and exclusion levels by one third by 2002, and, earlier this week, issuing new integrated guidance, "Social Inclusion; Pupil Support".

Mr. Shaw: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is she aware of the organisation Place to Be, which provides specialist counselling and therapy-based services in schools in areas such as Medway to assist children and their families when they are in periods of difficulty? That counselling is an enormous help to those families, and perhaps prevents them from going on to use other health services and waiting a long time. Additionally, its proactive approach means that many pupils who might face exclusion, either permanently or temporarily, may avoid doing so. Will she find out more about Place to Be, and try to ensure that thousands of other children benefit from that vital service?

Ms Morris: I share with my hon. Friend the determination to take preventive action, so that we may stop youngsters being excluded. As he well knows, the purpose of the Place to Be project is to prevent long-term mental health difficulties in primary-aged children who may be at risk of such difficulties. I was delighted that some of the almost £500,000 that has been provided to Medway, where my hon. Friend's constituency is to be found, is being used to support Place to Be. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that Place to Be is also doing some work in one of the education action zones. We shall evaluate the project, as that is one of the grant conditions. However, after careful evaluation of the project, if it is proved to be effective, we shall of course be delighted to help to support it operating elsewhere.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Yesterday, the Education and Employment Committee published the Government's response to our report on highly able children, some of whom may also be at risk of exclusion if the maintained sector cannot meet their very particular needs. A nine-year-old girl in my constituency has not found in the maintained sector the education that she needs, and, this autumn, will be going to a local independent school. Will the Minister explain to the House why that girl and her family have to rely solely on charitable support to achieve the education that she needs, and why the Government will deny power to the local education authority to fund that provision?

Ms Morris: The Government welcome the Select Committee report on the education of highly able children. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government have launched a policy—the most wide-ranging such policy ever developed in the lifetime of the English education service—to support highly able children throughout the school system. His constituents will always have the choice of whether to access the independent sector to educate their children.

The challenge, which the Government are meeting, is to ensure that the maintained sector values and provides a high standard of education to every single child, so that they are able to fulfil their potential. Our action—in providing extra resources and support, setting clear targets, modernising the comprehensive system, and ensuring diversity in primary and secondary education—is exactly the way to reach that goal, so that, in future, parents will not be faced with the very difficult dilemmas to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): My hon. Friend will be aware of the unfortunate circumstances surrounding the exclusion—from the Nelson Thomlinson school, in Cumbria—of a child from my constituency. In the light of that case—which I think has national significance—why cannot we now have a complete review of the whole policy? There was an injustice in that case, and we must find some way of ensuring that similar injustices do not occur in future.

Ms Morris: I recall the case to which my hon. Friend refers. We have had lengthy correspondence on it and I very much hope that it has been resolved. We have a good system for dealing with exclusions and disputes between parents and schools. It is inevitable that the relationships between parents and schools will occasionally break down. Sometimes the victims are the children, whose education is disrupted. I hope that in the case to which my hon. Friend referred those concerned took every possible course of action to bring about a speedy resolution—but I entirely take his point. If the system needs changing to avoid children being out of school for a long period, we shall be happy to learn from that example and review the situation when we review our policy.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): We all want to ensure that all children are valued and are given access to education so that they can take advantage of the opportunities that it offers them. Does the Minister accept that many teachers are very concerned about the impact that the Government's insistence on targets for reducing exclusion could have in the classroom? Many feel that to reach the targets pupils will be kept in the classroom against the better judgment of the school and against their own interests and those of others in the school—or will the Government fiddle the figures to reach their target, as we have already seen may be happening on the literacy and numeracy targets?

In "Excellence in Cities", the Government have proposed that pupil referral units be set up in schools so that pupils can be excluded within the school rather than from the school. Will the Minister confirm that future figures on exclusions will include the number of pupils excluded from the classroom? That would give a true picture of exclusions and not allow the Government to attempt to reach their target merely by fiddling the figures.

Ms Morris: I am left wondering whether the hon. Lady knows what exclusion means. Under the Conservative Government it meant excluding a child from full-time education and often providing them with as little as two hours' education a week. Part of the money that we have made available this year will be used to provide full-time education for the first time for those excluded from school. I hope that all hon. Members share our wish for children not to be excluded from school.

I entirely accept that there are occasions when a child needs to be removed from the classroom because of the effect that their behaviour and attitude is having on other children. Our wish is to keep them in the school and in mainstream education. The figures show that a child sent out of school to a pupil referral unit is very rarely reintegrated into the mainstream system. I had hoped that the hon. Lady would welcome the fact that we are making resources available, under "Excellence in Cities" and other initiatives, to support schools and teachers in their wish to find a speedy way of dealing with children who are having a disruptive effect on the education of others, while keeping them in school and in full-time education, working with them and reintegrating them as quickly as possible.

Special Measures

5. Mr. Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough): How many (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools have been taken out of the special measures category since the beginning of the current academic year. [88968]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): I am pleased to be able to announce that last term, for the first time, the number of schools going into special measures was exceeded by the number coming out. There were 135 entering special measures and 149 coming out, of which 109 were primary schools, 24 were secondary and 16 were special schools. By the end of this term a further 40 schools will have come out of special measures.

Mr. Ennis: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response and I congratulate the Government on their progress towards achieving their objective of making every school in this country a good school. Is my right hon. Friend aware that Milefield primary school in Grimethorpe in my constituency has recently been taken out of the special measures category? Having visited Grimethorpe, he will be aware of the hardships that it has suffered in recent years, particularly in 1993 when the local pit was deliberately closed as an act of political spite, not economic necessity, by the previous Government. Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating everyone connected with Milefield school, including the headmistress, Judith Hurst, the governors, the staff, the parents and particularly the children, on their recent achievement?

Mr. Blunkett: We all appear to be able to rejoice at Milefield school coming out of special measures in February. I congratulate all who have made that possible, including the head, the teachers and the parents. When I visited Grimethorpe last Friday, I was deeply impressed by the spirit of self-help and regeneration in the community, and by the older and younger people who were making that possible. It is with that spirit of self-help that the devastation caused by the previous Government will be set aside.

Early Learning

6. Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): What assessment he has made of the level of support from the voluntary sector for the early learning goals. [88969]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Margaret Hodge): The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority recently published its report which analyses responses to the review of desirable learning outcomes. This shows that over 95 per cent. of respondents from across the range of sectors support the aims of the proposed early learning goals. This includes support from the voluntary sector, at 95 per cent.

Mr. Hoyle: Does my hon. Friend agree with the Ofsted report, which concluded that children do not suffer emotionally by being encouraged to achieve early learning goals, such as counting to 10 and learning the alphabet? I am sure that most parents would agree with that.

Ms Hodge: We know from the response to our consultation that most parents do agree with that. It is outrageous to suggest that children who are almost six should not be able to feel comfortable with early numbers and early literacy achievements. We will pursue those early learning goals as a way of raising standards throughout the education system.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): The Minister's reply notwithstanding, can she explain to the House why, despite the large positive response to which she referred, the Early Childhood Education Forum—which represents nearly every organisation involved in early-years education across the country—has described the proposals as a mess and a muddle? The forum said that the goals were far too prescriptive and that there would be an early introduction of formal education which, as evidence from other countries in Europe suggests, is the wrong approach. As an example, can the Minister explain why she believes it right to have it as a goal that children by the age of six should learn to sit still, rather than that they should be able to jump on to and off a log?

Ms Hodge: I had better engage the hon. Gentleman about falling off logs—[Interruption]—and sooner rather than later. He was with me when the Select Committee visited Switzerland, one of the countries which engages in a more structured and rigorous approach to early-years education. It is not an issue of choosing between play and learning; nor is it an issue of over-formalising education. We are attempting to ensure—I would want the hon. Gentleman's support—that children at this early stage of their development get those skills that we know are necessary for effective learning. To ensure that that happens, we need to have the structure and rigour of a foundation stage and early learning goals.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Shrewsbury sixth form college on the development of the new learning centre at the heart of the town, which will be open to all, young and old, and which will be completed in September? What help is available from the Government for encouraging more community learning schemes?

Ms Hodge: A community learning fund will be available to colleges such as the one my hon. Friend described, from which they can get support for the sort of schemes that he would wish to make progress.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): The Minister cannot simply cast aside the growing concerns about the increasing formalisation of education for children at a very young age and the increasing pressure being put on them by having to go to primary school at an earlier age and by the early learning outcomes. Is she aware of the article by Dr. Cousins, an adviser to the United Nations on early-years education, who said:

"The growing use of 'end-product activities' and 'learning outcomes' risked switching many children off learning by the age of five"?

There is a great risk that learning through play is being cast aside, as evidenced by the closure of 1,500 pre-schools in the past two years and the expected closure of 1,700 this year. Will the Minister confirm that when she claims that hundreds of pre-schools have opened in the past year, that includes instances in which the leader of a pre-school has changed address or an existing pre-school has been taken over by a new leader? Is not this just another case of fiddling the figures?

Ms Hodge: That really takes the biscuit. The increase in the number of children going into reception classes was entirely due to the nursery voucher scheme introduced by the previous Government. I wonder whether the hon. Lady really thinks it wrong for her own children, by the time they are five, almost six, to be able to count to 10, to know the alphabet, to recognise the M on a McDonald's sign and to be able to deal with simple words. If she wants that for her own children, is it not good enough for other children? Is it not about time that Conservative Members started to show some concern for the three quarters of all four-year-olds currently experiencing their nursery education in the maintained sector?

Specialist Schools

7. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): What support has been given to specialist schools to enable them to increase their links with the community. [88971]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): The criteria for specialist school applicants provide clear guidance on their community role. From September, we will make available additional funding of up to £20,000 a year to support the development of links with other primary and secondary schools and the wider community.

Mr. Chapman: I join my hon. Friend in welcoming the expansion of the specialist schools programme, which includes Plessington high school in my constituency. Is not that evidence of the Government delivering on diversity, just as they are delivering on early years and on class sizes? What evidence is there of successful achievement by pupils in the specialist schools?

Ms Morris: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments and congratulate Plessington on being designated a specialist school. It is indeed an example of the Government modernising the comprehensive principle. There were 200 specialist schools when we took office and we have found additional resources so that there will be 800—one in four secondary schools—by 2002. We have ensured that they share their resources and expertise with other secondary and primary schools in the area so that we can raise standards for all children, not only a few. I know that all hon. Members will welcome that.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): The former Lytham St. Anne's high school in my constituency has taken on the specialist role of a technology college, but unfortunately it faces problems with its second round funding application. It was led to believe that £100 per capita would be available in the second phase, but it is now affected by a new policy that appears to impose a cap. Will the Minister assure me that an official from her Department will make early contact with the headmaster, Mr. Michael Payne, to review the situation and get a first-hand briefing on the problem?

Ms Morris: There are no new criteria. The financial arrangements for the second round were made clear some time ago. The specialist schools receive considerable extra money. There is matched funding of £100,000 for capital work and up to an additional £100,000 to provide for revenue work both for the schools' own students and for others. I have every confidence that the school in the right hon. Gentleman's constituency will use the money to good effect to raise standards for its students and those in the neighbouring schools.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Will my hon. Friend investigate the unwillingness of the Conservative-controlled Cambridgeshire local education authority to match the Government's standards fund to provide literacy classes for parents in my constituency? Those parents will miss out on a valuable source of funding that the Government want to use to raise standards.

Ms Morris: I share my hon. Friend's concern about that. In the drive to raise literacy standards for children, it is just as important to work with their parents. Much of the money made available by the Government for the literacy strategy should be taken up locally, and I very much regret the action of the Cambridgeshire authority. If it had decided to passport the money that the Government have made available for schools, it would not have had to make the decision that it has made.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): Given that specialist schools involve a measure of selection, will the Minister take this opportunity to say whether the Government still believe the assurance given by the Secretary of State to the constituents of the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) in the by-election there in 1997? That assurance was given in a Labour publication and was headed "Grammars are safe with Labour". The Secretary of State said:

"There's no threat to the continuance of the grammar schools or to their ethos or their quality. I'm very keen to level up."

Does that assurance stand?

Ms Morris: I look forward to the day when the hon. Gentleman asks a question that does not refer to the 161 grammar schools, but is about the 24,000 other schools that make up the rest of the English state system. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have made the Government's policy quite clear, both before and since the election. They have said that the decision about whether to change the admissions arrangements for grammar schools, in the Wirral and elsewhere, will lie in the hands of parents. The House knows that the last time that many grammar schools closed was under Baroness Thatcher. She did not allow parents to make that decision, but took it herself, in conjunction with local authorities. I should have thought that, on such important decisions, the House would welcome the fact that we are asking those whose lives will most be affected.

Literacy Hour

8. Mr. Colin Burgon (Elmet): What representations he has received from schools regarding the literacy hour. [88973]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): The latest survey shows that 90 per cent. of head teachers welcome the literacy hour and find it extremely valuable and useful in transforming the life chances of children. This week, Ofsted said that the project was an important catalyst in the majority of schools in tackling deep-seated problems with literacy. We are very pleased that the literacy hour is making such a difference. We shall go forward to ensure that, despite the legacy that we inherited, our children will be able to read, write and add up at the age of 11.

Mr. Burgon: I thank my right hon. Friend for that comprehensive answer. He will be interested to know that I recently visited St. Edward's primary school in Boston Spa in my constituency, which achieves high standards. Its head teacher, Mark Brennan, was especially keen to stress how the literacy hour will serve to drive up standards further. Several other head teachers in my constituency have said the same, so it is clear that the literacy hour is an outstanding success. Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to praise the teachers and the non-teaching assistants who have worked so hard to deliver this good news story for us all?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, I shall take this opportunity to do just that, with cross-party support. We thank Lord Putnam, Lloyds TSB and all the others who have worked so hard on the national awards. We also greatly appreciate the fact that, at 7 pm on BBC1 this Sunday, the BBC will publicise the excellence of teachers and the good work that is being done. We can all celebrate what is happening in our classrooms. For the excellent work of our teachers and non-teaching staff we say, "Thank you."

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): There are many thousands of good teachers in our schools, and improvements in the attainment of literacy standards are welcome. However, how can teachers take seriously the Secretary of State's protestations about the importance that he attaches to their professional status when his Department is issuing guidance that tells them how to use every 10 minutes of the literacy hour? Should he not concentrate on setting standards and targets rather than trying to tell teachers how to teach? If he really believes in the professional status of teachers, should he not be leaving teaching to those best qualified to do it?

Mr. Blunkett: One section of the right hon. Gentleman's party has just denounced targets, and he welcomes targets but not the means by which to reach them. We need a strategy that provides a framework and the resources to back it up, and we have provided £55 million. We need teacher training to make the strategy achievable, and added support for pupils, which youngsters themselves have welcomed, for activities which, in the past, only the rich could afford in the Easter holidays or at weekend. We also need to ensure that teachers have the professional judgment to make appropriate adjustments on the principle of inverse proportion to success. Where intervention is not needed, we will stay out, but where it is needed, we will intervene.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): Does the Secretary of State recognise the sad irony of our having to address basic literacy as we approach the 21st century when the problem had been identified by Parliament at the end of the 19th century? Children enjoy the literacy hour in my constituency, but does the Secretary of State recognise that both for children with high ability whose reading standards are high and for those who may struggle with reading, some flexibility may be needed in the hour?

Mr. Blunkett: As part of our development for gifted children and our extension of what is available in the school, rather than outside the neighbourhood, we shall issue specific guidance. This week's Ofsted report said that struggling children, and the average, had benefited greatly from the structure that we have provided. The additional boost to classes had transformed their life chances, and not simply those of the children who were coasting or doing well. Our strategy is helping those who, in the past, would simply have been abandoned to entering adulthood without being able to read and write properly and who would then have formed the cohort so graphically identified by the Moser report a few months ago.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Is it not perfectly obvious that one way in which to assess the efficiency and effect of the literacy hour, and to drive up standards, would be to publish the results of tests held at age seven? Does the Secretary of State recall his feeble answer in yesterday's education debate when I put it to him that he had been hurt by criticism that too much bureaucracy was being placed on schools? Can he explain how it would add to the bureaucracy affecting schools if local education authorities and his Department ensured that those results were published?

Mr. Blunkett: I answered the hon. Gentleman's question last night. It is a pity that he either did not hear me, or cannot remember it.

Dr. Lewis: I have just read it in Hansard.

Mr. Blunkett: I am pleased that the literacy hour has enabled the hon. Gentleman to look up the answer this morning. My answer remains the same. He cannot in one breath ask us to relieve pressure, reduce bureaucracy and spend less on centralised collection, collation and publication of data, while in the next breath demand the opposite.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we can build on the excellent progress that schools are making on literacy and numeracy by using electronic conferencing and the information communication technology that the Government are putting into schools for professional development of teachers?

Mr. Blunkett: The database that is being compiled and the way in which the standards site is now working are enabling people to spread best practice, and to share what they have found to work well—rather than merely what is offered by the framework. That also provides them with the wherewithal to support integrated learning systems, which are most important for underachievers. I am extremely pleased that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), is taking forward the development of the national grid for learning; a concept that did not even exist as a twinkle in the eye of the Conservatives—never mind the £1 billion that we are spending on it.

Specialist Schools

9. Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): How many schools have been designated specialist schools since May 1997. [88974]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): Since May 1997, 196 schools have been designated, bringing the total to more than 400. That is a considerable achievement and puts us on course to reach our target of 800 by 2003.

Dr. Stoate: I thank my hon. Friend for that most satisfactory reply. In my Dartford constituency, there are three highly popular and successful specialist colleges: Dartford grammar school—a language college; Dartford West school for girls—a technology college; and the Leigh city technology college. Does my hon. Friend agree that a sports college in Dartford would complete the learning community, and would add to genuine choice and diversity for parents in my constituency?

Ms Morris: I congratulate my hon. Friend on taking every opportunity to push the cause of his constituency. There are nine specialist schools in his county. A sports college would complete the set; our vision is that there should be several schools of each specialism in every local authority area. I look forward to receiving applications for specialist sports status, but I know that my hon. Friend would not want me to prejudge such applications.

New Deal (Disabled People)

10. Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): If he will make a statement on the progress of the new deal for disabled people. [88975]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Margaret Hodge): The new deal for disabled people, currently being piloted, is making good progress. Although the journey towards work will take many months for many in that client group, I am pleased to report that, by the end of May, a total of 472 people had already been placed in jobs.

Ms Southworth: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does she agree that this is the ideal time for employers in large, medium and small companies to review their recruitment, and to take advantage of the benefits to their companies of employing people with disabilities? I am holding discussions with employers in my constituency. What is my hon. Friend doing to encourage employers, nationally, to seize that opportunity?

Ms Hodge: We are working with many employers so that they can recruit from the widest possible pool of talent, including people with disabilities. For example, in Manchester, where we are running a disabled person pilot, Centrica has employed 50 people with disabilities, and carers. B and Q is another large employer, which has put disability in the mainstream, in respect both of employment and the supply of goods and services. In the Thurso scheme, we are working with employers; 30 people are now in work, who were—between them—unemployed for a total of 194 years. One third of those people had been unemployed for more than nine years and some of them had been unemployed for more than 20 years. That example demonstrates the importance of the scheme for getting disabled people into work.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): I add the congratulations of Liberal Democrat Members to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on his position on the Opposition Front Bench. I am not sure whether he is in the gateway period, but, given the rather high staff turnover in the Conservative education team, perhaps his job is not too long term.

What is the benchmark for the success of the new deal for disabled people? Given that, before the introduction of the new deal, 21 per cent. of those disallowed incapacity benefit had found full-time jobs within six months, does the Minster accept that the new deal will have to do better than that if it is to be judged a success?

Ms Hodge: We are being extremely careful in rolling out the new deal for disabled people to ensure that we find out what works before there is a national roll-out. It is a complex area of policy development, given the broad spectrum of disabilities with which we are coping and the real barriers to employment faced by many disabled people. We shall review that benchmark at an appropriate time, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it would be wrong to set inappropriate targets without learning what works.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South): I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the concerns of a number of disabled people: that they will be called in for interview; that they may be unable to gain access to the building; that the adviser will be insensitive to their needs; and that they may be placed in a job that they cannot do. What measures is she taking to ensure that such concerns are properly addressed?

Ms Hodge: The new deal for disabled people is a voluntary programme. So far, we have managed to engage more than 3,000 people in the programme following their first interviews, and nearly 2,000 are implementing a focused employment action plan.

We are taking a number of steps to ensure that disabled people see this as an opportunity. For example, the implementation of part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 will of itself ensure proper access to services for disabled people. The Disability Rights Commission—the legislation to establish it completed its passage through the Commons last week—will also provide a vehicle to support the rights of individuals.

The opportunity to work is a crucial civil right for disabled people. I say that on the basis of my meetings with disabled people. That opportunity restores their self-esteem, their sense of value and their self-confidence. It is vital, and it is something that we intend to pursue.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): It is common ground in the House that the employment of persons with disabilities requires a good deal of care, sensitivity and, indeed, expense. In the light of what the Minister has said, will she confirm that all personal advisers will have expertise, or access to it, in regard to the particular disabilities—or complex of disabilities—of people seeking employment? Does she share the view of the disability charities that the balance between expenditure on the new deal for the disabled and the new deal for young people may require some re-examination?

Finally—in the light of what she said about pilot schemes—will the Minister confirm that the new deal for the disabled is on target for the plan to roll out nationally on 1 April next year?

Ms Hodge: First, let me welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Front Bench. I think that this is the first occasion on which I have had the pleasure of engaging him in debate on disability rights, but I welcome him back to the Front Bench—although nowadays it is the Opposition Front Bench.

Personal advisers receive training in respect of all the new deals, and the disability organisations are involved in the training that we provide for personal advisers in all the employment programmes in which we are engaged. As for the amount of money that has been set aside, the new deal for disabled people is only one part of our employment programme to help disabled people to obtain work. Last year, the Employment Service helped nearly 100,000 disabled people to gain employment.

Are we on target for rolling this out nationally? Let me repeat what I said earlier: my view is that we must get this right before we roll it out nationally. I will not be stuck with a date if we have not established what works in terms of securing opportunities for disabled people to obtain work.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) indicated dissent.

Ms Hodge: Let me tell the hon. Lady that I consider this to be one of the most exciting, innovative initiatives that we have launched. It gives disabled people opportunities, and it is not a subject for cheap gibes.

Jobseekers

11. Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): What steps his Department is taking to ensure that people receiving jobseeker's allowance meet their responsibilities of looking for work and improving their employability. [88977]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): Everyone receiving the jobseeker's allowance signs an agreement on the steps that they will take to find a job. That is monitored fortnightly by the Employment Service. If people do not meet their responsibilities to be available for work and look for jobs, they can lose their benefits, but the overwhelming majority want jobs—and, under the present Government, more and more are obtaining jobs.

Dr. Ladyman: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer, and commend his efforts to encourage people to find work. May I put it to him, however, that one of the barriers confronting unemployed people who are trying to improve their employability is the fact that so many of the training funds that are available are still focused on people who are already in work, or on employers and their new recruits, rather than on those who are out of work? That strategy is clearly inappropriate in areas of high unemployment such as my constituency. What does my right hon. Friend intend to do about this serious problem?

Mr. Smith: As we develop the new deal and implement the continuous improvement strategy, we shall involve employers to a greater extent in pre-employment training programmes. Training that is detached from workplace experience is far less effective than training in conjunction with a job or an opportunity for work experience. The evidence from the new deal shows that, as does all the evidence and evaluation of training for work. Employers such as Stagecoach who operate pre-employment training through the new deal are both finding a ready source of good recruits and helping many people who had given up on the prospect of getting a job back into the workplace.

Utilities (Job Creation)

12. Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): What estimate he has made of the number of new jobs created by utility companies since 1 May 1997. [88978]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): The number of employee jobs in the electricity, gas, water supply and telecommunications industries in Great Britain increased by 2,000 to 342,000 between March 1997 and March 1999.

Mr. Loughton: I am grateful to the Minister for those figures, but I wonder what work his Department has done to monitor which is more successful in creating real jobs more cost effectively: the utility companies or the new deal. May I refer him to an example from my own constituency? A local electricity company has so far created 500 new jobs in building a new gas-fired power station, despite the Government's moratorium on gas-fired power stations. Half of those 500 new jobs are guaranteed to employ local people, yet, according to the last count, only 67 new jobs have been created under the new deal in the whole of West Sussex. Which is the more effective creator of new jobs?

Mr. Smith: Of course businesses generate jobs. The task of the new deal is to equip people with the skills to fill those vacancies. Of the net increase of 2,000 jobs in the utilities industries that I just mentioned, 230 are new-deal subsidised, and there will be many more unsubsidised jobs in the total. As for the record of the new deal in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, he might like to pay tribute to the efforts of local people, who have secured a 65 per cent. reduction in long-term youth unemployment in his area. That is testimony to the success of the new deal and the way in which it works in partnership with utilities and other businesses.

Class Sizes (Leicestershire)

13. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): If he will make a statement on the average class size for children aged seven to 11 years in Leicestershire. [88979]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): In Leicestershire, the average primary class has fallen from 26.9 to 26.7 between January 1998 and January 1999. The key stage 1 average has fallen to 25.3 compared to 25.8 last year, and key stage 2 classes average 28.0 compared to 27.8 last year. The number of pupils in primary classes of more than 30 has also fallen, from 14,984 to 14,551.

Mr. Robathan: It is therefore obvious that class sizes are going up for those aged between seven and 11. It is said:

"the rhetoric is of much greater funding but all the announcements of extra government money for education are meaningless to us in Leicestershire . . . we do not have enough money to pay for the teachers we need or to improve the learning environment."

Those are not my words, but those of the head teacher of a school that takes children at 11—Winstanley high school in my constituency. The school needs 1.2 extra teachers for that age group, but it has less money than it had before:

"It is not convincing for this government . . . to blame the Local Authority . . . The SSA is fundamentally inequitable."

From the tone of her letter, I suspect that that teacher is not a Conservative supporter. She asks:

"Why should a child at school in Leicestershire have so much less money spent on her or his education than a child living elsewhere"— such as, for instance, the Labour-controlled city of Leicester next door?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman invites me to address the question of Leicestershire. The county's LEA received almost £1.5 million this year to fund 57 extra teachers and build six extra classrooms to enable it to reduce infant class sizes. The funding that we are providing will enable the LEA to reduce the number of infant pupils in large classes from 3,146 in September 1998 to 2,630 in September 1999. The LEA has said that it will implement the policy in full by September 2000.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be delighted to know that, when we compare Leicestershire with other parts of the country, we find that the average class size in that county is less than the average for England as a whole, and that Leicestershire has more children in smaller classes than the England average. That is a good record of which the Government can rightly be proud, and I wish that, rather than nit-picking from the edge, he would join us in celebrating that.

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): I welcome the figures that the Minister has announced today. The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), who, before the election, was opposed to reducing class sizes, has been heard in the House on many occasions denigrating the work that has been done. However, will the Minister take seriously the hon. Gentleman's point about the standard spending assessment and Leicestershire's funding? We have a double problem in that not only is the SSA less than those in other parts of the country—I am sure that the difference will be made up in the coming years—but there is a shortfall of £1.5 million that the LEA has received from the Department but not passed to local schools. Will the Minister ensure that, in future, moneys provided by the Department to the LEA go to schools to ensure that targets are met?

Mr. Clarke: I take very seriously representations on SSAs because they concern many issues that have been raised in Leicestershire and other parts of the country. I take even more seriously the issue that my hon. Friend mentioned about passporting the money. That is why, about 10 days ago, we published data setting out exactly what every local authority is doing, and that will enable a proper assessment to be made.

Post Office

12.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Stephen Byers): Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the Post Office White Paper, which the Government published today.

The White Paper sets an agenda for the Post Office to offer a world-class service for the 21st century. Today's announcement is good news for the Post Office and all those whose livelihoods depend on it, because it can now build for the future with real confidence. It is good news for the Post Office's millions of customers, who will benefit from improved services from a new, modernised Post Office and from greater competition for postal services.

The White Paper brings an end to the uncertainty that has dogged the Post Office over the last decade: uncertainty over its role and place in society; uncertainty over its long-term viability and ownership; uncertainty over the universal service obligation; and uncertainty over the Post Office network. Today, we provide certainty and a new sense of direction and purpose based on modernisation and reform.

Throughout the world, postal markets are changing at an increasingly rapid rate. Globalisation of postal services, the growth of faxes and e-mail, more demanding customers and greater liberalisation of markets are driving change as never before. It is a question not of whether markets will become more competitive, but of how far and how fast that will happen.

The Post Office already faces fierce competition, not only from private sector couriers but from other post offices throughout Europe and from the internet. I know that the Post Office management views change and greater competition as an opportunity, not a threat. It is an opportunity to enter new markets and to overhaul the Post Office's business processes. It is an opportunity for new ventures and new alliances. It is an opportunity to prove that the Post Office can compete against the best in the world, and do so successfully.

To compete effectively and fulfil its potential, however, the Post Office needs greater flexibility. If it is not given greater freedom to expand into wider and international markets, it will find itself confined to a diminishing sector of the postal market, saddled with falling value and shrinking profits.

That is why, in this White Paper, the Government are mapping out the most radical set of reforms since the modern Post Office was created in 1969—reforms that will ensure that the Post Office can provide the services that we need in the 21st century.

The White Paper proposes that the Post Office be subject to effective market disciplines coupled with regulation, and be allowed new commercial freedoms. Operating at arm's length from Government, it will have the freedom to grow and the means to succeed.

Existing mail services will be maintained and, indeed, strengthened as, for the first time, the universal service obligation, including the requirement to deliver to all addresses, will be laid down in law. That will guarantee a uniform tariff for those services. The cost of a stamp will be the same, regardless of the distance of delivery. I am pleased to confirm that the free service for visually impaired people will continue.

Stronger competition and better regulation will work together to keep prices down, and improve service quality and consumer choice. As part of the balanced package that we are bringing forward, greater commercial freedom must be matched with some liberalisation. The White Paper, therefore, proposes a reduction in the monopoly from the present £1 limit to 50p or 150 g with effect from 1 April 2000.

A new independent postal services regulator will promote consumer interests, regulate prices and ensure that the Post Office provides a high level of service to all households and businesses. Consumers' views will be championed by a greatly strengthened Post Office Users National Council, which will have the power to refer poor performance by the Post Office to the regulator and will be able to recommend the levels of fine to be imposed for bad service.

The Post Office Counters network, which plays such a valuable role in local communities, particularly for the less mobile, will be strengthened by our decision to put the Horizon project back on track.

We shall equip all 19,000 post offices with a modern, on-line computer system. It will enable the Post Office to modernise and improve the service that it gives to existing clients and customers, and to win the new business on which the future success of the post office network will depend.

For the first time, the Government will lay down minimum criteria to ensure that everyone in the United Kingdom has reasonable access to post office counter services, particularly in rural parts of the country and areas of social deprivation. The new regulator and the users council will monitor the network against those criteria.

We have agreed arrangements with the Post Office for maintaining a network of Crown offices, which will handle at least 15 per cent. of total counters business. Where appropriate, new Crown offices may be opened.

Although the Government will set out clear objectives for the Post Office, they will not be involved in day-to-day business operations. The Post Office Board will be responsible for running the Post Office, based on a rolling five-year strategic plan, which will be agreed with the Government. Clear duties, real powers and necessary resources to promote consumer interests will be given to the independent regulator and the users council. Annual reports will be published by the Government, the Post Office, the regulator and the users council on their roles and performance during the year.

We shall implement as much of this package as possible through administrative action and secondary legislation. However, primary legislation will be needed, as soon as parliamentary time permits, to complete the full package of reforms.

Primary legislation will be necessary to transform the Post Office into a public limited company. That will underline the new commercial freedoms and help to establish clearly the separate functions of ownership and management, by subjecting the Post Office to the full range of company law. In particular, the directors will owe their duty to the company, not directly to the Government.

There have been suggestions from some quarters that this is part of a plan to privatise the Post Office by stealth. There are no such plans. As we stated in our manifesto—and we keep to our manifesto commitments—we intend to provide commercial freedom, while retaining the Post Office in public ownership.

I can therefore inform the House that the Act of Parliament to create the Post Office as a public limited company will make it clear that we would not seek to dispose of Post Office shares without further primary legislation.

As my predecessor's statement on 7 December made clear, we cannot ignore the possibility that the Post Office might wish to enter into a joint venture or strategic alliance with another company, and might wish to cement this with a limited sale or exchange of equity. In such cases, it would not always be sensible or practical to seek parliamentary approval through a separate Act of Parliament. However, I can assure the House that any such proposal would be debated and voted on in both Houses of Parliament.

To ensure that the Post Office can compete in the fast-moving domestic and international postal market, we will give the Post Office the greater commercial freedom that it has long desired. That will help the Post Office to be more competitive; and more responsive to market developments and evolving customer demands.

The Government's financial demand on the Post Office will be reduced to match commercial dividend rates. From April next year, it will be cut to 40 per cent. of post-tax profits—more than half the rate at which profits have been removed from the business in recent years. That will be worth an estimated £150 million a year—money that will go directly to the Post Office.

We shall also allow the Post Office to borrow at commercial rates for growth investments—up to £75 million a year without approval from the Government. That will give the Post Office greater freedom to enter into acquisitions, joint ventures, alliances and partnerships. However, the Government recognise that the Post Office has been starved of resources as a result of the previous Government's approach. The Post Office cannot wait until April next year for the additional resources necessary to ensure that it can compete in the modern postal market. We therefore intend to take action immediately.

I am pleased to inform the House that, in this financial year, we shall reduce the Government's financial demand on the Post Office to 50 per cent. of post-tax profits, and we shall also allow borrowing of £75 million. That will provide an immediate cash boost to the Post Office of £175 million. Taken together, our proposals for greater commercial freedom will bring an extra £600 million into the Post Office over the next three years.

I am confident that the White Paper maps out for the Post Office a future that will allow it to compete and win. We have a clear vision of a British Post Office that is world class and will be among the most successful in the world. The White Paper gives the Post Office management the commercial framework that it needs to turn that vision into reality. It is now up to management, in partnership with the work force, to respond to the exciting challenges ahead. The White Paper will put right the neglect of the past and deliver a Post Office fit for the 21st century. I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I must thank the Secretary of State for making the White Paper available to me at midday. He will forgive me for saying that I had a sense of déjà vu during his statement; indeed, at one point I had a vision of "Him Tarzan, me Jane."

This long-awaited and much-leaked White Paper has finally seen the light of day after two years of new Labour government. It has been passed like a parcel between the Treasury, which wants to privatise the Post Office, and the trade unions, which still have power in the Labour party. That was shown clearly this week in a letter from the general secretary of the Communication Workers Union, which was initially addressed to all Labour Members of Parliament, but was then circulated by them to the Conservatives. The general secretary said:

"I thought the days of finding it necessary to write to Labour MPs about the future of the Post Office had gone . . . In view of the . . . promises made by the Labour Party and the government in respect of the future of the Post Office, we looked to a rosy future for the Post Office".

Today, we read in our newspapers of the threatened strike action that has resulted from the Secretary of State's announcement.

The Secretary of State has inherited a dog's breakfast from the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), who retreated from full privatisation in the face of union opposition, so today we have a third way: Labour will not give the Post Office full commercial freedom, and a question mark remains over the future of rural post offices. The Government could have freed Royal Mail completely, while building in minimal standard safeguards to protect universal next-day delivery. They could have ensured the viability of rural post offices by introducing the planned payment of benefits through swipe cards, but they cancelled that proposal in May. Post Office revenue will drop by 30 per cent. and the Government will, yet again, have dumped the cost of administering the payment of benefits on to the small business sector.

Our Post Office is the most efficient in the world, and it should be given the chance to compete freely, but the White Paper is a mucky compromise between new Labour and old Labour. That is well summed up in a quote in the Financial Times of 2 July from a Minister, who said:

"It's a long way from full liberalisation, which some of us would like."

The Secretary of State said that the White Paper sets the agenda for the Post Office to offer a world-class service for the 21st century. Post Office plc will not do that, as the Government must know. I predict that the Post Office will be fully privatised in the 21st century, because what we have before us today is clearly a temporary compromise that simply paves the way for further developments.

Many questions arise from the White Paper and I should be grateful if the Secretary of State would address as many of them as possible. May I deal first with matters pertaining to the Royal Mail? The plc will be subject to company law, as he said. Will the Government allow it to go bankrupt if it does not manage its financial affairs properly, or will they step in and underwrite the £75 million borrowing facility?

If the Government are prepared to do that—we should like a specific answer—anyone who lends will be lending virtually risk free, which, in other words, is a gilt-edged security. Would not that create a strong competitive advantage over other companies in the marketplace?

[Mrs. Angela Browning]

[HON. MEMBERS: "Stupid question."] It is not a stupid question. They would have to attract lending, despite all the attendant risks of the marketplace.

The Secretary of State referred to borrowing of up to £75 million with permission. How much will the Post Office be allowed to borrow in addition to that, with approval? Has a limit been set? Will the Government include Post Office plc borrowing in their debt totals, or is that another bit of borrowing that will be tucked away in the figures that nobody can find? Will the existing Post Office Counters network be free to handle any accounts for mail over 50p? With the reduction of the external financing limit to 50 per cent., will the £1 billion cost of Post Office automation be funded from its profits over several years?

What will trigger a share swap or purchase using shares? Can the Secretary of State set out the timetable, given that he has already identified that primary legislation will be needed? If the Post Office were approached for such a deal, the time scale involved in getting legislation through the House would not be conducive to the marketplace. Presumably, he will announce that the Government will make this a priority in terms of Government time and legislation.

May I turn to matters that affect the regional network of post offices? First, do the Government intend to retain Crown offices? How will the automatic credit transfer be funded? Each post office will now be required to set up a connection with a person's bank, so that the benefit can be transferred from the bank to the post office and the individual can collect it in cash. Who will fund the cost of that?

Do the Government intend to deliver more services via the Post Office network? We have recently had the announcement that post offices are to be included in the delivery of passports, and we all know of the crisis that the Government have created in the passport service. Will the Secretary of State identify in the White Paper market opportunity where the Post Office can make up the 30 per cent. revenue drop that it will experience as a result of the automatic credit transfer system? How will people without bank accounts, or those who are prevented by law from holding bank accounts, be able to access cash payments through the Post Office network? What constraints will be applied to post offices after automation in terms of their freedom to use automation to offer other services, for example, ticketing? What constraints will there be in terms of the marketplace and the range of other services that the Post Office would like to be able to deliver?

Mr. Byers: We all listened with interest to find out the Conservative approach to the measures contained in the White Paper. The conclusion that one reached is that the Conservative party wants to move to the immediate privatisation of the Post Office.

Mrs. Browning indicated assent.

Mr. Byers: I see that the hon. Lady is nodding in agreement. I am sure that many will note that with interest. The Government's package is balanced. It matches commercial freedoms with liberalisation, but within the public sector. We believe that is the correct approach to take.

The hon. Lady asked about the power to borrow money. The borrowing of up to £75 million a year will not require Government approval. Government approval will be necessary for borrowing in excess of that sum. We make it clear that the Government will approve Post Office borrowing for investment cases that are consistent with the strategic plan, commercially robust and pose no undue risk to the taxpayer. That is the approach that we shall adopt.

The hon. Lady asked what would happen if the Post Office became bankrupt. That is an interesting approach for the Conservatives to take, because it was under their stewardship that the Treasury took 93p in the pound from Post Office profits. It is worth reminding people of that fact.

We believe that we should have the package that we are putting before the House today. It ensures the universal service below 50p—the same price for delivery anywhere in the country—and there needs to be compensation for achieving that desirable objective. We make no apology for putting in place the policies that will achieve that particular objective.

Crown offices will be established. As I said in my statement and as the White Paper states, we have agreed with the Post Office that 15 per cent. of all Post Office counters transactions should go through Crown Offices.

It is worth stressing that, for the first time in law, criteria will be established on the availability and access to post office network facilities. Those criteria will be monitored by the regulator and the new, more powerful consumers council. We expect the post office network to offer more facilities than would have been available through the benefit payment card under the Horizon project. The new Horizon project that we are developing with interested partners will provide more facilities and services through the post office network.

The response of the Conservative official spokesperson was to take a negative approach. There was no welcome for the additional £600 million for the Post Office; no welcome for the commitment to a universal service; no welcome for the additional powers to consumers and no welcome for effective regulation. That should come as no surprise. The Conservative Opposition want to wash their hands of responsibility for the Post Office, and to go for privatisation. That is not our approach. We want a balanced package, with commercial freedom and liberalisation—a Post Office fit for the 21st century.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): May I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his excellent statement—not least because it bears more than a passing resemblance to the original proposals in December? I want to probe him on two areas of concern to me. First, with regard to commercial freedoms for the Post Office, will he confirm that the arrangements for the procedures governing the Government's approval of Post Office borrowing remain precisely as set out by the Government last December?

Secondly, on the speed of implementation of these changes, he is right in saying that the Post Office is in great danger of slipping behind the tough international competition. It is extremely important that there is no undue delay in implementing these changes to enable the Post Office to compete, flourish and grow its business in the future. What can be achieved by means of secondary,

European-related legislation, so that the framework of competition can be put in place without waiting for primary legislation, which I suspect may be some time in coming forward?

Mr. Byers: I thank my right hon. Friend for his warm words of support for the proposals, which build on much of the good work that he carried out as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), was also Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and as she chairs the Cabinet Committee dealing with future legislation, I hope that, when it comes to the need to find a parliamentary slot for primary legislation, she will be persuaded by the strong case made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson).

However, progress can be made without primary legislation. We can introduce further liberalisation through an order, and we can develop the powers of the regulator through secondary legislation, although not with the full range of rights and responsibilities that we shall ultimately provide. Thus some steps can be taken.

On the important point of commercial freedom, I confirm that the mechanism referred to by my right hon. Friend remains unchanged. The procedure that he agreed when he was Secretary of State remains in place. In addition, the criteria that will be used when considering borrowing for investment will have just three aspects: it will have to be consistent with the strategic plan, commercially robust, and pose no undue risk to the taxpayer. I hope that that clarifies the position for my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall): First, may I add my thanks to the Secretary of State for his courtesy in providing a copy of the statement at 12 o'clock for us to see?

I broadly welcome proposals which, for some time, the Liberal Democrats have been promoting and calling for—a balance between providing greater commercial freedom and continuing to maintain, into the foreseeable future, the Post Office within public ownership.

I agree with the comments on the delays that could be involved. Clearly, if three Secretaries of State have had a hand in the matter, there will already have been considerable delay in bringing forward the proposals. If we are to wait any length of time before legislation comes before the House—clearly, opportunities have already been lost—new opportunities that may be open to the Post Office will not be taken advantage of, so it is essential that there are no further delays.

It is a balanced package, but it is also rather timid. For example, greater commercial freedoms are available now—they are certainly greater than before—but they are nowhere near as great as they could, or even should, be. On the borrowing limits that are being provided, £75 million may seem a lot of money, but, for a business that is turning over some £7 billion, it cannot be seen as a particularly huge borrowing requirement. If a business that was turning over £7 billion was likely to go bust by borrowing £75 million, something would clearly be wrong. Therefore, the borrowing limit that might be available to the Post Office of £75 million per year is not excessive.

May I make two other points—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is the question?"] May I question two other points? The question of Crown post offices is rather confusing. They are to undertake 15 per cent. of the business and some new ones may open, but am I to understand that some could close and that there may be consolidation—some Crown post offices that are currently open may close?

In terms of the other post offices, for so long, small sub-post offices have been confined to the back of newsagents and other small stores, stuck in a corner next to a cupboard, where there is hardly any promotion. If post offices are to have new facilities and new services, and are to promote themselves in a new way, can we see a return to high street post offices with proper sign posting, to which people can go without meandering through books, knickers and everything else to buy their stamps? Post offices should be prominent on our high streets, not concealed in small stores.

I hope that, in that way, the Post Office will become a proud institution again, ready to serve its public with new services and new facilities, and will not again seek to hide itself in other places.

Madam Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State responds, I remind him that I heard only one question, so I hope that he will not take long to answer. I remind the House and any Member whom I call that I want a direct question to the Secretary of State. Many hon. Members are trying to get in on the statement. I want brisk questions and brisk answers, please.

Mr. Byers: I am tempted to say that, for some customers, having to go through books and knickers might be a unique selling point for the future of the Post Office network, but, on the specific question that I did hear, which was in relation to the £75 million approval, it is not a limit. A total of £75 million can be borrowed without approval. Over and above that, there can be increased borrowing, but it will require Government approval.

An arrangement was arrived at between my right hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool and me when I was Chief Secretary to the Treasury. We agreed that nearly £300 million should be used to acquire German Parcels after the 7 December statement. That is a good illustration of how a useful alliance for a purchase acquisition can be progressed. It was a good example of how, with a fair degree of haste, because it was an important commercial decision, we could provide £300 million, or thereabouts, to allow an acquisition to take place. That will still be the case, but we will put it on a firmer footing. The post-tax dividend will be reduced; £75 million will be allowed without approval; and, over and above that, amounts of more than £75 million will be subject to Government approval. I think that that is a balanced way forward.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that the statement that he has made today—which had all been fully released, as usual, by spin doctors and in broadcasts—will be seen by many people as stage 1 of the privatisation that the Conservative party wants; that the Post Office is the cheapest, most efficient, most popular and most advanced post office in the world; that it is a world-class post office; that, on its own, it invented the giro and introduced the national data processing service; and that the Post Office's greatest enemy has been the Treasury? From the very beginning, the Treasury has claimed that economic investment in the Post Office had been treated like welfare benefits, and has prevented the Post Office from having freedom which it should have had in its current position.

Given the recent statements, which indicate deep hostility to the public sector—that has been noticed by people—is the Secretary of State aware that it is not hard to believe that this is the first stage of full privatisation of the Post Office? He cannot rely on people being persuaded by the arguments that he has made today; as an old Postmaster General, they are not very persuasive to me.

Mr. Byers: There are no grounds for complacency on the Post Office. It is currently providing an excellent service—I made that point in my initial statement—but, in a dramatically and rapidly changing world, the status quo is simply not an option for the Post Office. There will have to be change, modernisation and reform. Under the proposals that I have outlined today, the Post Office will become a plc, but one that is under public ownership. That meets the manifesto commitment on which I stood, and on which my right hon. Friend stood in the 1997 general election: greater commercial freedom for the Post Office, coupled with liberalisation, but within public ownership. That is exactly what the White Paper delivers.

If, at any future date, there is a desire for the sale of shares, the matter will have to come back separately to the House for a debate and decision, when hon. Members on both sides will be able to vote on it. Today, we are delivering on our manifesto commitment to commercial freedom under public ownership. That is the way forward for the Post Office, as outlined in the White Paper.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Unlike the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), may I warmly congratulate the Secretary of State on taking this historic first step on the route to privatisation? When I was working in the Department of Trade and Industry for my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), old Labour Members were united in their opposition to such a step. Now, by his statement, the Secretary of State has converted them. Will he confirm that the statement goes far further than the previous Government's plans—we were talking about making only the Royal Mail a plc, whereas the Government propose to make the entire Post Office a plc?

Will the Secretary of State also confirm that there is no business of that type anywhere in the world that has not sought, and is not seeking, international strategic alliances? Therefore, is it not inevitable that some shares will have to be sold? It would be much fairer to the House if he would confirm that now.

Finally, as the Secretary of State has done so much to burnish his radical Thatcherite credentials, would he like to join the No Turning Back group of Conservative Members?

Mr. Byers: There is—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Just say yes.

Mr. Byers: There is a serious issue here, and I am not quite sure that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) took it quite as seriously as perhaps he should. We have based the plc and public ownership model for the Post Office on one that works very well in other countries, such as Australia, New Zealand, Finland and Sweden. The post offices in those countries have flexibility and commercial freedom, and are able to work in the wider national interest. We believe that Britain's Post Office can do so as well. Clearly, in due course, there will be consideration of strategic alliances and acquisitions—this is a rapidly changing world—and I specifically mentioned those considerations in my statement.

I reassert that there are no plans to dispose of shares. If legislation is brought to the House in the near future, it will contain no such proposals. Such a Bill would make it clear that, if there were any intention to do that, it could not be done by stealth. The matter would have to come back to the House for parliamentary approval.

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): Does my right hon. Friend accept that those of us who have argued for the past seven years that it is possible for the Post Office to be given the commercial and financial freedom that it needs while remaining entirely publicly owned, this is a bit of a red letter day? I was pleased that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) reminded us that the Conservatives were one-dimensional on the issue when they were in government: they wanted not only to privatise the Post Office but to break it up. Fortunately, they retreated from that and we are able to take the Post Office forward.

I have some concerns about the reduction in the monopoly limit. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that he will consider linking that reduced monopoly limit to the retail prices index, so that it does not just wither on the vine and erode over time? Secondly, will he ensure that there is a proper study with all interested parties before any further erosion of the reserved area that may be caused by European Union directives?

Mr. Byers: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome for the main thrust of the proposals in the White Paper. Given his considerable personal knowledge of the Post Office and the postal service, it is helpful for the House to have his views on the proposals. I shall consider whether the reduced monopoly limit of 50p should be linked to the RPI. I think that it would be appropriate to do so. Any study into the impact and effects of liberalisation will be the responsibility of the regulator. We believe that it is appropriate to liberalise by reducing the monopoly to 50p, given the greater commercial freedom that we are introducing. The figure is pitched at a level that will ensure that the Post Office can still meet its universal service obligation. We want to increase liberalisation, but still deliver on that important commitment.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): In replying to my question, will the Secretary of State put spin and hype to one side? As a Back-Bench constituency Member of Parliament, I am concerned about the efficiency of the postal services and the cost and reliability of deliveries. My constituency has a large rural area, parts of which are remote. Will he guarantee to me that his proposals will ensure that all my constituents, even in the remotest areas, will get a daily delivery service and that the post office facilities currently available will not be reduced in any way, but will, hopefully, be increased and improved?

Mr. Byers: When hon. Members have had a chance to see the full range of details in the White Paper, they will see that our proposals will deliver an improved service. I can confirm that the Post Office will be legally required to guarantee, on each working day of the week, a daily delivery to every address in the country, wherever it might be. Whether it is in Macclesfield or Manchester, Newcastle or Newquay, the provision will be the same. As has been said, whether it is Skye or Southwark the same obligation will apply. That will be in law for the first time. That is a good example of how we are moving forward and improving the service provided by the Post Office.

The network of counters is a real issue in rural communities. It was highlighted earlier this week in a study by the Women's Institute. For the first time, we are providing criteria for access to the facilities of the post office network. For the first time, consumers will be able to object to, and oppose, any proposal to remove such a facility from their community. We are building in new powers.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil): I congratulate my right hon. Friend and, in particular, my hon. Friend the Minister on their hard work over such a long time. This has been a long-awaited development, and the complexity of the deal is evident. Will the regulator be involved in the consideration of the universal service obligation and the network of post offices across the country? What is my right hon. Friend's view on public pay in the public sector? Will the pay arrangements of the Post Office be part of the new independent structure?

Mr. Byers: I thank my hon. Friend. Much of the work of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry—of which he is Chairman—relating to the Post Office has informed the White Paper that we are presenting today. We thank him and his Committee for that work.

We are not opting for an individual to be a named regulator; we are adopting a recommendation, with which we agree, from the review of the utilities and telecommunications regulators: that it is better to have a commission of perhaps five or six people, with someone acting as its chairman. That is the way in which we intend to regulate the Post Office. The commission will be responsible for overseeing the universal service obligation and the network.

As we move to give greater commercial freedom to the Post Office, it is important that we recognise also the social obligations that go with the Post Office in Great Britain. Having a national network is one of those social obligations that we are now consolidating as a result of the measures in the White Paper.

The Post Office will still be part of the public sector pay remit. However, we have agreed with the Treasury that there will be opportunities for greater flexibility and for incentives to be offered to people working in the postal service in the new situation in the years ahead.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): Given that there are 37 fewer sub-post offices open in Scotland now than in 1997—some of the closures are temporary—does the Secretary of State agree that any extra money from the Treasury should be channelled towards financial incentives for sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses, whose earnings, at about £2.70 an hour, are well below the minimum wage? It is therefore difficult to get people to staff those sub-post offices. I am particularly concerned about sub-post offices in rural areas. Can the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that they will continue to pay out pensions and benefits? Many of the little villages in my area are 30 or 40 miles from a bank and there is no public transport.

Mr. Byers: The hon. Lady makes an important point. Clearly, I cannot guarantee that every post office network facility will remain in existence for the foreseeable future. However, this year, for the first time, £175 million extra has been made available to the Post Office, and that money could be used to enhance the network system. As the hon. Lady rightly said, there will be opportunities to attract people to run post offices who might not have been prepared to do so in other circumstances.

As a practical demonstration of our inclusive approach, representatives of sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses are, for the first time, forming a working group within my Department to plan the future of the network. They are in at the ground level, and I am sure they will be arguing hard to get a better deal from the Post Office. I am pleased that, as a result of the extra £175 million this year and the £600 million over the next three years, the Post Office will now have the resources to deal with matters that are regarded as a priority.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I am sure that no one disagrees with the ambition that the Post Office should be as up to date as possible and ready to enter whatever new markets it likes, but why does it have to become a public limited company to do so?

Mr. Byers: There are several reasons. A public limited company is a business organisation that is recognised by the people who deal with these matters. It is a tried and tested model that works very well in postal services in other countries. In Sweden and Finland, the plcs in public ownership are very effective and progressive. The Swedish post office has just announced that it is to give a free e-mail address to every citizen in Sweden. The post offices in Australia and New Zealand are rapidly moving ahead, embracing new technology.

Perhaps most importantly, having plc status makes a clear distinction between the rights and duties and responsibilities of the directors. They will no longer be directly accountable to the Government; their primary responsibility will be as directors of the Post Office. A clear distinction between management and ownership will be important in the years ahead. I give my colleagues who have reservations about plc status the assurance that if, at some future date, there is any consideration of a disposal of the shares, there will be a separate opportunity for hon. Members to vote on that.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): There have been several closures of small rural post offices in my constituency. One of the biggest problems for the Post Office is recruiting new people to run small sub-post offices. Will the Secretary of State direct the Post Office to pay the national minimum wage to sub-postmasters for the hours for which they are contracted?

[Mr. Patrick McLoughlin]

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman opposed the minimum wage legislation, so he will know that all employees are covered by the national minimum wage but self-employed people are not. Perhaps unsurprisingly, there is some confusion in his thinking. We are giving the Post Office commercial freedom, so it will not be my responsibility or that of any future Secretary of State to give it orders or instructions. We are no longer in that game. Commercial freedom means allowing the Post Office to manage within the strategic plan that we agree with it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will my right hon. Friend advocate that, when we draw up our manifesto proposals for the next general election, privatisation should not figure among them? Did he consult the trade unions, did they agree, and will any job losses arise from his statement? Does he have any scars on his back?

Mr. Byers: Having been a member of the Labour party for 26 years, I have many scars on my back, as I am sure my hon. Friend also has. The manifesto will be determined not by me but through the Labour party's normal policy-making process. The trade unions were involved in discussing the White Paper and how we can take the Post Office into the next century. They will express their views on the details that it contains. I hope that when they have studied it and seen the balanced approach that we are taking, they will feel that we have made the right decision.

I am sure that no job losses will arise from the recommendations that we are making today, for the simple reason that we are providing extra money for the Post Office. Hon. Members should not forget that we are providing an extra £175 million for the Post Office immediately, this year, and £600 million over the next three years. I hope that more people will be employed as a result of today's announcement.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) asked about the justification for continued public ownership of the shares, and the Secretary of State has laid great stress on the new regulatory framework that he intends will ensure the continuation of universal service and protect against the abuse of monopoly by Post Office plc. When he considers whether the shares should remain in public ownership, will he speculate about the arguments that might be advanced by the hon. Member for Bolsover that they should? Will he find those arguments persuasive, or would it not be a better use of taxpayers' resources to realise their investment in Post Office plc? Would not that enable investment to be made in the creaking infrastructure of transport and schools, for which the taxpayer is directly responsible?

Mr. Byers: The right hon. Gentleman used to be a Treasury Minister, and his was one of the dead hands that used to lie on the Post Office. I do not know whether it was under his stewardship that 93p in the pound was taken away from Post Office profits. I am not in the business of speculating about the arguments that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) may put forward. He will make those arguments in his own way, and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on what they might be.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): In celebrating the world-class success of the Post Office as a public business, may I congratulate my right hon. Friend on granting it greater commercial freedom in the public sector? That is essential for the Post Office's competitiveness in Europe. Is he aware that he has given enormous heart to those of us who have always believed that the public service can be modernised and made fit for the challenges of the 21st century, without the headlong rush to privatisation?

Mr. Byers: I thank my right hon. Friend, who I know follows these issues extremely closely. The proposals in today's White Paper are balanced and do not permit a diversionary argument about privatisation of the Post Office. I hope that I have made it clear, through the establishment of a public limited company for the Post Office, that privatisation is not the Government's objective. We want to give the Post Office greater commercial freedom in the public sector. That was our 1997 manifesto commitment, and the proposals in the White Paper will deliver it.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): Will the Secretary of State say why he thinks that the Germans are fully privatising their post office? Might the reason be that they want it to be a leading global player? How does he think our Post Office will be able to compete with that?

Mr. Skinner: I thought the hon. Gentleman was against the Germans.

Mr. Byers: We managed to take a bit of the private sector German Parcels business into public ownership a few months ago. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover will welcome that example of the public sector taking over some of the private sector.

The decision about the German post office was a matter for the German authorities. Our job is to determine what is best for Britain. We believe that we can build on the Post Office that we have, and that a plc in public ownership is the best model to achieve the challenging objectives set out in today's White Paper.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Why was the idea of an independently owned public corporation dropped? Was it because the Treasury operates under rules drawn up in the 1920s and 1930s? Is not it about time that it was dragged kicking and screaming into the 21st century, so that we do not have this nonsense again when attention turns to the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, which is the next target? Finally, did my right hon. Friend see the expression on the faces of Conservative Members when he announced the formation of a plc for the Post Office? It reminded me of the look that my dog has when I leave the fridge door open.

Mr. Byers: We did consider in detail the arguments for establishing an independent publicly owned company. Much research has been done into that model, but we found fundamental weaknesses over management and ownership issues and lines of responsibility, and we fell back on a well-known type of business organisation—the plc. We knew that concerns would be raised about public ownership, so we have given the guarantees clearly set out in the White Paper. I assure my hon. Friend that the IPOC model was considered in detail, but that we felt that it was not appropriate.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): Is the Secretary of State not creating a rather messy hybrid, a sort of pre-privatisation Patco, which has the potential to abuse its dominant position? Can he reassure other communications businesses that the greater commercial freedom which he is offering the Post Office will not be fully exercised until the regulatory framework is in place?

Mr. Byers: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we need to establish the regulator to make sure that there is no abuse of the monopoly position in the area in which there is no competition. Where items cost more than 50p or weigh more than 150 g, there will be competition, and the regulator will have no role. We hope to establish the regulator by April next year to ensure that there is no abuse of the type outlined by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Will my right hon. Friend assure us that in guaranteeing the crucial network of post offices across the country, he will make it a requirement that the level and range of services must be maintained? Services must be protected for the future and developed as the Post Office changes in its new format.

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I am keen to establish a post office network that does not deal only with payment of benefits, which it does effectively, or even with extensions to passports—it should offer a range of services not currently offered. As part of our agenda for modernising Government, we should see the network of 19,000 post offices as a key to local delivery of important Government services. A working party has been set up in my Department to ensure that we modernise the network and that new technology will be made available. We have to make sure that extended services are available to meet the needs of people locally, to support local communities and to ensure the future of the network.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): May I ask a London question? Of the 12 postal districts in my constituency, the quality of service in two is markedly inferior to that in the other 10, for reasons, I believe, of recruitment difficulty. Will the competitive and commercial freedom and the pay flexibility of which the Secretary of State has spoken allow the new Post Office to address those problems so that, under the universal obligation, we may have equality of standards and services for customers in the same marketplace?

Mr. Byers: The right hon. Gentleman makes an important point which affects London, other cities and, as the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) said, rural communities. We need to ensure that the guaranteed level of service is met. Under the White Paper's provisions, the Post Office can be fined for failure to achieve that service. However, we want the service to work, rather than have to apply fines when it does not. When the Post Office considers remuneration packages, it will also consider how to retain and recruit postal workers, particularly in areas such as London where the Labour market is not as flexible as in other parts of the country.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Many of us still have to be convinced that the public limited company route down which my right hon. Friend is taking the Post Office is the right route. Who will exercise the role and responsibilities of shareholders? Is this to be a people's company, and if so, how will that be done? Will he confirm that his proposals mean that every piece of capital investment of less than £75 million a year may require Treasury approval, while every capital investment of more than £75 million certainly will require Treasury approval? What has happened to the historic surpluses of the Post Office, amounting to almost £2 billion? Under his proposals, they seem to be parked at the Treasury.

Mr. Byers: I look forward to convincing my hon. Friend about the merits of today's proposals. To clarify matters: for the £75 million borrowing power, no further approval will be required; over and above that, approval will have to be obtained. As for the historic surpluses, they will be retained by the Treasury, but, as we have made clear, there will be changes to the balance sheet in two or three years time as we put the Post Office on to a more commercial footing.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. We must now move on to the business statement.

Business of the House

1.35 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for next week?

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): MONDAY 12 JULY—Motion to approve the Eighth Report of the Committee on Standards and Privileges.

Estimates Day [2nd Allotted Day].

There will be a debate on the office of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of schools in England, followed by a debate on transport policy. Details will be given in the Official Report.

At 10 o'clock, the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

Motion to approve Ways and Means resolution on the Food Standards Bill.

TUESDAY 13 JULY—Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) (No 2) Bill.

Proceedings on the Northern Ireland Bill.

Motion on the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1999.

WEDNESDAY 14 JULY—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Remaining stages of the Pollution Prevention and Control Bill*[Lords]*.

Remaining stages of the Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill [Lords].

Remaining stages of the Trustee Delegation Bill [Lords].

The Chairman of Ways and Means is expected to name opposed private business for consideration at 7 o'clock.

THURSDAY 15 JULY—Opposition Day [18th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

FRIDAY 16 JULY—Motion on the Northern Ireland Act 1998 (Appointed Day) Order.

There will be a debate on policing of London on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages which may be received.

The House will understand that there remains some uncertainty as to the business for the week commencing 19 July, but it will include:

MONDAY 19 JULY—Opposition Day [19th Allotted Day].

There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

FRIDAY 23 JULY—Private Members' Bills.

The House will also wish to be reminded that on Monday 19 July, there will be a debate on sectors and activities excluded from the working time directive in European Standing Committee C. Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

[Monday 19 July 1999:

European Standing Committee C—Relevant European Union documents: (a) 13526/98; (b) Unnumbered EM submitted by DTI dated 18 May 1999. Sectors and Activities excluded from the Working Time Directive; (c) Unnumbered EM. Submitted by DTI dated 21 June 1999. Relevant European Scrutiny Committee reports: HC 34-vi and HC 34-xxiv (1998–99)]

Sir George Young: The House is grateful for next week's business and for the hint as to business for the following week.

In view of the interest in the White Paper on Post Office reform, on which a statement has just been made, may we have a debate, in Government time, on the important reforms contained in that White Paper?

On Monday, when we debate the report of the Standards and Privileges Committee, will the Foreign Secretary be speaking, so that he can apologise to the Select Committee for the way in which its reports were treated, and so that he can respond to the section of the report that rejected his arguments? Will there be a Government response to the recommendations on the ministerial code, in order to avoid any recurrence of the unhappy events of last February?

On Wednesday, in Prime Minister's Question Time, may we now split the time between the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister so that the House can hear both sides of the arguments on the performance of those working in the public sector, on transport policy, on co-operation with the Liberal Democrats, and on all the other issues about which the two right hon. Gentlemen disagree?

The right hon. Lady has not announced the Second Reading of the Railways Bill, which was published yesterday, and which will now, presumably, hit the legislative buffers. Has she read today's Financial Times, which refers to the "Railways Bill, which could become law before the Queen's Speech in November"?

Will she dismiss that absurd piece of spinning by the Deputy Prime Minister's Department? Will she comment on the Financial Times statement that:

"The Bill is important to Mr Prescott's political credibility given his earlier failure to win legislative time."?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) made it clear that we want to facilitate the passage of the Northern Ireland Bill, to be taken on Tuesday. Will the right hon. Lady tell the House when it will be published?

Friday's debate on the policing of London will be preceded by a motion on the Northern Ireland order. We understand the reasons for that, but may we have extra time for the debate so that it is not curtailed? Will the right hon. Lady confirm that the Home Secretary will be speaking for the Government?

The right hon. Lady has not announced a debate on public expenditure. Can she, however, confirm the undertaking that has been given that such a debate will take place before the House rises for the recess? May I also renew my plea for a debate on the report of the royal commission on long-term care?

Before the end of the Session, will we be able to debate the report of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege, which was published in March?

Finally, is the right hon. Lady able to give us a date for the state opening of Parliament?

Mrs. Beckett: I make that 10 questions, but I will do my best to answer them.

I cannot undertake to find time for a debate on the Post Office in the near future, but we have announced the provision of Opposition time, which could be used to discuss a number of the issues that the right hon. Gentleman raised.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary would speak in the debate on the motion to approve the eighth report of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges. The answer is no. The Government have already made clear, and will make clear again, their response to the proposals on the ministerial code. That does not require any formal statement.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me to arrange for a "script" to be discussed by the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister. Let me simply tell him that, when the leader and deputy leader of the Labour party say—as they do—that they agree with each other and admire each other's progress, they go on working together. When that happens in the Tory party, one of those involved is sacked.

The Bill to set up the new Strategic Rail Authority has been published, and will no doubt be presented to the House in due course. I cannot account for the story in the Financial Times, but it does not sound to me as though that story was spun by anyone: it sounds as though someone got hold of the wrong end of the stick.

I think I am right in saying that we hope and anticipate that the Northern Ireland Bill will be published on Monday. As for Friday's debate, of course I appreciate the importance of the debate on policing in London, and I undertake to reflect its importance if the Northern Ireland order takes up time. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will, in fact, be speaking in the debate.

I have not lost sight of the request for a day's debate on public expenditure. I shall endeavour to provide one before the recess, although I cannot undertake to provide a debate on long-term care. I note the right hon. Gentleman's request for a debate on the report of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege, and I will bear it in mind—although, as he will appreciate, we have much to deal with before the recess, and I can only undertake to bear his request in mind.

I apologise to the House: I hoped to be able to give a date for the state opening. Things are still in the melting pot, but I will give a date as soon as possible, and I hope that that will be shortly.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it intended that the Secretary of State for Health will make a statement next week on the ambiguity, or loophole, in the law relating to the donation of kidneys for transplant? Is it not totally unacceptable, in any circumstances, for racist conditions to be attached to such donations? What has occurred has caused a great deal of concern in the House and in the country. Moreover, it could lead to the imposing of religious conditions in, say, Northern Ireland, in regard to Catholics and Protestants. The Secretary of State has already expressed his dismay about what has happened. I hope that it will be possible for him to make a statement in the House very soon.

Mrs. Beckett: As my hon. Friend says, my right hon. Friend has already made clear how appalled he is—and I think the whole House is appalled—by what has been reported. An investigation into how this came about was launched immediately, and we intend to ensure that it never happens again. As everyone has said, the setting of such conditions is unacceptable. I fear that I cannot tell my hon. Friend how soon the results of the investigation will be available, or whether my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be in a position to make a statement before the recess; but I can assure him that the matter is being looked into, with a view to ensuring that this does not happen again.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Before every recess, there tends to be a big build-up of potential statements to the House. That is understandable and it is right. Obviously, while the House is sitting it should be given information if that is possible. Madam Speaker has, on a number of occasions, expressed concern about the way in which information is given to the House by Ministers, and how often—sadly—it appears to be pre-empted by statements made through the media, press conferences or other means.

May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to one specific example, which causes great concern? In yesterday's debate, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

"when an MMC report contains commercially sensitive information, it is not the subject of a statement to the House, since the City would have notice of such a statement's being made and that might not be appropriate. That practice has been adopted by successive Governments."—[Official Report, 7 July 1999; Vol. 334, c. 1091.]

That is patent nonsense, because the City and everyone else was given notice that a statement was to be made by means of a planted question on the Order Paper on Tuesday, so they had far more notice that the report was to be released. The result of the present practice is that the City is given more information in advance than is necessary, because a statement is advertised to the House only at 1 o'clock, which gives us extremely short notice.

Will the Leader of the House urgently examine that practice, not only as it applies to Monopolies and Mergers Commission reports, but in the context of the general procedure for making statements to the House? Will she come back to the House within the next week to inform us of how she intends to ensure that the practice better serves the House, our constituents and the country?

Mrs. Beckett: No, I am afraid not. I certainly undertake to draw the hon. Gentleman's concerns to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, but, as he made clear yesterday, it is not merely a matter of a statement being made, but the content of the statement and the impact of it. As he also pointed out yesterday, the practice he followed is the one that has been identified by successive Governments as being the best way through that difficult area. Indeed, it has been followed by successive Governments for good reason.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): As I am a delegate from this House to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Western European Union, may I ask my right hon. Friend to arrange an urgent debate—hopefully before the new Session of Parliament in November, if not before the recess—on the future of the WEU? She will be aware that the Cologne summit resulted in the suggestion that certain of the institutions of the WEU should be folded into the second pillar of the European Union in a way that foresees no continuing function for the Parliamentary Assembly. If that procedure is followed, it will lead to an increased democratic deficit, especially in foreign affairs, within the European Union, so will my right hon. Friend arrange an urgent debate on the matter?

Mrs. Beckett: I am aware of my hon. Friend's long and distinguished service with the WEU. As he says, an important proposal has been made that would have considerable future impact. I am not sure that I can undertake to find time for such a debate before the recess, although I hear what he says about wanting to explore the implications before the parliamentary Session closes. I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who I know will share my hon. Friend's concern.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Of the 37 questions for Question Time today, only one on higher education won through. Will the Leader of the House contemplate an early debate on higher education, so that we do not give that most important sector of our society the impression that the House is neglecting it?

Mrs. Beckett: I am not sure that I can find time for such a debate in the near future. I share the right hon. Gentleman's view—I am sure that the House does too—that it is a pity that, sometimes, the unintended effects of our random selection procedure mean that an area of discussion does not get its fair share of attention. However, he will have noted that we have identified time for Opposition days, so perhaps he will lobby his right hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House on that subject.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government have today announced a ban on the use of lindane, a powerful insecticide used in farming to treat seeds? She will be aware of the campaign against the use of that carcinogenic substance, which can cause all sorts of problems, including hormone disruption, nervous system damage and birth defects.

There is also growing evidence linking lindane exposure to increased incidence of breast cancer. I congratulate the Government on their action, but will the Secretary of State come to the House next week to make a formal announcement of the ban so that we can raise issues pertaining to it?

Mrs. Beckett: I know that my hon. Friend has taken a great interest in and campaigned on that matter, as have others in the House, for a very long time, and I shall certainly draw her remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend. I do not anticipate that there will be, in the near future, a particular debate in which that issue can be aired. However, I am mindful that the pre-recess debates will take place, and my hon. Friend may be fortunate in catching the eye of the Chair on that occasion.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate that next week there will be a lot of business affecting Northern Ireland, but can we have an urgent debate on the role of the Parades Commission in Northern Ireland, where nationalists and Orange people have criticised it? I trust that the Government will not follow the silly middle argument that the commission must be all right because both sides are criticising it. The commission is the only semi-judicial body that I am aware of that changes its reasons for determinations and, perhaps following the House and the Government, leaks from the top down before determinations are made. Three days in advance of a determination, its agents are telling folk what is happening.

That is a serious matter and one that we are aware of in my constituency, where some years ago I offered an olive branch to those from the Lower Ormeau, as they call themselves, but it was immediately rejected. They constantly say that nobody wants to talk to them, but they, like those in Portadown, have also refused to talk.

Mrs. Beckett: I fear that I cannot undertake to find time for a special debate on that matter, although I know of the hon. Gentleman's concern about it. I recognise that there will always be difficulty about the role of the Parades Commission, which has an extremely difficult job that it strives to discharge impartially. It is, of course, a key part of its role to try to get both parties to reach an accommodation—I recognise that the hon. Gentleman referred to such efforts a moment ago—and it is only when they do not do so that the commission has to step in. When such a body operates in those circumstances, where there has already been a failure to agree, its role is bound to be a difficult one, and it is bound to come under criticism, as it does on occasion, from both sides.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Was my right hon. Friend being deliberately vague about the Opposition day? I got the impression that the Tories have not been able to come up with a subject for their Opposition day.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Nonsense.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Spoilt for choice.

Mr. Skinner: I heard a cry of "Nonsense" from the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who is already in the gateway, but I have to tell him that in all my years in the House I have never heard of an Opposition being unable to say within two or three days of a debate what the subject of it will be. I would hazard a guess that if the Government were declaring that they were unable to tell us what was on the agenda next week, there would be an almighty row from the Tories. Are they unable to tell us about their debate because the Leader of the Opposition is away trying to deal with the problem whether to join the fascist group in Europe or the federal group and, if the latter group is chosen, trying to get an opt-out clause so that the Tories can join the federal group but not really be federal?

Mrs. Beckett: I fear that my hon. Friend has indeed identified the nub of the problem, as he so frequently does. I am unable to give the House details of what the Opposition will debate because they have not decided that. I have not explored the precise reason for that indecision, but as my hon. Friend says, it is extremely unusual, particularly for a party that is always alleging that people do not treat the House with enough respect. The fact that we do not know what the Conservative party intends to debate may even be unprecedented.

As for the issue of the Conservative's half in, half out membership of the European People's party, I suspect that it will be a rich seam of difficulty that my hon. Friend can mine in the future.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Will the Leader of the House find time—perhaps in the autumn—for a debate on the hosiery and knitwear industry? Is she aware that it faces very severe difficulties at the moment, as the closure of mechanics' courses in my constituency testifies? Despite efforts to diversify and despite tremendous work, the industry faces a decline, and there is a general feeling among workers that although the Government are prepared to support the motor industry, they ignore petitions such as the one that I presented to Parliament recently on behalf of the hosiery and knitwear industry.

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly cannot undertake to find time before the recess for a debate, although I am aware of the great concern that exists in the hosiery and knitwear industry. No Member in the House likes to hear of employment being lost, or of companies in difficulty. The hon. Gentleman knows, however, that there have been long-standing problems in that industry, and the Government have striven to work with it to secure improved opportunities and prosperity.

We shall have pre-recess debates, and the hon. Gentleman may seek to raise the matter then. I fear that I cannot find time for a special debate in the near future and cannot undertake necessarily to be able to do so in the autumn.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will my right hon. Friend, as the person who was the first to foresee the scandal of pensions mis-selling in the early 1980s, support a call for a debate on a scandal of similar proportions—the scandal of mortgage mis-selling? The relevant Select Committee has called for regulation. There is a need to establish an independent advisory service for the public, perhaps fee-based but certainly separate from the need to earn commission. Is she aware that this morning's edition of Financial Adviser drew attention to the sacking of a man who wrote a publication known as "The Mortgage Bible", which gave invaluable advice to the public? Is there not a case for exposing the fact that the Council of Mortgage Lenders is very much a self-serving and self-interested organisation and is not serving its customers—those who borrow—who are being mis-sold mortgages on a huge scale?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I well recall—as he does—the warnings that were given to the previous Government and the degree to which we, and many outside the House, urged on them that there should be some precautionary supervision of the selling of pensions. I also recall that that advice was dismissed as being unnecessary. I acknowledge that similar concern is emerging regarding the handling of mortgages, although I was not aware of the detail that my hon. Friend gave in his question. I will certainly draw his concerns to the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends who deal with these matters, who I know will take his suggestion very seriously.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Will the right hon. Lady tell us who will deliver the business statement next week? May I express the sentiment widely felt on the Conservative Benches that neither she nor her deputy, the Parliamentary Secretary, should be victims of the Prime Minister's bid or bin directive?

Mrs. Beckett: I think that the second half of that question was meant to be friendly; if so, I appreciate it. None of us gets too excited about such stories—the silly season seems to have started early. The Prime Minister has gone to some pains to make it plain that all these stories about his close and dear and near allies are certainly not based on any conversations or any knowledge of his.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): My right hon. Friend will be aware that, about three years ago, there was an outbreak of legionnaire's disease in my constituency. As a result, 21 people's health was badly affected and, tragically, one man died. Is she aware that, last week, the outbreak control team, which was responsible for dealing with that outbreak, published its report on the incident, which contains several important lessons for dealing with such outbreaks not only in Corby but throughout the country?

Will my right hon. Friend make time for a debate on the subject? This is not just a Corby issue; legionnaire's disease and its potential threat to people is a national problem. In my view, we do not yet have sufficient knowledge on how to prevent or control the disease. That issue deserves the full attention of the House.

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I know that he has taken a close interest in the matter. The House will share the sympathy and concern that he expressed, particularly for the family of the person who died. I entirely share his view that those are serious matters, and the Government will study the inquiry's findings carefully. I cannot undertake to find time for a debate in the near future, although my hon. Friend may seek to raise the matter in one of our Adjournment debates or in the pre-recess debates. I can certainly undertake to draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, who I know will share his concern that we learn, for others, the lessons of the tragedy that was experienced in his constituency.

Mr. Bercow: May I echo the sentiments of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne)? I very much hope that the right hon. Lady will deliver the business statement not only next week, but for a long time to come. She has undoubtedly discharged her obligations with great charm, style and dexterity. If I have not damned her with that, it is difficult to imagine what would do the job.

On a serious and non-partisan note, may I request an early debate in Government time on the state of the national health service. Is the right hon. Lady aware that two of my constituents, Caroline Cripps from Westcott and Marc Smith from Buckingham, have the misfortune to suffer from the relapsing-remitting form of multiple sclerosis, and that both are anxious to be reassured urgently that they will be provided long into the future with the drug beta interferon? Does the Leader of the House accept that an early debate would afford hon. Members on both sides of the House an opportunity to express their concern that that drug should in future, in accordance with what we hope is sound guidance from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, be ordinarily prescribed, where it is judged to be clinically appropriate?

Mrs. Beckett: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. I know that he will understand when I say that I am not sure whether they will do me good or harm, but I appreciate them, as does the Parliamentary Secretary, on whose behalf I forgot to thank the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne).

The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) raises an important issue, which as he says is non-partisan. He mentioned that NICE is considering the matter. I strongly share the view, as does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, that that is the right way to approach the issue. We have probably all had constituency cases that raised the matter and in which there is sometimes a dispute about whether that drug is clinically appropriate. I share entirely the hon. Gentleman's view that it is important for us to have sound advice in order to make good judgments on the matter, so that people can receive the care to which they are entitled under the NHS. I know that that view is shared by my right hon. Friend.

I fear that I cannot undertake to find time for a debate on the issue in the near future, but I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I welcome the news that the Chairman of Ways and Means may name the City of London (Ward Elections) Bill for further consideration next week. Is my right hon. Friend aware of the special report that the Bill's Standing Committee presented to the House, which concluded that while the Bill should proceed, neither it nor the additional assurances provided for the petitioners entirely remedied the problems of governance of the City? Does my right hon. Friend agree that prior to such a debate on the Bill, sensible consideration of the conclusions of the special report by the City of London Corporation would be helpful?

Mrs. Beckett: I know that my hon. Friend was one of those who served on the Committee, which did a good deal of careful and thoughtful work. It is a private Bill, and my hon. Friend will understand that it is a matter for the Chairman of Ways and Means when such a Bill comes before the House. I know that the Committee's special report identifies a number of areas of further concern, but I believe that I am right in saying that at least some of them are outside the scope of the current Bill anyway, although it is generally accepted that they provide a useful framework for further discussion about the work of the City. There will be an opportunity to air those matters when the Bill is debated.

Dr. Lewis: May I endorse the remarks of my hon. Friends the Members for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow)? There are many on the Opposition Benches who appreciate the professional, competent and courteous way in which the right hon. Lady discharges her present duties. We are well aware of the way in which some members of the Labour party go about internal party business, and we sincerely hope that she does not suffer the fate of the right hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who was subjected to a similar campaign.

On a lighter note, may we have a debate next week on the application of the Government's third way to the public services? Such a debate could obviously be opened by the Prime Minister and wound up by the Deputy Prime Minister—that is, if the Deputy Prime Minister has not wound up the Prime Minister too much already and if the Prime Minister is not too busy running scarred.

Mrs. Beckett: You will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there was a Member of the House who made almost a profession of making the most dreadful puns. I hope that that did not act as a precedent. I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks; I am becoming slightly suspicious that they are a special means of trying to persuade me to give time for debates.

The hon. Gentleman proposes a debate on the third way in the public services. I am of course aware of the many press reports about what are supposed to be differences between the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister, but all I can say to him is that I should like to use the precise words said by the Prime Minister's official spokesman about the quality of those stories. Although those words would be in keeping with the atmosphere in which we endeavour to conduct our exchanges, were I to use them I fear that I would be not only out of order, but thrown out of the Chamber for using unparliamentary language.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): A statutory instrument on ministerial pay is due to be considered in Committee next week. In view of the evident fact that so many of the right hon. Lady's colleagues are not up to their job, would not it be more appropriate for the amount that they are paid to be considered by the whole House?

On behalf of a constituent with a serious immigration problem, I have written three times in three months to the Home Office. In response to all those letters, I received two replies, both of which had the same reference number and the same date. Both were signed by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien). One said:

"There is no trace of the receipt of an application from Mrs K".

The other said, on the same day:

"Mrs K's application has been passed to a caseworker . . . who will make every effort to consider it as quickly as possible."

In view of the evident incompetence of some of the right hon. Lady's colleagues, may we please have a debate on the matter without delay?

Mrs. Beckett: First, I entirely reject the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that members of the Government are incompetent. One reason for our election was the visible incompetence of many of those who served in the previous Government.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is here, and he is prepared to assist the hon. Gentleman if he can, but it may not have occurred to him that it is often the practice in Ministers' offices to date letters as they are sent out. I may be mistaken about that, but it is entirely possible that those letters were signed on different days and that the same date was put on them when they were put in envelopes.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): May I ask the right hon. Lady what has happened to the electronic commerce Bill? Will she arrange time for a debate about the folly of regional development agency boundaries? They are being used increasingly by all Departments, but are resulting in extraordinary anomalies. For example, the new learning and skills councils will be set up on a sub-regional basis, which will mean that travel-to-work and travel-to-study areas in my constituency will be divided by an artificial regional boundary between the south-east and the south-west which bears no relationship to life on the ground.

Mrs. Beckett: On the e-commerce Bill, as the hon. Gentleman and the House are aware, discussions have been continuing on the matter and I anticipate that something will come forward in due course.

On boundaries, I think that I am right in saying that those matters have not been finally settled. However, I suspect that the Government would share some of the concern that the hon. Gentleman has expressed if it were not possible to achieve as much alignment as possible between boundaries. If he has not already done so, I suggest that he should take that up as a matter of urgency with the relevant Secretary of State.

Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill [Lords] (Programme)

Ordered,

That the following provisions shall apply to the remaining proceedings on the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill [Lords]—

Timetable

1. Proceedings on Consideration and Third Reading shall be taken in the order specified in the Table and completed at today's sitting; and each part of the proceedings shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column of the Table.

Table

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
New Clauses relating to Part I; amendments relating to Clauses 1 to 13, Schedule 1 and Clauses 14 and 15.	2½ hours after commencement of proceedings on this Order.
Any New Clauses relating to the making of orders under Clause 44(5) which may be selected: amendments relating to Clauses 44 to 48, Schedule 2 and Clauses 49 to 52.	4 hours after commencement of proceedings on this Order.
Remaining New Clauses; amendments relating to Clauses 16 to 43.	5½ hours after commencement of proceedings on this Order.
Amendments to Clauses 53 to 59, Schedule 3 and Clauses 60 to 63; New Schedules; amendments relating to Clauses 64 to 67, Schedules 4 to 7 and Clause 68; Third Reading.	6 hours after commencement of proceedings on this Order.

Questions to be put

2.—(1) This paragraph applies for the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1.

(2) The Speaker shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed;

(c) the Question on any amendment moved or Motion made by a Minister of the Crown; and

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded.

(3) On a Motion made for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

(4) If two or more Questions would fall to be put under sub-paragraph (2)(c) on amendments moved or Motions made by a Minister of the Crown, the Speaker shall instead put a single Question in relation to those Amendments or Motions.

Miscellaneous

3. Standing Order No. 15(1) (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill at today's sitting: and the proceedings shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to sittings of the House.

4. Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee) shall not apply to proceedings on the Bill.

5. No Motion shall be made, except by a Minister of the Crown, to alter the order in which any proceedings on the Bill are taken or to recommit the Bill; and if a Minister makes any such Motion, the Question on the Motion shall be put forthwith.

6. No dilatory Motion shall be made in relation to, or in the course of proceedings on, the Bill except by a Minister of the Crown; and if a Minister makes any such Motion, the Question on the Motion shall be put forthwith.

7. The proceedings on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after they have been commenced; and Standing Order No. 15(1) shall apply to those proceedings.

8. If at today's sitting a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 24 (as that Standing Order has effect in accordance with the Order of the House [16th December 1998]) stands over to Four o'clock and proceedings on this Motion have begun before that time, the Motion for the Adjournment shall stand over until the conclusion of proceedings on the Bill.

9. If the House is adjourned at today's sitting, or the sitting is suspended, before the conclusion of proceedings on the Bill, no notice shall be required of a Motion made at the next sitting by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Orders of the Day

Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill [Lords]

As amended in the Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

REFERRAL OF YOUNG OFFENDERS TO YOUTH OFFENDER PANELS

'.—(1) This section applies where a youth court or other magistrates' court is dealing with a person under the age of 18 for an offence for which a custodial sentence is available and—

(a) neither the offence nor any associated offence is one for which the sentence is fixed by law;

(b) the court is not, in respect of the offence or any associated offence, proposing to impose a custodial sentence on the offender or make a hospital order in his case;

(c) the court is not proposing to impose a fine; and

(d) the court is not proposing to impose a conditional discharge.

(2) If the referral conditions are satisfied in accordance with subsection (3) and referral is available to the court, the court shall order the offender to be referred to a youth offender panel.

(3) The referral conditions are satisfied if the offender pleaded guilty to the offence or any associated offence and has never been convicted by or before a court in the United Kingdom of any offence other than the offence and any associated offence.

(4) For the purposes of this section referral is available to a court if—

(a) the court has been notified by the Secretary of State that arrangements for the implementation of referral orders are available in the area in which it appears to the court that the offender resides or will reside; and

(b) the notice has not been withdrawn.

(5) In this Part "referral order" means an order under subsection (2).

(6) The Secretary of State may by regulations make such amendments of this section as he considers appropriate for altering in any way the descriptions of offenders in the case of which the referral conditions fall to be satisfied for the purposes of subsection (3).

(7) Any description of offender having effect for those purposes by virtue of such regulations may be framed by reference to such matters as the Secretary of State considers appropriate, including (in particular) one or more of the following—

(a) the offender's age;

(b) how the offender has pleaded;

(c) the offence (or offences) of which the offender has been convicted;

(d) the offender's previous convictions (if any);

(e) how (if at all) the offender has been previously punished or otherwise dealt with by any court;

(f) any characteristics or behaviour of, or circumstances relating to, any person who has at any time been charged in the same proceedings as the offender (whether or not in respect of the same offence); and

(g) whether the offender has previously been subject to a referral order.

(8) For the purposes of this section an offender who has been convicted of an offence in respect of which he was conditionally discharged (whether by a court in England and Wales or in Northern Ireland) shall be treated, despite—

(a) section 1C(1) of the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973 (conviction of offence for which offender so discharged deemed not a conviction), or

(b) Article 6(1) of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 (corresponding provision for Northern Ireland), as having been convicted of that offence'.—[Mr. Greenway.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

2.10 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 1, in clause 1, page 1, line 8, leave out Clauses 1 and 2.

No. 12, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(d) the court is not proposing to impose a conditional discharge.'.

Mr. Greenway: Part I introduces a new sentence for young offenders of referral to a youth offender panel. Panels will be established by the youth offender teams which owe their existence to the provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. The purpose of the panel is to draw up a programme of reparation, rehabilitation and, where appropriate, reintegration, aimed at addressing the young person's offending behaviour with a view to preventing him or her from reoffending in future.

I am glad to see the Home Secretary here. We support the concept of the referral order and believe that, properly resourced and constituted, youth offender panels have the potential to provide a more structured and coherent programme of support and reparation for a young offender than has been the usual experience with the generality of community sentences.

In Committee we highlighted some important elements where we have some disagreement with the Government about the way in which the new sentencing option is being introduced. New clause 1 offers a better framework and structure for the introduction of this important initiative, the genesis for which lies in much of the work of the last Government and taken forward by this Government, than the Government scheme. In addition and so that we can get the maximum out of this afternoon's debate, new clause 1 addresses all the important elements that were debated in Committee on which there was some disagreement.

The first concern that we addressed was whether this new option should be available only in youth and magistrates courts. We probed the Government to find out why the referral order was not apparently available to the Crown courts. The Government's view is that the number of occasions when a young offender might be dealt with by a Crown court in the circumstances which would allow or might require a referral order are sufficiently few to leave it to the magistrates or youth court to make the referral. A Crown court can send a young offender back to a youth court for that purpose, as required. Although we still believe that this is an unnecessary complication, it is not a key issue for us, so new clause 1 incorporates in the first line the same wording as in the Government scheme, restricting the power to youth and magistrates courts. We are happy to accept and reflect the Government's view on that.

Our most fundamental disagreement remains with the Government's insistence that the referral order should be mandatory, certainly in the first instance, for a first time offender who pleads guilty. We shall come on to the plea of guilty aspect later. We think that it is a mistake for the referral order to be mandatory.

The House will be aware that in another place the mandatory nature of the referral order was changed to provide the court with discretion. In Committee that change was reversed to reinstate the mandatory nature of the referral order. We find it slightly surprising that in the other place Liberal Democrat Members supported the amendment of my noble Friend Lord Windlesham whereas in Committee the Liberal Democrat Member voted against his noble Friends and in support of the Government. We note with some enthusiasm that as in Committee when the Liberal Democrats tabled one amendment, so on Report they have tabled one amendment. As will be clear from new clause 1 we agree that the availability of a conditional discharge to the court in the circumstances would be welcome.

We remain of the view that to make the referral mandatory for first time young offenders is a mistake because these are not the group of offenders for whom mandatory sentences should be thought appropriate. Notwithstanding the fact that these are pilot arrangements, so are capable of adaptation and adjustment in the light of experience, we envisage that a court will frequently have to make a referral order against its better judgment. In all sincerity I suggest to the Home Secretary that that has the prospect of undermining confidence in the scheme. To allow the court virtually no discretion for first-time offenders is bad law and will lead to rough justice and inconsistency.

Even if one accepts the principle of a mandatory referral order, it is questionable whether the conditions which trigger an automatic referral are the right ones or whether they require further thought and adjustment. The key purpose of new clause 1 is to suggest to the Government why we believe that those conditions need some changes in a number of respects. The changes that we think would be appropriate are set out in the new clause.

2.15 pm

First and in many respects most importantly, we need to question the range of offences which a young offender may have committed which would justify a mandatory requirement for the young person to work with a youth offender panel to address his offending behaviour and make reparation. As drafted, the Bill regards any offence as deserving such treatment. I do not know whether the Home Secretary has had time to study the Hansard reports of the Committee which was good natured. Although we had some disagreements it was not one of those Committees where we fought to the wire on many issues. When I pointed out that some offences were less serious and sufficiently minor not to justify a referral, I was asked to suggest one. I outlined the case of a 17-year-old motorist, perhaps about to go to university, of previous good character who drove through a red traffic light or was caught speeding. In a number of circumstances such a young motorist, like any other motorist stopped by the police and told of his transgression, might be given a fixed penalty ticket.

[Mr. Greenway]

The Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), has recently expressed concern about a particularly prevalent minor offence that youngsters are wont to commit, which is cycling on the pavement. I must confess that that offence did not cross my mind. Yesterday, the Minister tabled a statutory instrument, which provides for an on-the-spot fine or fixed penalty notice for the offence of cycling on the footway contrary to section 72 of the Highway Act 1835.

The Minister and the House will know from early-day motion 766 that not all his hon. Friends—indeed, not all of mine either—consider cycling on the pavement to be a punishable offence, let alone punishable with on-the-spot fines. There are as many as 27 signatures to that early-day motion. If we pray against that statutory instrument and there is a vote on it, it will be interesting to see how many of the Minister's hon. Friends vote against it and in support of that early-day motion.

This is good-natured banter, but cycling on the pavement is illegal, and can be dangerous. In response to my suggestion that someone going through a red traffic light should be considered a danger to the rest of society, the Minister said that he could introduce me to the parents of children who had been maimed as a result of such behaviour. I fully accept that, but the House should also reflect on the fact that there is an equal prospect of some young tearaway who cycles on the pavement posing a similar danger. Although some people approve of cycling on the pavement as it is safer for the cyclist, given the state of the traffic on the roads, it can be dangerous for the people on the pavement. I have no qualms about the Minister's intention to give the police an additional power to take action if they think it is required.

Whether the offence is going through a red traffic light, speeding or cycling on the pavement, as the Bill is construed a young offender will pay a fine if the police choose to give him a fixed penalty notice, whereas another offender who commits an identical offence will be summoned to appear in court, whereupon, having pleaded guilty, the magistrate will, under the Bill, have no option but to refer him to a youth offender panel.

To use the expression that an enraged mother in a queue at a passport office used when talking to my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) last week, that is completely barmy. How could anyone explain the logic of the system to a young person whose mate gets an on-the-spot fine, whereas for exactly the same offence he is referred for three months to a youth offender panel?

In fairness, under the Bill the court has an alternative: it could grant an absolute discharge. Some magistrates may be persuaded that that is a preferable option. Either way, it will lead to inconsistency in the sentencing of young people. Inconsistency in the administration of justice to young people is, in my experience, the harbinger of grievance, and the harbinger of grievance is the parent of alienation. That is the opposite of what the Government are sensibly trying to do in the Bill, which is to bring young people up short when they have offended. The sentence that they are given for their offence must be appropriate in the circumstances and relevant to their situation.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): I am following my hon. Friend's argument with some interest, because this is not a matter in which I have participated closely in the past. Does he agree that, if persons who have committed the same offence are given different punishments, that could give rise to a potentially objectionable situation under the European convention on human rights?

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We debated this issue at some length in Committee. I can only pass on to him the Government's reassurance, which, in all fairness, we are happy to accept, that the Bill complies with all elements of the European convention on human rights. He is right: people have in the past sought redress in the European Court if our law has created an injustice which our courts are unable to address. They will be able to go to our courts when the human rights legislation that the House has passed is fully implemented.

I do not want to labour the point, except to say that it is extraordinary for the Government to expect the House to understand and agree with a sentence for a misdemeanour—not a high crime or serious offence—which will depend on how the young offender is prosecuted. In most cases, the police will not have the slightest idea of the young person's background and whether he is a known troublemaker or has never been in any trouble before.

It is ludicrous to propose that if a young person gets a fixed penalty notice, he must pay an on-the-spot fine, but if, for the same offence, he is required to appear in court, he must be referred to a youth offender panel to address his offending behaviour.

In new clause 1, we provide two entirely sensible solutions. The first is to establish which offences should trigger an automatic referral to a youth offender panel, and which offences could be regarded as less serious. As I said to the Home Secretary, we agree with this disposal. He will remember that, in the debate on Second Reading, I told him that I had visited Boston, Massachusetts with the Select Committee on Home Affairs. The Committee looked into the imaginative way in which they deal with young offenders in Boston, and it was then that I first understood the power and good sense of subjecting young delinquents to a structured programme of reparation and rehabilitation. We are fully on side in that objective. However, if we have to accept, given the Government's majority, that the referral will change back from a discretionary to a mandatory requirement, we have a right and a responsibility to ask the Home Secretary to think again about what offences will justify a mandatory referral.

2.30 pm

We think that the Government's policy is really about dealing with offences that are dishonest, violent or involve other criminal conduct. That is why, in line two of new clause 1, we introduce the phrase

"an offence for which a custodial sentence is available".

The aim is not just to highlight the need for offences to be serious, but to indicate clearly that the breadth of criminal activity, of vandalism and of violence, which we know that the Government are seeking to address, would carry the option of a custodial sentence. There would be an automatic referral to a youth offender panel where a young offender pleaded guilty on his first appearance in court.

In Committee, we debated the issue of seriousness in some detail. The theft of a pint of a milk was an offence that the Committee thought serious enough to warrant a referral order. Such an offence would be covered. That does not have to mean that someone who admits in his first appearance in court to theft of anything will automatically get a prison sentence, but the offence to which that person has pleaded guilty, including theft of a pint of milk, would carry a prison sentence as an option, so it would be covered, as would malicious damage, vandalism and any assault.

The petty crime that concerns local communities and characterises the behaviour of youngsters who are out of control and need their offending behaviour addressed would therefore be covered by the alternative proposal. However, serious motoring offences would also be covered. A 17-year-old driving under the influence of drugs or drink, or causing death by dangerous driving, would come within the category where a custodial sentence is an option.

No one—I agree with the spirit of what the Minister of State was saying in Committee—could possibly argue that a young person who had pleaded guilty to such a serious offence would not be in need of a programme of rehabilitation, reparation and remedial action to address his offending behaviour, but our proposal would also leave courts free to continue to dispose of less serious summary offences, which I have already described as misdemeanours, with a fine, or courts could impose a conditional discharge.

Nevertheless, it is not our intention that the restriction of offences for which a referral order is encouraged for the more serious crimes and the imposition of a fine or conditional discharge should be regarded as exclusive alternatives. Both have their place in a sensible sentencing strategy. Even if the offence involved criminality, there would be occasions where the option of a fine or conditional discharge would be an important discretion for the court to have at its disposal.

What if, for example, a 16 or 17-year-old, perhaps out with his girlfriend and not looking for trouble, is attacked by other youngsters and, in defending himself, assaults his assailants or causes damage? He may have had no intention to do so, but the action is likely to be considered reckless by the court. It happens. I am glad to note that the Home Secretary agrees.

It would be ludicrous to say in such circumstances that there is no option but to refer that person to a youth offender panel and to argue that that would be the most appropriate outcome. Clearly, it would not. The court must have the discretion to impose an alternative. A fine, or, indeed, in those circumstances, a conditional discharge, which is far more powerful than the absolute discharge, which is the only thing available under the Government's proposals, would be more appropriate.

More important, to have such a restricted sentencing option would lead to the criminal justice system being brought into disrepute. The failure of the Government's proposals to provide for such a sensible outcome will affect the way in which youth and magistrates courts deal with young people. That will lead to the sort of controversy and anger that we saw in response to some of the proposals in the Criminal Justice Act 1991. In Committee, we commented on that point.

On previous occasions, the Home Secretary has described me as an old lag because of all the long service I have done in various criminal justice Bill Standing Committees. In the Committee that considered the 1991 Act, several of us had some misgivings about unit fines, but I say in all sincerity that he is going down the same road with the current proposal. He is producing an inflexible structure that will lead to anger and controversy. Our worry is that what is a sensible initiative will be brought into disrepute even during the early years of the pilot schemes because of that inflexibility. The Government must think again.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): I ask the hon. Gentleman, in all sincerity, to consider whether he has missed the crucial point about the provision: it is about restorative justice, introducing meaning to the process involving young people and tackling issues at the crucial moment of that first appearance in court.

Mr. Greenway: If I take on board what the hon. Gentleman has said, perhaps he will have an argument with the Minister of State. We heard all that claptrap in Committee. We are not missing the point at all. We are fully seized of the point. We are saying that the referral order must be appropriate to the young person in question.

The Government are introducing a scheme where some referral orders will be wholly inappropriate. Perhaps the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) was not listening, but what could be more inappropriate than to say to one young offender, "You have been cycling on the footway. Here is a fine," and to say to another, "By the way, because we did not catch you, but we know who you are, you have been summoned to the court, you will go to court and plead guilty"? The Home Secretary must accept that, under the Bill, the court would have no option but to refer that person to a youth offender panel.

I cannot for the life of me see the logic of such a situation. Where is the reparation? Where is the reintegration into society in those circumstances? It is complete nonsense to have such a conflict between two alternative disposals for precisely the same offence, depending entirely on how the young person is prosecuted. We have made our point. I can tell from the noises behind me and the nods that I see when I look around from time to time that, thankfully, some hon. Members in the Chamber agree with me.

Two other aspects of new clause 1 differ from the Government's structure. If we accept the logic of the mandatory referral for a plea of guilty, it will be hard to see the logic of giving the court any discretion if a young person pleads guilty to one offence, but not guilty to another. The Home Secretary will remember that, on Second Reading, we expressed the concern that, perversely, youngsters might be tempted to plead not guilty to avoid the youth offender panel. Bearing in mind that our proposal would restrict the referral order to more serious offences and provide the option for a fine, we think it would probably be more straightforward if the referral order were mandatory for all pleas of guilty.

The Government's case is that a guilty plea is essential to the young offender being prepared to accept that he has done wrong. If he has pleaded guilty to one offence, even if he has pleaded not guilty to another, that is an admission of guilt for the youth offender panel to work on.

[Mr. Greenway]

The new clause incorporates all the powers that the Home Secretary thinks appropriate to extend the provisions of the referral order to other offenders. On Second Reading and in Committee, we certainly supported the concept of making referral orders appropriate and available for dealing with more persistent offenders. However, we should have preferred that persistent young offenders were brought within the scheme's provisions immediately.

If and when other than first-time offenders are brought within the scheme's provisions, we think that courts must have regard to whether such youngsters have previously been subject to a referral order. As we debated and agreed in Committee, the Government's wording technically provides for that. Nevertheless, we still feel that a requirement to have regard to whether a young offender has previously been subject to a young offender order is sufficiently important to be included in the Bill.

Although we support the idea of referral orders to youth offender panels, we disagree with the conditions in which courts will be able to pass such a sentence. The provisions are riddled with illogicality. The argument that the provisions are a completely new and radical approach to dealing with first-time young offenders does not justify the blanket provision, in every case, of referral orders. Therefore, I ask the House to support new clause 1.

Mr. Dawson: It is with regret that I disagree with the comments of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), as I fully realise that, throughout our consideration of the Bill, he has pursued his case with sincerity, great knowledge and experience. Nevertheless, I think that he has totally missed the point on the radical nature of the proposals—which are not at all intended to reflect a youth justice system that has become discredited among not only young people but those who have felt its inadequacies, whether as victims or those who work within that system. The Bill offers an approach that is absolutely trying to deal with young people at the crucial moment—when they first appear in court.

Far from being inflexible, the approach offers the supreme flexibility of providing young people with an opportunity, over a significant period of between three and 12 months, to sit with a panel that would include their parents, representatives from various agencies, people from the community and possibly victims of their offences; to use that opportunity to be confronted with the reality of their offending; and to have the underlying and overt reasons for their offending uncovered, analysed and challenged. They would also have the opportunity to make reparation to an individual victim or, perhaps more likely, to the wider community.

The Bill offers a wholly different approach from the current one, in which, very perfunctorily, young people appear in court under the influence of various messages about what the experience is supposed to be about. They endure an occasion in court that is probably meaningless for them: get the whole thing done, dusted and out of the way as quickly as possible; and then go on.

2.45 pm

In Committee, the hon. Member for Ryedale raised the issue of young people who are apprehended for going through a red traffic light. I told him then, and I tell him now, that I could today put together a programme for a young person who had been convicted of such an offence—which is a very serious one indeed—involving the auspices of other groups in the community, that would shake that young person to the core about what happens when one speeds in a motorcar. Does anyone think that that is less worthwhile than a young person appearing in court and receiving a fine that may be paid by his or her parents?

Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale): Is my hon. Friend aware of a cutting-edge young offenders programme that is being operated at Buckley Hall prison by the prisoners themselves? The programme—which is receiving accreditation—is being operated just as my hon. Friend has described, by talking about people who have thrown away their lives by using cars to do things that they have come to regret. Additionally, the programme is thought to be so worthwhile that the people behind it are giving presentations to magistrates across the north-west region.

Mr. Dawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Although I am not aware of that project, it is a perfect example of what I am talking about—a programme devised by those who have been through experiences that have meaning for offenders and to which offenders are able to respond.

I regret to say that the out-of-date approach to youth justice being advocated by the Opposition threatens to undermine the Bill's entire purpose. If we were to allow crucial get-outs, such as opportunities for young people to be dealt with in a conditional discharge and a fine, we should miss the crucially important moment—the first appearance in court—and that crucial chance to influence behaviour at that level.

As one who worked in the youth justice system for some years, I tell the hon. Member for Ryedale that one of the system's greatest failings was that, in far too many cases, by the time we got to the young people for whom we were trying to develop programmes as alternatives to custodial sentences—they had all the cautions, court appearances, fines, conditional discharges, and attendance and supervision orders behind them—they were lost to us. The moment had gone.

The Bill creates the opportunity to use the crucial moment. It brings a radical approach to justice that is meaningful to the young person and to the community, restores to the community what it has lost to offending, and gives young people an opportunity to move on and face what they have done. The approach is novel, and it builds on good experience from around the world. It is what we need in the new youth justice system, and I hope that all hon. Members will wholeheartedly support it.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Liberal Democrat Members strongly support the creation of youth offender panels, which are based on experience from not only around the world, but across the border. Some elements of Scotland's children's panels and children's hearings, which have worked well in Scotland, have been incorporated in the proposed process. We hope that the panels will provide the basis of a new approach to youth offending, and offer a more constructive response to young offenders that is based on examining the causes and consequences of their behaviour.

We also hope that the proposals will inspire a bit more confidence in victims that the young people concerned are being confronted with the consequences of their actions. We often forget how, often, victims feel that current court procedures offer absolutely nothing to them, leaving them feeling as if they would just like to get hold of the person who perpetrated the crime and give them a good talking to about what it means to be a victim and the adverse effects of their crime.

Our amendment No. 12, which is in this group, is a modest amendment that would introduce a little more flexibility to the system created by the Bill. The court will not currently have to refer first-time offenders who plead guilty to a youth offender panel if it is proposing to impose a custodial sentence or an unconditional discharge—decisions that fall at opposite ends of the scale. If neither course of action is proposed, referral to a youth offender panel will be required. The amendment would give the court the further option of a conditional discharge.

We support the Government's view that when the conditions are met, referral to a youth offender panel should be mandatory. For the new system of youth justice to be proved effective, it needs to be widely used. In the Scottish system, if guilt is accepted the children's hearing is automatic. We agree that that principle should apply. Over time we want it to be broadened beyond first-time offenders. As we gain more experience, we would like the provision to be available for a wider range of offenders.

However, we believe that giving magistrates complete discretion—which we normally favour—runs the risk of limiting the effect of that useful development in youth justice at a time when it needs to be given a fair, broad trial over a lot of cases. There is a strong case for allowing the court an extra option before the referral becomes automatic. Unless the Government accept the amendment, they will effectively abolish the conditional discharge for first-time offenders who plead guilty. They may be the most likely to respond to a conditional discharge. In some cases it would be the most effective response to the crime and it would not be sensible to drain the limited resources of the youth offender panels, so there is merit in a modicum of additional discretion.

At the moment, absolute discharge is rarely used compared with conditional discharge. Courts can impose a condition of non-offending behaviour for a year or more, so we think that it would be a useful way of avoiding clogging the new youth offender panels with minor offenders.

The Government's objection to similar amendments in this House and the other place seems to have been that they do not like conditional discharges because they send the wrong message. Are they saying that they no longer see any use in conditional discharges for first-time young offenders who plead guilty? Are they saying that they are no use for young offenders? Are they sure that the new youth offender panels will have the resources to deal with all who may currently receive a conditional discharge?

Our proposal has gained considerable support since it was first put forward in the other place by my noble Friend Lord Dholakia. It was proposed in the Standing Committee with the support of the three Opposition parties represented there.

The Conservative new clause on the new power of referral to a youth offender panel has been explained to us exhaustively. The aim of the new clause is to rewrite the relevant clauses in the Bill. It would meet our request by allowing conditional discharge as an option. It would also go further by allowing a fine. We understand that argument, but we do not think that the Government will be persuaded of it. Our concern about the new clause is that it would limit the use of referral to only those first-time offenders who plead guilty to an offence for which a custodial sentence is available. We are not convinced that referrals should be limited in that way. The new system of youth offender panels could respond effectively to offences for which there is no custodial sentence available. We prefer the Government's wording. The panel's contracts will be a new form of community sentence. Although the new clause has other merits, it imposes too great a restriction and we do not support it.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): I am glad to play a small part at this stage. The new clause gives us another opportunity to think about a sensible part of the Bill that has a flaw.

Referral orders are an idea whose time has come. I congratulate the Government—I did not take part on Second Reading—on picking up those ideas and running with them. I went to see Charles Pollard and his practical efforts in Aylesbury before the election, and very impressive they were. I sat at the back of the room and watched a meeting at which parents, young offenders and victims were present and the whole issue was talked through. It was superbly managed by a young woman police officer. Clause 1 or the new clause would implement that. The fundamental difference between clause 1 and the new clause is that the new clause would give more flexibility. There is a case for more flexibility.

This is the point at which one becomes a little frustrated about coming in late to take part in the parliamentary minuet. The Home Secretary should have accepted the Lords amendment to introduce the word "may" instead of "shall". I apologise to him for not having heard his reasons for throwing it out.

I sit as a recorder. I listen to the gossip at lunch and go to the many training sessions that the Lord Chancellor rightly requires recorders to attend. We rightly required them to attend such sessions when we were in government. Complaints consistently come from experienced judges—Lord Justices, recorders and assistant recorders with huge experience and Crown court judges with the widest experience of all—about Parliament setting a provision in stone or steel and requiring them to operate it. They are willing and anxious to operate it, but they have to see the individual circumstances. They may say, "Look, this is basically a very good idea, but in this particular example it is damned silly and it will waste the referral committee's time."

My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) was right to draw attention to a mistake that we made in government. This Government have been in power for such a short time that they have not made any mistakes, but that may change. I know that irony is the most dangerous political weapon, because when people read comments they tend to take them at face value. It could come out over the airwaves that the former Attorney-General has said that the Government have made no mistakes and it would be quoted back to me. We made a mistake with unit fines. There was some merit in the idea, but it was barmy. I was Solicitor-General when the policy was slipping through. It shows how little we know of what goes on in other Departments. I confess—in Latin if necessary—that the unit fines system slipped through and it was intolerable.

I have far too much respect for the Home Secretary to want to see him make a similar mistake. It would not be as bad, because the worst consequence would probably be to waste the time of referral committees. That is a pity, because they need to be labour-intensive. That is why I commend them so strongly. We have to spend a great deal of time on youth justice, particularly with people in the early stages of offending. Time, effort and expertise are well used at that stage in a person's career of potential wrongdoing.

3 pm

A resource, such as those committees, should not have its time wasted, and the elaborations of the court should not be made necessary by inflexibility in the structure of the Act, as it will be. That is why I support the new clause. I do so honestly, although I do not think that the new clause is the perfect answer as it also uses the word "shall". However, it gives more options before we reach compulsory referral.

There is little opportunity left for the Home Secretary, as we are getting to Third Reading today. However, I beg him to try to find a way to allow the court honest flexibility. He may say that there is a certain flexibility because courts can always impose a fine.

Mr. Greenway: That is the whole point—the courts cannot impose a fine. However, there will be an opportunity for the Home Secretary to think again. If he gets his way, and neither the new clause nor the Liberal Democrat amendment is accepted, the Bill will go back to the other place with the measure reversed. The Home Secretary's noble colleagues will then have to explain why.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend. We need to get back to the sensible position suggested by their Lordships in a thoroughly constructive amendment to this otherwise thoroughly sensible proposal by the Government. Our suggestion—that a fine or conditional discharge would provide more flexibility—is a second-best, but a useful second-best. I ask the House to think seriously about supporting the new clause.

The Home Secretary must not think it necessary to force these referral committees to take every case. They will be extremely enthusiastic to take up the right kind of case, and they will need no forcing. I have long experience of working with magistrates at every level, publicly and privately, and my impression is that they cry out for new measures, which they welcome with open arms when they are flexible. They will welcome the proposal with open arms, but it would be much more useful to them if the flexibility that was wisely proposed by the Lords—it is not a slap in the face for the Government, but a sensible suggestion—could be restored.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell). I have every sympathy for the Bill, and this part in particular, but I agree with the thrust of the new clause. The basic problem that we have faced—it was raised time and again in Committee—is the inflexibility of this clause. I hope that Labour Members will not say that I have misunderstood it. I have 25 years' experience as an advocate, and I have a limited ability to understand legislation.

The new approach is, of course, welcome, and it gives an opportunity to avoid criminalising a young person who may, early on, be put back on the rails. It is a good investment of time and resources. For every reason, it is a good idea. However, I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire on the question of flexibility, which is the key issue.

Before I address that matter, there are one or two points about new clause 1 that I cannot quite accept, such as the precondition that a custodial sentence must be available. Many serious offences do not carry a custodial sentence, and that is a slight concern.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) has worked extremely hard on this Bill, but I disagree with one of his points in relation to people electing trial to the Crown court. With some judges that I know—present company excepted—one would be better advised not to do that. One could end up with a right old tanning in some of the places where I used to practise.

I agree that bringing in the conditional discharge—referred to by both the hon. Member for Ryedale and the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith)—is a proper and sensible approach. The inflexibility of the mandatory approach is most unfortunate.

I plead guilty to having introduced the subject of the milk bottle into the Committee's deliberations. I was probably subliminally concerned about the dairy industry. However, I ask the House to consider this example. At a temporary traffic light system where one can see from one end to the other, a young person sees that nothing is coming and drives through. He should not have done it—we all know that. That offence is not endorsable. However, under the Bill, that young person might well have to spend 12 months in a multidisciplinary panel approach because of that one transgression, which is not even endorsable. I am sure that there are many other examples. I am not trying to clever—I am making a point about the inflexibility of the Government's mandatory approach.

There are huge resource implications. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) may disagree. No doubt he will say that I have misunderstood the matter. I agree with the thrust of the Bill, and I am not arguing about the theory behind it or the practice of it. However, I am saying that it will not be appropriate for all offences.

Mr. Dawson: I believe sincerely that the hon. Gentleman is missing the point. This not a 12-month sentence to anything. This is an opportunity for a panel to be almost infinitely flexible and to address that young person's behaviour in a variety of ways.

Mr. Llwyd: What variety of ways are needed over a period of between three and 12 months to address the offending behaviour to which I referred? What possible expert or authority could be involved? What can be done with that type of person? These are just words. With respect, that is a complete nonsense.

Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in the example he has given, that young person has demonstrated a serious miscalculation of risk to himself or herself and to others, and that while nothing untoward may have occurred on that occasion, it is an important moment to get that young person to address that risk-taking to ensure that it does not escalate?

Mr. Llwyd: The hon. Lady makes a good point, forcefully. I accept what she says in that instance, and the point has been made. She has a valid point, and I do not profess to have the monopoly of wisdom.

My main concern is the mandatory form—the inflexibility. There are two main ways of making bad law. One is to rush it and to repent at leisure. The second is to introduce something that is inflexible. One of the worst-ever pieces of legislation passed by this House concerned the Child Support Agency, and we are still grappling with it. That was so inflexible, it did not work.

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire referred to the unit fines system. I was in daily practice at that time, and the number of injustices that poured out of magistrates courts, day in, day out, was an absolute disgrace. That was again because of inflexibility. The poll tax is another example. I note that the Home Secretary is laughing loudly. I am pleased that he is enjoying himself.

I fully endorse the drift of the provision and agree with the new penalty, which will help young people in many cases; but there will be huge resource implications. Perhaps the Home Secretary does not realise how much it will cost. In some parts of north Wales and Merseyside it already takes up to six or seven weeks to get a probation report. The system will be clogged up with new referrals. I hope that the resources and expertise will be in place. I wish the system well but I foresee problems arising from its mandatory nature.

Mr. Boswell: I gather that the Home Secretary or the Minister of State described my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) as an old lag in these matters. I plead guilty to being a first offender. It is not an area in which I spend much time. I have spent a great deal of time on other legislation, from the safest of all possible positions, as a lay legislator, not a legally qualified one.

I am very much in sympathy with what my hon. Friend and others have said today, above all about the need for flexibility. I want to cite an example from completely outwith the Home Office. Recent protracted experience of the national minimum wage legislation encouraged us, in Committee, despite our opposition to the principle, to offer the Government the opportunity for flexibility in the drafting, giving them what one might loosely call a get-out clause: if something had been overlooked or got wrong, it would be possible to amend it to take account of the particular circumstances of a case.

Almost immediately, such an opportunity arose in respect of au pairs. The legislation was unsatisfactory, as it would have brought to an end the ability of the majority of the people who employ au pairs to continue to do so. The Government had to strain legal language to the uttermost to get round inflexible legislation that was set in stone, redefining not the workers who were excluded but the work, in a way that I, as a lay person, find legally implausible.

I suspect that it would have been easier to sustain the concept behind unit fines, which is not a bad one, had magistrates been able to vary their operation when they deemed that appropriate in the interests of justice or in the light of all the circumstances of a case.

3.15 pm

We have here a piece of machinery conceived for the best possible reasons, which I support in general—I have no argument with the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) on that—but if we say that we must tie it down in every single case because we cannot trust those who operate it to make a judgment, we start giving rise to trouble.

If one is buying into the European convention, it is important that any punishment should be appropriate to the circumstances, not disproportionate. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) cited the example of someone driving through a red light wrongly but not endorsably. It is not at all clear that the procedure would be appropriate in that case. I am not saying that the Home Secretary would not win in court if there were a challenge, but he would have to go to court to prove the point, which is unfortunate.

I am much more concerned with the lay sanctions in two respects. One of the Government's characteristics is a careful following of the tabloid press. If we say that referral to a youth offender panel must take place in all cases, a case is bound to arise in which it is darn silly to do it. The magistrates and the Home Secretary will be unable to do anything about it and it will appear in the press in a way that discredits the system. The press will ask how any sensible group of legislators could get themselves into such a situation.

The second area of discredit, which I find equally disturbing, concerns the young offenders themselves. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy was absolutely right to ask what the panel would offer a young person in the circumstances that he described. We are talking not about a pattern of offending leading to a first appearance in court—I am at one with the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre in that respect—but about a person who has behaved in a stupid and irresponsible way once.

The very fact that the person has been apprehended, resulting eventually in a court appearance, is probably sufficient in itself. Going through the elaborate rigmarole of a youth offender panel may well not meet the case. It might in some cases; that is not the issue. The issue is whether there should be discretion to waive the process when appropriate.

The provisions sit extremely ill with legislation that the Home Office introduced only yesterday in relation to spot fines. In that case, the police officer will have discretion: he may or may not decide to proceed. We are saying that police officers can have flexibility and discretion, but magistrates cannot.

If the system is set up to allow a silly result, there has to be a safety valve at the end of the case. I predict what the safety valve will be: the case will be referred to the youth offender panel, with much cost and complication; the panel will meet and it will come up with what I will frankly call a Noddy solution—one that does not address the one-off offence, but is a fiction. That adds a further element of discredit, because it takes the emphasis away from the experience of cases in which the new system is applied sensibly and appropriately and puts it on cases in which the system should never have been considered.

It is the sign of a mature Government not to say that they do not trust those who take decisions in the courts based on the legislation that they have passed. We should offer some flexibility. As a constituency Member who is concerned about young people, I have no problem with the concept of the system, but I am concerned that it may be discredited by being applied inappropriately and in a way that will attract opprobrium and hole it below the water line, when in fact we want it to succeed.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I begin with an apology to the House and to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), as a constituency matter meant that I missed the beginning of his remarks. However, I caught the flavour of them at the end, and his sensible points about the need for flexibility have been adopted in subsequent contributions. I also wish to declare that I am a member of the Bar.

Ministers must listen carefully to the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale and by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) in favour of more flexibility. Labour Members have made some good contributions to the debate, but they are making slightly heavy weather of the issues.

There is no need to go over the arguments about restorative justice and referral to youth panels, as there is wide agreement in the House on them. What my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale said in support of the new clause did not contradict the general principle of restorative justice, and it cannot be said that the need for restorative justice disposes of the new clause as the administration of restorative justice requires flexibility.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy practised for 25 years in youth courts and has much greater experience than either I or the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). However, the Government must consider very carefully the arguments of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy about flexibility—which I shall turn to in a moment—and about the availability of referral to a youth offender panel in cases where a custodial sentence is not available.

The Bill restricts referral to cases punishable with imprisonment. That is one of the conditions. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy asked about those offences that are not punishable with imprisonment but which magistrates think might be dealt with appropriately by referral to a young offender panel. That is an important question, but the Minister of State looks puzzled.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Paul Boateng): It is a Conservative new clause.

Mr. Clappison: That just shows how important flexibility is.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale made another important point in favour of flexibility when he said that magistrates will decide such cases. The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre said in an intervention that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy did not get the point because the youth offender panel could administer justice in a wide variety of ways and that it had a lot of flexibility.

I see that the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre agrees that that was his point, but magistrates will know the youth offender panel's capabilities and they may think that a more appropriate way to deal with a case is by means of conditional discharge or a fine.

Mr. Dawson: Does not the hon. Gentleman recognise that the youth offender panel will be able to discuss such matters in depth and to examine a range of different ways to deal with offending behaviour and the underlying problems that become evident? The panel will be able to make decisions on the basis of knowledge that simply is not available to a youth court.

Mr. Clappison: I appreciate that, but such decisions come after magistrates have heard the facts of a case and representations from both sides. One of the conditions for referral is that the court does not intend to impose a custodial sentence. After hearing the facts of a case, the court therefore will have to consider whether to impose a custodial sentence. That is a very important question. The hon. Gentleman's experience will tell him that the courts will want to think carefully about that. They will want to avoid imposing a custodial sentence if to do so would be unduly harsh, but they will also want to be certain that a case is not so serious that a custodial sentence is justified. The magistrates will also know what is available under a youth offender panel and might conclude that a case is best dealt with by means of conditional discharge or a fine.

It has been suggested that this rather modest new clause will undermine the edifice of restorative justice, but that is not the intention. It would give flexibility and discretion to the courts, and we should trust the magistrates.

I share the very high opinion of lay magistrates expressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell). Lay magistrates are very conscientious and perform an important function, and Ministers would do well to take on board what my right hon. and learned Friend said. He performed an elegant parliamentary minuet and handed a bouquet to Ministers when he commended the ideas of restorative justice and of referral to youth offender panels. Bouquets, as opposed to brickbats, are not often given to Governments by Oppositions—it certainly did not happen much before May 1997. Ministers must now think about the desirability of flexibility.

A warning should be taken from the recent past. I was not in the House when the Criminal Justice Act 1990 was passed—although I was a Conservative supporter then—so I have no expert knowledge about whether the Labour Opposition at the time were especially astute when it came to uncovering the inadequacies of that measure. I see the Minister of State smiling in a puzzled way, but we still use the framework of the 1990 Act for sentencing in criminal courts. In their amended form, the provisions have proved durable and I am not aware of any clamour for their repeal.

Before the 1990 Act was amended to take account of problems with unit costs and courts' inability to take previous convictions into account, it gave rise to great concerns among practitioners, who shared their unease with Members of Parliament at constituency surgeries. The Act was subsequently amended to render it more sensible and flexible. Ministers must listen to what has been said about flexibility and avoid tying the hands of the courts. Magistrates and judges dislike nothing more than being forced by law to take a certain course when the facts of the case suggest that a different course would be appropriate.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: Another aspect of flexibility is worth mentioning. Has my hon. Friend noticed that the new clause also gives the Home Secretary flexibility to widen slightly the ambit of referral, which need not apply solely to the absolute first-time offender? I fully understand the Home Office's anxiety not to have too many such referrals, but does my hon. Friend agree that the provisions of the new clause would be valuable in many cases involving young people under 18 who are not absolutely first-time offenders? Would not the Home Secretary be wise to consider that aspect of the new clause as well?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's intervention has gone on too long.

3.30 pm

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. and learned Friend sensibly pressed the point that we should leave it to the courts to choose horses for courses. If they are dealing with a young person, perhaps one with a previous conviction, they should have the flexibility to deal with that person as they see fit.

I prefer to trust the courts with a measure of discretion within a sound legislative framework. The courts should have available all the powers that they need, and it should be up to them to use them as they wish. We do not know the facts of individual cases, but magistrates hear the facts and the representations. Their experience and training give them discretion on how best to deal with particular cases.

I do not agree with all that was said by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), but the Home Secretary should deal with two of the points that he made. First, victims should feel that they have a say in sentencing. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998, the Committee for which I had the privilege of serving on, set up the advisory panel. We said that it should include representatives of victims organisations, and we received certain general assurances from the Government. I should be happy if the Home Secretary would write to tell me what voice victims will have on the panel. Does anyone on the panel represent victims organisations?

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed also feared that the Bill spread resources too widely. It may be that resources will be inappropriately used because of the Bill's inflexibility. What are the implications for the probation service? We need flexibility, and Ministers should trust the courts.

The Government are making slightly heavy weather of the Bill. I cannot see why they put up such fierce resistance to a sensible amendment that has won support on both sides of the House and in the other place. It would be in the spirit of criminal justice legislation if the Government showed some flexibility and listened to representations, even by those who essentially agree with them.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): My only qualification for speaking is that I have no qualifications. By definition, I also have no interests to declare. I have never served as a Home Office Minister, perhaps partly because my father once did, and I felt that one member of a family in two generations in the Home Office was an adequate discharge of duty for a single human group.

Nor am I a lawyer, although my younger brother is. He is, in fact, the first member of the family in several generations to have been a lawyer. I once heard him at a local government wards inquiry, but I have never attended upon a court in which he was appearing. I have been a juror only once, when I heard a case involving a kebab house that was operating without a licence. The case took four days, but it was not enough on which to build an understanding of the entire legal system.

Neville Cardus once said that, even if all other batsmen in the world were destroyed in a holocaust, but Tom Graveney remained, we could reconstruct the total art of batsmanship. A wise lady scholar once said that we could construct the entire administration of the Roman empire from the construction of ut with the subjunctive. However, I defy anyone to construct the full majesty of the legal system on a single case involving a kebab house.

When I accepted an invitation to attend West London magistrates court's open day in May—the Lord Chancellor had encouraged them to hold it, and I think the practice extremely good—I did not know that I would be speaking in this debate. Indeed, it would not be dishonest to disclose that I did not know that I would speak in this debate until 2.15 pm today. I come to the Chamber with a mind of molten wax on which my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) has most eloquently inscribed my education in these matters. Had I known that I would speak today, I should have paid even closer attention than I did to what I was told at the West London magistrates court.

I enjoyed that visit very much, not least because of a wholly admirable dramatic scenario—it ran all day, but I heard only part of it—in the youth court, in which contemporary cases, written up and prepared in advance in line with present practice, were acted out with splendid realism. That demonstrated how valuable the open days are. It was standing room only for the general public who attended the open day.

I have not yet heard the Government's case on new clause 1—indeed, I am preventing the Home Secretary from offering it. I listened intently to the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson), and I felt that there was nothing between the Opposition and the hon. Gentleman on the virtues of the proposed procedure. The real test of the issue is whether the harness in which the magistrates will work should be the leather harness commended by the great Duke of Wellington or the iron harness on which the great Napoleon Bonaparte always relied. Bonaparte's dying words may well have been, "We have enlarged the borders of glory", but it was the leather harness that did for him at the battle of Waterloo.

[Mr. Peter Brooke]

During the last Parliament, a leader in The Daily Telegraph rebuked me for speaking in gentle opposition to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard)—then the Home Secretary—on the subject of mandatory sentences. I forget the position then taken by the present Home Secretary, and I do not seek to provoke him into telling me, but I opposed mandatory sentences on the a priori grounds that it was a mistake for judges and the Executive to be in conflict. It was especially so when the Executive in conflict with the judiciary was a Conservative one.

Despite The Daily Telegraph, I remain of the same view today. We should trust magistrates, rather than making up their minds for them.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): It is a privilege to speak to these amendments. The House is broadly agreed about the principles in this part of the Bill, although there are substantial disagreements about how the proposals might operate in practice.

One of the few benefits of being in opposition—there were very few, and I do not recommend it—was that one was able to think about particular institutions in greater depth than one can manage when in government. Along with right hon. and hon. Friends and people outside the House, I paid particular attention to the profound defects of the youth justice system. My hon. Friends the Members for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) and for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes) have referred to the current arrangements for dealing with young offenders. To call those arrangements a system is to offer them greater dignity than they deserve.

The system is inadequate. It lacks coherence, speed and a connection between the commission of an offence and the correction and punishment that would make it clear to the young offender that the offence should not have been committed and secure some possibility that reoffending would be avoided.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to the Scottish example. The Scottish children's panels have been operating for about three decades. They are criticised within Scotland more than they are admired outside—that is always the case. None the less, when I visited Glasgow to look at the operation of the panels, everyone to whom I spoke was in favour of the system. When I consulted my colleagues in the parliamentary Labour party on that matter, I wrote to all of them asking—without leading the answers—what they thought about the youth justice system. It was significant that all the replies of Members representing Scottish constituencies supported the principle of children's panels. Those Members pointed out that some changes might be made, but that the principle was sound and it was working. However, every Labour Member representing an English or Welsh constituency said that those youth justice arrangements were not working and needed to be changed.

We considered Scotland, and some of my colleagues travelled to New Zealand to examine its arrangements for family conferencing. As the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) mentioned, several of us have studied carefully the considerable innovations in the Thames Valley police district, under the leadership of the chief constable, Charles Pollard. We tried to distil that experience to ensure that we developed it against the background of the operation of the English and Welsh legal system, and in order to introduce proposals that would bring into the law those principles of restorative justice—they are contained in part I of the Bill.

I will deal with the specific criticisms that the scheme is too inflexible. I do not think that it is, but I shall answer the point. We are not dealing merely with yet another disposal for the existing youth justice courts; we are dealing with a wholly new approach to young offenders. Although I hope to convince the House, especially sceptical Opposition Members, that the disposal has inherent flexibility, it is inappropriate merely to offer this disposal on a menu of others—alongside fines, conditional discharges or anything else.

We want to change the way in which youth offending is corrected, which brings me to the point made by the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison). Those Members of the House who have had experience of working in the youth courts—as I did many years ago—or of observing the youth courts, as I did much more recently, will realise that the most disturbing fact about the current operation is that the young offender is, at best, a spectator in a theatre where other people are the actors. At worst, the young offender is wholly detached and contemptuous of what is going on.

We have had a high-flown debate. I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) speaking in Brechtian terms of alienation. He was right to do so, because that is exactly what we witness in the theatre of the youth courts. I have been in youth courts where the young offender was talked at, talked across and talked about, but never talked to. The young offender was never asked to engage his or her brain as to what he or she had done, or why—and, above all, why he or she hurt the victim of that crime. Indeed, under the current system, after the young offender has heard everyone else talk about him or her, he or she might be forgiven for thinking that there is only one victim—the young offender. Often, his or her sense of injustice at being caught and at appearing before the court is reinforced by the excuses that are trotted out on his or her behalf.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: It worries me that what happens in court under the system that will be produced by the Bill will not be so very different from what happens at present. I should be grateful for the Home Secretary's comments on that matter. The young offender will be engaged—rightly so—on the occasion when the restorative aspects of the Bill come into effect. After pleading guilty, the young offender will be sent off to the panel and the panel will then engage him. However, the Home Secretary seems to be confusing those two aspects—I am sorry to use such a harsh word as "confusing". We want to make the point that although restorative justice is extremely valuable, it is too valuable to be used in every case; the courts should be allowed to decide.

Mr. Straw: I do not accept that. I shall deal with the inherent flexibility of the system in a moment. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had his way, he would be correct in saying that the court procedures, prior to the transfer to the panel, would be similar to current arrangements. The similarity would reside in the fact that, in every case, the court would have to go through the often time-consuming and, in many cases, unnecessary process of seeking a pre-sentence report. That takes up time and, I regret, does not necessarily leave the court any the wiser. Under the Bill, where other conditions are satisfied and the court decides that neither an absolute discharge nor a sentence of immediate custody are appropriate—or that in some cases, as I shall explain, even if the offence is an imprisonable one, a sentence of immediate custody is not available because of the operation of other provisions—clause 1 will operate automatically to secure a transfer to the panel if the offender pleads guilty. That will help to reduce the time taken in the theatre of the court.

An inherent feature of the arrangements is the long-standing policy of successive Governments and courts of encouraging those who are guilty to plead guilty. To conclude the formal part of the court process by a reference to the panel should act as further encouragement.

Opposition Members have questioned the flexibility of the proposed scheme. I accept what right hon. and hon. Gentlemen have said about the inflexibility of the unit fine arrangements introduced under the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Indeed, other parts of that Act were inflexible. Extraordinarily, I did not protest at the time, although I was doing other things as a member of the Opposition Front Bench. However, I should have protested had I noticed the extraordinary inclusion in the 1991 Act that previous convictions should not be taken into account. It would have been eccentric for even an old Labour Government to introduce such a measure, but, given that the original policy was published when Margaret Thatcher was Prime Minister, I feel that it should be regarded as an abberation.

Sir Nicholas Lyell rose—

Mr. Straw: I will give way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. As the former Solicitor-General, he may have been the author of that abberation.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way. My intervention will be very brief.

I am certainly not the author of the abberation. I am afraid that it was deep within the psyche of the Home Office at the time. The judges then construed it in a way that saddened many of us, and they did not get the Home Office out of its hole; in fact, they dug it into a deeper hole, and we had to get it out of the hole later.

Mr. Straw: That may or may not be the case, but I do not recall seeing a Home Office civil servant moving the Second Reading of the legislation that began as the Criminal Justice Bill in 1990. My former constituency neighbour, now Lord Waddington—who was not seen as being on the soft side of the Tory party—was the Home Secretary of the day. Wherever the idea came from, Ministers had clearly discussed it collectively at some length, and had agreed on it. It was not a minor matter. It was not an issue like that involving the Passport Agency, which Home Secretaries may be forgiven for thinking has operated reasonably well for some time—while it is operating well, that is; not otherwise. However, we will not pursue that little excursion.

The circumstances with which the Bill deals are very different from those provided for by the Criminal Justice Act 1991 in regard to unit fines. Flexibility is inherent in the Bill in its present form. Referral will be automatic when there is no absolute discharge or immediate custody. I draw hon. Members' attention to clause 8. There is considerable flexibility in what is actually contained in the contract of a young offender. It certainly does not say, "The case will be transferred to the panel, and this or that must happen." Subsection (2) states:

"The terms of the programme may"— not "shall"—

"include provision for any of the following".

The subsection makes provision for

"the offender to make financial or other reparation to any person who appears to the panel to be a victim of, or otherwise affected by, the offence".

That amounts to a financial penalty, which the panel can impose, while taking more account of the resources of the young person involved than a court might.

The clause requires offenders to attend

"mediation sessions with any such victim or other person".

It requires offenders

"to carry out unpaid work or service . . . the offender to be at home at times specified in or determined under the programme"— that means a curfew. It requires

"attendance by the offender at a school . . . the offender to participate in specified activities . . . the offender to present himself to specified persons . . . to stay away from specified places or persons" and so forth. If offenders refuse to comply with any of the provisions in the contracts that they have signed, they must go back to court and they will be sentenced for their original offence. That is the first part of the flexibility mechanism that has been introduced.

Mr. Boswell: The Home Secretary has explained the provision clearly. Is it not the case, however, that, because the referral is mandatory, it will be a prerequisite for the panel to meet and draw up a contract in each case, even in cases in which—as Conservative Members have tended to argue—referral is inappropriate, and the drawing up of a contract may well be not just otiose but inimical to the cause of preparation?

Mr. Straw: With great respect, I simply do not accept that.

3.45 pm

Mr. Llwyd: When I mentioned resource implications earlier, the Home Secretary shook his head vigorously. Is he now saying that clause 8 has no resource implications?

Mr. Straw: No, I am not saying that. Most measures that are presented to the House have resource consequences. May I refer the hon. Gentleman to paragraph 211 of the explanatory notes? I do not suggest that he has them to hand, but they contain details of the Bill's financial effects. They state—of course, these are estimates—that referrals to youth offender panels will save the probation service around £5.1 million, but will impose costs of about half a million pounds, given the revenue required for fines. Clause 6 will require some increased recruitment for training, which will be met by the comprehensive spending review settlement for pilot youth justice schemes in 2000, 2001 and 2002.

Part of the purpose of the pilot scheme is to ensure not just that the scheme works, but that we have clear estimates of its total costs. I cannot say this for certain, but I believe that, if it operates efficiently it will save court costs. It ought to save on legal aid as well. Of course, there will be expenditure on the part of the youth offender panels, but I do not think that the Bill will lead to a great increase in spending overall.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: I must make progress, but I will take one last intervention from the former Solicitor-General.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am extremely grateful.

May I ask the Home Secretary about his most recent answer to a question about clause 8? Is he not making the mistake of drawing a parallel with the Children and Young Persons Act 1969? Is it not the case that, according to the Home Secretary's view of the Bill, the courts cannot be trusted to make disposals? I am talking about the inflexibility that means that unless someone is locked up as a result of a custodial sentence, or receives an absolute discharge, the courts have no discretion—the discretion is handed over to the panel. Is that not a big mistake?

Mr. Straw: I do not accept that. It is not a question of trusting the courts; it is a question of whether the magistrates court is the appropriate forum to determine the content of the programme under the referral order. In many cases, experienced youth justice magistrates will be members of the panels.

Mr. Clappison: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: I must get on with my speech.

In Scotland, issues of guilt and innocence are dealt with by the sheriff—a paid judicial office-holder—rather than by magistrates. The Scottish system has moved away from the idea of magistrates courts dealing with issues involving not just the sentence and disposal of young offenders, but their guilt. Our proposals require people to be experienced and professional. I have a high regard for lay magistrates: I think they recognise that dealing with young offenders requires considerable professionalism and training. Indeed, it is possible that members of the proposed panels might have to be magistrates.

The Opposition asked whether other disposals should be available. First, let me deal with the issue of conditional discharge. It is my judgment—I make no apology for it—that conditional discharge is a hopeless disposal for young people, many of whom will have received a number of conditional discharges, or their equivalent, before even going to court. Unless a grave offence is involved, for which a conditional discharge is not appropriate anyway—I mean a serious offence; I do not mean a grave offence within the meaning of clause 53—the police will have already issued warnings and cautions.

When I visited youth courts, I took exception to the fact that, in some cases, half the disposals were conditional discharges. Those of us who have practised in such courts know all too well that young offenders regard conditional discharges as a case of, "I got away with it again."

In section 66 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, we made it impossible for a conditional discharge to be issued by a youth court if a final warning had been issued within the previous two years. In most cases, it would not in any sense be available.

4 pm

There are currently severe problems with the collection of fines, even against adults—so much so that my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor and I are extremely concerned. In far too many courts throughout the country, far too many fines are remitted—in other words, cancelled—when defaulters wilfully refuse to pay. Except for a small minority—the older age group—the offenders with which this Bill deals will not have resources of their own, so the idea that a fine would be an appropriate penalty is not realistic.

There has been a great deal of discussion of the case of the young person who goes through a red light, so let us deal with it. Statistically, the most numerous group of young offenders who transgress the red light will be aged less than 17: they cannot have a driving licence because they are under age, so they will be literally driving while disqualified from driving. It is probable that they will also be committing many other offences as well. If they have nicked a car or are driving without a licence, it is a serious offence, not a trivial one. Therefore, even if they happen to jump a red light, it is likely that they have committed other, more serious offences.

There will be a small group of red light offenders aged 17 to 18 who have a driving licence—those who, because one has to wait a bit before getting a licence, are in the last nine months of their 17th year. Because gravity factors are already laid down for dealing with offences, most offenders from that small group who jump a light will get a police reprimand or a final warning under our scheme. They might get a fixed penalty: if they accept it, that is the end of the matter and the new arrangements are not triggered. Also, if they object to the fixed penalty, go to court and plead not guilty, the new arrangements are not triggered because they have pleaded not guilty.

The circumstances in which a young offender has jumped a light and the arrangements are then triggered will be few and far between. My judgment is that, in those circumstances, it may well be appropriate to send the youngster to the youth panel. Youngsters in the 17 to 20 age range can commit extremely reckless driving offences. We know that roughly a quarter of all driving offences are committed by those aged between 17 and 24. In many parts of the United States—a country with which we compete for the best road safety record—if youngsters offend against traffic regulations, they are made the subject of the sort of intervention that we seek, rather than being fined or having their offence treated as a trivial matter. I hope that it is recognised that, in the few circumstances in which the new arrangements are triggered, they are appropriate.

I have one final point on the issue of flexibility. I accept—although I doubt it—that the pilots might disclose that there are inflexibilities unanticipated by the House, or the prospect of which has so far been resisted by the Government. For that reason, clause 2(3) provides:

"The Secretary of State may by regulations make such amendments of this section"— the one that lays down the triggers—

"as he considers appropriate for altering in any way the descriptions of offenders in the case of which the compulsory referral conditions or the discretionary referral conditions fall to be satisfied for purposes of section 1(2) or (3) (as the case may be)."

Therefore, that flexibility is written into the Bill. The Government have no more interest than the Opposition in ending up with a scheme that is brought into disrepute because of inflexibility at the margin, so we shall watch the pilots carefully.

My final comments relate to the provision in the Opposition new clause that would extend the conditions which have to be satisfied before there can be a referral. It contains the phrase:

"for which a custodial sentence is available".

I occupied the Opposition Front Bench for almost 17 years, and it was always irritating to me when clever-dick Ministers stood up and said that an amendment was "technically defective". None the less, although the Government resist the principle behind the new clause, that phrase itself is so seriously technically defective that, even if that were our only objection to the new clause—of course, it is not—it would be sufficient to make us reject it.

The phrase describes not an offence that is imprisonable for an adult, but an offence in which a custodial sentence is available for the offender before the court. Any imprisonable offence for adults is also an offence for which custody is available for 15, 16 and 17-year-olds; but, leaving aside grave offences, custody is available for 12, 13 and 14-year olds only if the offender has previously been convicted of at least two other similar offences and has breached a supervision order in respect of one of them.

If the new clause were accepted as drafted, we could end up with the curious situation in which, having decided that custody was not going to be used, a court could not use the transfer referral order to the panel because custody was not available for that offender, and therefore had to impose a fine or a conditional discharge. The extent to which the provision is defective and would hobble the court is obvious.

I hope that the House accepts that I have tried to answer, as fully as I can, the points raised by Opposition Members. The provisions are extremely important. If they are successfully piloted, as I believe they will be, and with the backing of the House and the other place, we shall in years to come be able to look back on this period—indeed, on today—as an occasion on which we began the most major reform since the war of the way in which we deal with young offenders.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's tutorial on life on the Opposition Front Bench. We have no intention of spending anything like as long on the Opposition Benches before returning to the Benches that his party currently occupies. None the less, we are grateful for the manner in which he has responded to our arguments.

Modesty forbids my revealing the source of the phrase that he has just described as technically inaccurate and defective. However, our intention in tabling new clause 1 is to make a fundamental point, which is why I shall shortly invite the House to express its view in the Lobby. I am also grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends who spoke in support of the general principle of flexibility.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) failed to explain the Liberal Democrats change of heart on a provision of discretion that his noble Friends in the other place thought so important as to be persuaded to vote in favour of amending a fundamental aspect of clause 1—the "shall" to "may" amendment, to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) referred. The Liberal Democrats in the other place supported that amendment, yet, not only did the Liberal Democrat Members in this place vote in Committee against the decision of their noble Friends, but they now speak in favour of the Government's position. We shall be fascinated to see what the right hon. Gentleman's noble Friends make of that when the Bill returns to the other place. I have an inkling that the question of discretion will come up again when, as seems certain, the other place is asked to consider whether the Government's scheme is correct.

Several of my right hon. and hon. Friends spoke in favour of the general principle of additional flexibility. I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) that I am glad that we tabled the new clause, not least because of the amusing and enlightening contribution that it enabled him to make. My right hon. Friend, as well as my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison)—who, not so long ago, moved from shadowing this Department to shadowing education and speaks from considerable experience and knowledge of the Bill—all spoke in favour of a degree of flexibility.

With no disrespect to any of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I shall, in the final analysis, rely more on the contribution of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), who has 25 years' experience as a criminal barrister. Although he has difficulty with one or two elements of the new clause, I am sure that he will understand—as I am sure the Home Secretary does—the intricacies of ensuring that we have before us proposals that have not been debated in Committee. It is therefore in order for us to debate those proposals today, and we bore that in mind when drafting new clause 1. In Committee and in the debate today, the hon. Gentleman spoke from experience and pointed out that there is a lack of flexibility in the Bill which will lead to inconsistency, a sense of injustice and, in time, discrediting of the Government's proposals.

There was nothing in the Home Secretary's remarks that responded to the issue, which I addressed in some depth, of on-the-spot fines for young offenders. By delving into clause 8, he served only to heighten our concerns. He effectively concluded that the courts cannot be trusted, a point that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire made in an extremely good intervention. The more one considers the scheme, the more one sees the clear discrepancy between what would be included in a youth offender contract and the way in which that young person would be disposed of, for the same offence, if he or she were given an on-the-spot fine or fixed penalty notice.

I find it extraordinary that, knowing that we were likely to have this debate today, the Minister of State found it timely yesterday to table the Fixed Penalty Offences Order 1999.

Mr. Straw: Get off.

Mr. Greenway: The right hon. Gentleman says, "Get off", but in no way have his remarks addressed the point that we have made throughout the debate. If a policeman decides to give a 16 or 17-year-old tearaway a fixed penalty notice, that is the end of it, but the court cannot have the same discretion. What is more, if the case ends up going to court, the same circumstances will result in a referral to a youth offender panel, where within the menu of the contract there is nothing available to the panel that is comparable to a fixed penalty notice.

In addition, the panels are likely to prescribe a different course of action in the contracts that they draw up. There will be a huge variation in those contracts, compared with those of other panels, for precisely the same offence. That, too, is an inconsistency that will be the harbinger of resentment, which leads to alienation and is the very opposite of what the Government are trying to achieve.

4.15 pm

The Government could, particularly in Committee, have accepted that their clause is too narrowly drawn. I thought that at the very end of his remarks, the Home Secretary almost admitted that the power that he has under clause 2—which is, in any case, incorporated into our new clause—to vary all the provisions in the light of experience means that perhaps the Government have not got this right and will have to return to it in the future.

The Government will, in any case, run into choppy waters in the other place over this issue. It is disappointing that they have not felt able at least to admit that a tiny degree of extra flexibility ought to be incorporated into the Bill. On Report, we discuss new clauses and amendments tabled by the Opposition to make a point about the Government's Bill, and those new clauses and amendments are bound, on occasion, not to have been drafted entirely correctly—but I do not believe that that should dissuade Opposition Members from pressing the point.

We invite the House to support new clause 1 in the Lobbies because we genuinely believe that the Government are making an error of judgment. When that error comes to light, we shall at least have the satisfaction of being able to point to our attitude to the Bill, and, in years to come, the opportunity in government of putting it right.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

YOUTH OFFENDER PANELS: FURTHER COURT PROCEEDINGS

Amendments made: No. 2, in page 52, line 9, leave out 'sentences' and insert 'deals with'.

No. 3, in page 53, line 8, leave out 'those paragraphs' and insert 'paragraphs 11 and 12'.—[Mr. Boateng.]

New Clause 3

CONDITIONS FOR MAKING AN ORDER UNDER SECTION 44(5)

'.—(1) Before making an order under section 44(5), the Secretary of State shall—

(a) publish a notice of his intention to make such an order and the reasons for his decision; and

(b) consult such persons as appear to him to be representative of news gathering and reporting organisations and any other persons he considers appropriate.

(2) The Secretary of State shall not make any order under section 44(5) until six months after the date of publication of the notice of intention under subsection (1)'.—[Mr. Greenway.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.30 pm

Mr. Greenway: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

As I did in Committee, I remind the House that I have an interest as a consultant to ITV Network Ltd., but none of the matters that we are to debate this afternoon are of concern to the broadcast media. Indeed, as I said in Committee, it is the printed media rather than the broadcast media that have residual concerns about the provisions of clause 44.

Clause 44, which was previously clause 43, seeks to clarify the law on press reporting restrictions on the identification of children and young persons under the age of 18, who may have been involved in criminal offences. The proposals as originally drafted, before the Bill began its passage through the other place, gave rise to huge anxiety and concern that they were too far-reaching and would seriously inhibit media, particularly local and regional newspapers, from reporting criminal incidents of a more or less general nature.

Several well-known crimes were cited as events that the press would have been restricted in reporting. The appalling murder of James Bulger was one. Another was the horrific tragedy at Dunblane. The Bill does not apply to Scotland, but had such an incident occurred in England, it would have been subject to the provisions. Perhaps the most accurate example was the attack on a school playground in Wolverhampton, in which a number of children were injured and considerable bravery was displayed by a teacher, Lisa Potts.

Arising from those concerns, changes were introduced in the other place, including some important defences to publication. One such defence would be that permission had been granted by the parents or guardians. Another would be that the criminal investigation in respect of the incident had not begun, although we still are not clear how wide or narrow that window is likely to be in practice. A third would be the inadvertent reporting of the identity of a young person. The final such case would be one in which the reporting could be considered to be in the public interest, as defined by the open reporting of crime.

Those changes were welcome and we supported them, but the position was still not satisfactory. Many right hon. and hon. Members have been contacted by their local newspapers with expressions of concern about the implications of the restrictions for the reporting of relatively routine incidents. In particular, it was stressed that the local press often play an important and beneficial role—for example, when an incident such as a kidnapping has occurred—in helping the police to trace the whereabouts of the people concerned.

Such an incident occurred recently in the Home Secretary's constituency, Blackburn. As a result of co-operation between the police and local media, the young person, who sadly had fallen into the control of a known sex offender, was located and taken back to his home and to safety. There is no doubt that the press often report such incidents responsibly and constructively, with beneficial consequences for the criminal process.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Will my hon. Friend make it clear that we are discussing circumstances in which young people under the age of 18 are the victims of crime, not the possible perpetrators of the crime?

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has considerable experience of these matters. It will become clear that there is a differentiation along the lines that she suggests. That is the essence of our concern and the point of the new clause.

In Committee, in response to the anxieties that I have outlined, the Government tabled an amendment that limited the effect of the immediate prohibition on reporting to the identification of young persons under the age of 18 who were likely to be the accused or the defendant in a criminal case. With regard to victims or witnesses to a criminal incident, the provision will have effect only if the Secretary of State has laid an order that is debated and approved subject to the affirmative resolution procedure of both Houses.

We must consider whether there is a case for a wider prohibition than is currently enshrined in our law in respect of a young person who may be a defendant or an accused in a criminal court. Having given the matter a great deal of thought, Conservative Members have accepted, as I told the Minister in Committee, that perhaps there is such a case.

Perhaps the most celebrated example of the type of abuse that the Bill would now prevent was that of Mr. Adam Dent, an extremely bright 15-year-old who was already an undergraduate. He was falsely accused of rape and his academic career was ruined as a consequence of the publicity. He was not only not convicted but never charged. I have done a little research since the Bill was in Committee and I understand that that case took place when the previous Government introduced the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997. Some consideration was given to whether a prohibition such as that which the Government are introducing in the Bill might have been appropriate to that legislation, but one could not be incorporated because the content of the Bill restricted the actions of the then Government and they could not make such an amendment.

Although we are prepared to accept that there is a case for strengthening the law further to protect young persons who have been accused of a crime, some concern remains. The Minister will be aware of a case that has been cited in the general discussion about the provisions. A 16-year-old girl was arrested as she emerged from a tunnel from which she had been protesting about a road development and a picture of her beaming face appeared across the top of the front page of The Times; I am told that the photograph is still on its website. She was identified by every national newspaper except one. She was never prosecuted. Clearly, if such an incident arose again, national newspapers would have to rely on some of the other defences and it remains to be seen whether those defences will prove adequate.

In spite of our agreement that there is a case in principle for further change, it is likely that the new provisions—even in respect of young persons who are defendants—will cause some difficulty and in due course will test the Home Secretary's willingness to work with the Press Complaints Commission to discuss and review the best long-term approach to these matters. I hope that those remarks are helpful to the Minister.

We come now to the nub of the current continuing difficulty. The Government provided some relief for victims and witnesses and for local newspaper editors by deciding, with the support of the PCC, to incorporate in the Bill the requirement that those prohibitions will not apply to a young person who is a victim or a witness unless and until the House and the other place agree an affirmative resolution in respect of an order to be laid by the Secretary of State. I challenged the Minister in Committee by suggesting that that was an apparent climbdown. I use the word "apparent" advisedly, because we still do not know the Government's long-term intentions.

I tried to test the Minister on that issue in Committee, but his answer was not entirely reassuring. I have revisited what he said. I am not in any way challenging the sincerity of his remarks; I am simply drawing attention to their inadequacy in respect of providing reassurance for the print media. He said

"the provisions should not be implemented after Royal Assent unless there has been a further debate in both Houses."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 29 June 1999; c. 232.]

He gave no indication of what the time scale for such a course of events might be. He also said that the Government did not intend the proposals to have the force of law unless the Secretary of State brought forward an order, subject to affirmative resolution of both Houses, to the effect that the provisions be enacted. There was no suggestion of the timetable.

4.45 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I am confused about this matter and I wonder whether my hon. Friend can help me. Does he anticipate that the order made by the Secretary of State will be general, allowing the provision to be implemented in all cases, or will it relate to specific individuals and specific offences?

Mr. Greenway: I anticipate that it will be general. As I understand the scheme that the Government have agreed with the PCC and my noble Friend Lord Wakeham, the provision will not be implemented unless and until an order is made to implement it and both Houses will have the opportunity to hold a debate on the affirmative procedure to say whether they approve of it.

We are not clear about the Government's long-term intentions. Although there is now a sense of relief and they are off the hook because they have accepted an amendment, we are left with the prospect of the provision, which has caused such concern to regional and local newspapers in particular, lying on the statute book waiting for the day when the Home Secretary gets up one morning, decides to lay the order and asks both Houses to approve it in a week or two.

I may have exaggerated what might happen, but that is where we stand. We need more clarification of the Government's long-term intentions. Are they in favour of or against implementing the provision? If they have decided that it is not such a good idea, why incorporate it in the Bill in the first place? What is the point? Why was it not agreed before we began Committee proceedings that there should be a prohibition in respect of persons under 18 who are likely to be the accused in a criminal trial? The witnesses and victims could have been left out of that altogether. But no, the provision remains in the Bill and we have simply this order-making power.

Given that the provision has been incorporated, one can assume only that the Government want to retain the opportunity in case at some future date they are minded to implement it. Today we need to know what the circumstances are which would prompt the Government to implement this provision through the order-making power. I put that question to the Minister in Committee but, as I am sure the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) will agree, answer came there none. That is why we are seeking further answer today.

Furthermore, the correspondence between the Home Secretary and my noble Friend Lord Wakeham, which the Minister kindly placed in the Library and I have now had the opportunity to review, makes it clear that in any event the PCC has agreed that there will be a review of the code of practice which relates to the protection of children who might be harmed by publicity in relation to a crime in which they were involved. That encourages me to return to my earlier point: in such circumstances if the PCC is undertaking its review, surely it would be better to remove the victim and witness provision from the Bill and await the outcome of the review. Sadly, that is neither the Government's choice, nor the option before us today.

We tabled new clause 3 with three clear objectives. When the Minister responds I hope that he will treat them in the spirit in which they have been proposed and try to give not just us but a lot of worried editors in local newspapers some greater reassurance. Our first objective is to have that greater reassurance about the circumstances which might persuade the Home Secretary to make an order under this provision. What do the Government have in mind that makes them want to keep the provision in the Bill? The second objective is to give voice to the anxieties of local newspaper editors who, from all our experience, generally take a responsible attitude to reporting incidents involving young children. I know that point is of concern to the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson), who raised it in Committee. The third objective is to impose a better framework for the order-making power, should the Home Secretary decide that it were appropriate to implement it.

In the spirit of the reassurances already given, one assumes by implication that the Government are not currently minded to implement these provisions, but we have to accept that the circumstances could change. If they do and the Home Secretary decides to implement this, he would have nothing to fear from a requirement, such as that in the new clause, to announce an intention to bring forward the order and state his reasons. In all respects this first element of new clause 3 is entirely unexceptional and unobjectionable. It simply requires the Secretary of State to state that he intends to make an order and to give his reasons for doing so.

The second element is that the Secretary of State, having made his announcement, should consult. This might occur several years hence when there might be a different Home Secretary and, with any luck, a different Government. Surely consultation would be appropriate. It is unthinkable that the Home Secretary would feel it unnecessary to discuss the issue again with print and broadcast media. It is entirely likely that local newspapers would want to talk to their local Members of Parliament about their concerns about what the Government have in mind. Indeed, if the check of an affirmative resolution of both Houses is to have any value, right hon. and hon. Members will need to know how they are to use their vote. If there is to be no consultation and they are simply to be whipped through the Lobby in five seconds flat because the order has been laid and they have been told to vote for it, that provides no protection whatever. Therefore, we need consultation so that right hon. and hon. Members will know how to vote or, if they are being told to vote for it, at least they will have discussed the matter with their local newspaper and will understand the implications of it for that paper.

Furthermore, there must be consultation to take account of the implications of an order for all aspects of self-regulation of the press and the review of the code of conduct, which the PCC is undertaking and which has been published in the letters that have been laid in the House. It is entirely reasonable to have consultation on a proposal to lay an order.

Subsection (2) of new clause 3 would require a six month delay. Surely time for reflection on the introduction and imposition of such a draconian press reporting prohibition would not be a bad idea. We often talk about the need to avoid knee-jerk legislation. Such a reaction is a bad idea, but it takes five or six months to get primary legislation through the House, unless there is agreement on a fast track approach. An order-making power that is subject only to affirmative resolution could be through the House in two or three weeks. What is wrong with requiring a six-month delay before making an order?

We should resist the temptation to make an order as a knee-jerk reaction to a gross abuse committed by one element of the tabloid press. The best response is to give time for reflection. The local and regional press may have acted responsibly following the enactment of this legislation. They should not be penalised because of the wrongdoing of one tabloid newspaper, which committed such a gross abuse that everyone said something must be done about it. People may say, "The order-making power is already in the Bill, so what's the reason for delay? Let's get on with it." However, we think that it would be no bad thing to have a six-month delay.

If the Government, on reflection, have decided that they will not implement this provision for the time being, and are persuaded by the argument that it will, hopefully, not be necessary, what is wrong with incorporating a six-month delay as a safeguard?

Those are reasonable safeguards and make better sense of the Government's position. They do not inhibit the power to impose the restriction, but they would enable local newspapers and other responsible media to ask the Home Secretary to think again if he were minded to make an order under clause 44(5). Most important of all, it would give right hon. and hon. Members the chance to reflect on and understand the implications and consequences of a decision to restrict press freedom in an important area of public life if the public have a genuine right to know.

The new clause is the very minimum that the House should expect and insist on from a Government who preach the doctrine of freedom of information, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Viggers: As I have not previously spoken on the Bill, may I say that I welcome it in general terms? Some of us occasionally go out with our local police force and see the behaviour of young people late at night, and we have all heard about young people committing burglary offences. Whatever the crime, the gap between the commission of the alleged offence and the bringing of the offender to trial must be kept as short as possible. That is the main thrust of the Bill, and I very much welcome it.

The detail is important, and we are discussing a particular point about publicity. The courts in England and Wales operate on the principle that court business should be conducted openly. That is an important part of our justice system. Under the Contempt of Court Act 1981, the court may, in certain circumstances, prohibit the name and address of an individual being revealed. As the law currently stands, there are also important provisions protecting young people, specifically section 39 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, which allows a court to prohibit the reporting of the name, address, school or other particulars that identify children and young persons under the age of 17.

I come to my first question to the Minister. I have not taken part in the Committee stage of the Bill, so I would be interested to know why the Government propose to restrict reporting of young people under the age of 18, rather than 17. The age at which restrictions may be imposed is being increased, whereas in most other sectors—I think particularly of homosexual law so-called reform—the age is being reduced. I should be grateful if the Minister would remind hon. Members why, in the case of reporting restrictions, the age is being increased, so that people under the age of 18, rather than 17, are protected.

I welcome the fact that the clause relates not only to England and Wales, but to Northern Ireland and to courts-martial. I am always vigilant to see where legislation shall apply. When I was a Northern Ireland Minister, it seemed strange that, frequently, I had to come to the House to introduce legislation relating to Northern Ireland that replicated legislation that had been introduced for England and Wales. In so far as it is possible, legislation that applies to the entire United Kingdom should be introduced.

Similarly, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence on two of the past three sessions when it has considered the Armed Forces Bill—the Bill to change armed forces legislation specifically relating to courts-martial and other matters—I welcome the fact that courts-martial are specifically referred to in the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill. Again, wearing my hat as Chairman of the Select Committee, it seemed strange that courts-martial should be subject to separate legislation. Again, one would like legislation to be applied to England, Wales, Northern Ireland and courts-martial.

The central point of the new clause is to ask whether the Government have decided to implement clause 44(5). I was surprised when I read how broadly it was drafted. It simply says that subsection (4)(b), which restricts publication in cases of witnesses, or those who have been victims of crime, will apply

"on or after such date as may be specified in an order made by the Secretary of State."

It does not say whether the Secretary of State must introduce an order to implement the whole of subsection (4)(b); I should like to know the answer to that question. Will the Government introduce a broad order that will implement all of paragraph (b), or will it be open to the Government to decide, for example, that that paragraph will apply only to witnesses? Will they perhaps introduce legislation by affirmative resolution to ensure that subsection (4)(b) will apply only to individuals against whom an offence is alleged to have been committed?

The provision is extremely broad and confirms the view that I have had for a number of years that amendments to existing legislation and legislation brought in rapidly tend not to be good legislation. It would be far better if the Government, having not made up their mind on the point and having left it wide open, subject only to affirmative resolution, left the matter and decided that, if they wished to implement the necessary legislation, they would introduce primary legislation.

The manner in which the House is treated by the Government means that we are not overtaxed in terms of legislation. The House could discuss matters of great note for a longer time. The terms of the Bill are far too loose, wide and arbitrary. Knee-jerk reaction to events in the tabloid press can often lead the Government to introduce bad legislation. Do I hear the words, "dangerous dogs"? I ask the House to support the entirely reasonable new clause, which has been effectively moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway).

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): Does the Minister recall the Standing Committee's first sitting, on 25 May, when I mentioned that there would be disagreement about the Bill's reporting provisions? I went on to say:

"I urge the Government to think seriously about the media's reservations."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 25 May 1999; c. 5.]

Does he agree that that one sentence, on which the Government acted, did more to alter the Bill's course than the hours of waffle that we have heard from the hon. Member for Lymeswold—the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway)?

In a previous career, I was a court reporter, and I am approaching the issue from that perspective. Will the Minister tell us why, if there had been so much discussion and liaison with the media, the draconian ban on reporting was proposed initially? I suggest that, far from encouraging less court reporting—especially in the weekly and provincial media—we should be encouraging greater coverage of court cases.

Since the Government's amendments were tabled in Committee, what further representations have Minsters received from the Newspaper Society and the Guild of Editors—who represent those working in the real newspaper world, and have experience of producing weekly and evening newspapers?

In Committee, the Minister gave the impression that everyone in the newspaper world believed that the Government's amendments would resolve the problem. However, they do not believe that. In an ideal world—as hon. Members have already said—the provision would be withdrawn and proposed again later, so that it might be debated fully. Presumably, however, we are simply being asked to accept the lesser of two evils.

The vast majority of cases involving young children that are reported are reported in the weekly and provincial press. Newspapers are wedded to their communities—to which they have a responsibility—and, indeed, behave responsibly. I again ask the Minister to give an assurance that the one or perhaps two occasions on which a national tabloid newspaper has gone over the top will not be used as an excuse for a blanket ban on the weekly press.

I received a letter from the editor-in-chief of Essex County Newspapers—which produces two evening newspapers and various weekly newspapers in the county of Essex—in which she states:

"Editors and media experts fear that"— the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill—

"will prevent publication of matters of legitimate public interest . . .

The Bill will make it an offence for the media to identify under 18-year-olds who might be victims, witnesses or the perpetrators of crimes under investigation. The ban will last until legal proceedings (if any) commence or the young person reaches the age of 18."

The provision is a threat to freedom of the press. It would prevent the media from carrying a great deal of inoffensive and unharmful material. Indeed, many items that serve the public interest, by highlighting the effect of crime, would be banned. A newspaper would be barred, for example, from publishing a report about a 17-year-old pop singer who had a precious gold record stolen. It could also prevent a newspaper from printing an interview with a 17-year-old student who saw a fight break out on a football terrace—which is not something that ever happens in Colchester, although it does happen elsewhere.

It is true that an editor could escape prosecution by pleading before magistrates either that the material was in the public interest or that the parties, or their guardians, had given written consent. However, the presumption against publication would serve to discourage the media from pursuing such stories.

Protecting young offenders is not the point of the provision, as they are already provided with anonymity under current legislation. Neither is the point to protect victims of sex offenders, as they, too, are already provided with anonymity.

Irene Kettle, the editor-in-chief, continues:

"My concern is that the media will find itself unable to properly report a wide range of events if everyone under 18 who is either a victim of any crime or a witness must be anonymous . . .

It is unclear when the ban would become active. Would, for example, a young accident victim or missing child have to stay anonymous because of police involvement and the possibility of a prosecution?"

She later says:

"The public interest defence is unsatisfactory. It would place editors in the position of having to second guess a court's attitude."

[Mr. Bob Russell]

The new clause relates to the Government amendments moved in Committee in response to the criticisms of the original draft of the Bill on reporting restrictions. We welcome the Government's movement on the issue, but it is only one step and many more are required. The Government amendments were designed to ensure that the reporting restrictions in the Bill relating to young victims and witnesses could be implemented only if a draft order to that effect was approved by affirmative resolution procedure in both Houses. Following widespread criticism of the proposals, the Government have chosen to suspend the implementation of the reporting restrictions and have said that they want regulation to work. We all hope that it will.

In Committee, the Minister said:

"Given the reach of clause 43's restrictions and the number of reports that they might affect, and given the possibility that our aims might be achievable through other means, it is right that the provision should not be implemented after Royal Assent unless there has been further debate in both Houses. If the amendments are accepted, we"—

the Government—

"are bound to undertake to keep the case for implementation under regular review, and I am happy to give such an undertaking."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 29 June 1999; c. 232.]

We have said all along that we understand and share the Government's aim to provide greater protection for the privacy of young victims and witnesses. However, the Government seemed to get into a mess with their original proposals—otherwise why the rushed amendments? It became clear that the scope of the restrictions and the practicalities were not thought through—again, otherwise why the Government amendments?

The new clause would ensure that should the Government—or a future Government—decide to go ahead with the proposals, an order would have to be placed before Parliament for approval and the Government would be required to consult representatives of the media—more than just Lord Wakeham. A delay of six months before implementation would also be imposed. We appreciate the thinking behind that. It seems clear that consultation was non-existent or substandard before the Bill was published and it is understandable following that failure that we should want to impose a requirement for consultation in future.

The Newspaper Society has welcomed the Government's amendments in Committee, but it feels that the proposals are still hanging over the newspapers. That is particularly true of the weekly and provincial press. I should be happy if the Minister could divide the proposed ban—if it ever came in—to put the national press in a separate category from the responsible provincial weekly press.

The new clause would mean that at least representatives of the media would be guaranteed further consultation if any Government decided to go ahead with the proposals. We support the new clause and we invite the Conservatives to press it to a vote.

Miss Kirkbride: I do not really have an interest to declare, but before I became a Member of Parliament I earned my living as a journalist on a national daily newspaper. It could be said that the interests of my former colleagues give me a specific interest in the debate, but I do not have a financial interest. I share the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway).

We are concerned because of the original proposal. The fact that the Government entered the debate by suggesting a blanket ban on the reporting of any person under 18 who was involved in any way—as the accused or the victim—in a potential criminal offence leads us to have suspicions about their motives.

5.15 pm

It is right and proper that the Government have climbed down by taking on board the legitimate concerns of the press. However, the fact that they started with a draconian ban—which would have been unworkable and unacceptable—causes us concern. I therefore support our aim to restrict the Government's ability to introduce a ban in this area.

The use of affirmative resolutions may be dangerous, as major changes to public policy must be made by the proper legislative procedures. They must go through both Houses of Parliament and all stages. There should not be a one-off vote late at night, when many of us may not be totally aware of what is proposed. The proposal must be in the Bill and not in the small print, waiting for a moment when the Government think that they can get away with it.

The new clause must be considered; a resolution could not be pushed through as a result of the six-month consultation period. There would be no question of the Government bouncing the proposal through on the back of disinterest, lack of understanding or potential emotion following an incident that has caused public anxiety.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) asked why we are now talking about the age of 18 for reporting restrictions, when many other activities are licensed at 16 or 17. The extension of the protection of anonymity to the age of 18 seems intriguing.

For victims, or the accused, at risk of potential embarrassment by being named in court—I am thinking of rape victims—there is anonymity. However, we are concerned that the Government are proposing to give anonymity in matters that go beyond sexual offences.

We do not know whether the Government are proposing a blanket ban on naming all victims of criminal offences under the age of 18, or a specific ban in certain circumstances. For example, would it have been possible, desirable or rational to try to introduce a ban on the reporting of what happened at Dunblane? The Scottish example is inappropriate, because Scotland has a different criminal law. Sadly, however, such an event could happen anywhere in the United Kingdom. It is simply not reasonable that the British public should not be informed. The press may have behaved badly at Dunblane, and I do not wish to defend some of the actions of my former colleagues. There may have been painful intrusion into the parents' bereavement, but it is not right to restrict the ability of the press to report an incident such as Dunblane.

A road accident might lead to a criminal investigation. A group of young people died in a bus in my constituency. If a criminal investigation had resulted, perhaps because of the involvement of a drunk driver, would the national or local press have been banned from reporting the accident, which of course was a matter of huge public concern in my constituency and beyond?

What do the Government have in mind? Sadly, young people are sometimes kidnapped by paedophiles for their sexual gratification. Surely the press should be able to report that. The police say that the evidence that they get from the public in the first few days of an investigation, when the incident gets into the press and causes a sensation, often helps them to put together a picture of the offender. I cannot believe that the Government intend to block that.

In all the instances that I have mentioned, the public interest is hugely served by the press being able to report. The Government are setting out to protect the victims, but often they are protected by the facts becoming known. The press should not have to worry about a public interest defence and obtaining consent for publication. The parents in a kidnapping, for example, would be totally traumatised and incapable of a rational decision.

What circumstances could possibly arise in which the Government would want to give anonymity to victims under 18? Do they intend a blanket or a specific ban? If they intend a specific ban on a named individual, how can they hope to legislate through Parliament quickly enough to stop the press publishing? The House, I am pleased to say, does not sit seven days a week, 52 weeks a year. I can only assume that the Government intend a blanket ban. I fail to understand how they will be able to take account of the circumstances that I have described.

Will the Minister give us a very concrete, albeit hypothetical, example of circumstances in which he would use the provision and explain why it would protect the victim under the age of 18? Why should the House give the Government a legislative vehicle to introduce what would, in my view, be an unacceptable restriction on press freedom?

Mr. Dawson: I shall make a brief contribution. It is saddening and unfortunate that so few Conservative Members recognise the crucial element of this matter. They have spoken—rightly—about press freedom and the public interest, about the need to know and about the rights of the press in a free society to report news, but they have not mentioned the interests of children.

The Government's approach is balanced, proper and responsible. I hope that Conservative Members will consider the coverage of children and childhood that appears in the local press, as well as in the national tabloids. I contend that the press does not understand children and the reality that they face in this country, nor that childhood is a time for exploration, growth and development.

What are the Government's reasons for proposing this measure? That question has been asked rhetorically, but I shall answer it. The proposals are necessary precisely because the years before 18 are the time of childhood. Young people below 18 have no vote and play very little part in civic society. They have few forms of redress, and they lack the confidence to engage with their local press.

Mr. Bob Russell: If things are so bad in the weekly provincial press, why have the Government agreed to defer implementation of the proposal?

Mr. Dawson: I think that that deferral stems from the balanced approach that the Government have adopted. The solution lies with the responsible press and with Conservative Members. In Committee, I wondered why editors and journalists, both locally and nationally, do not talk to young people about the coverage that they are given. That is a serious point. What are the perceptions of young people's organisations of the way in which young people are treated?

Miss Kirkbride: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's remarks. The proposal is to ban items in the press covering possible criminal offences whose victims are under 18. Will the hon. Gentleman give a specific example of when such a ban would be right?

Mr. Dawson: I was about to give an example of detrimental coverage, which involved a young victim of sexual abuse—one of the most serious crimes conceivable. The crime was reported in the local newspaper. The victim's relative was taken to court, and neither perpetrator nor victim was identified. However, the headlines were excruciating. The treatment of the story was grossly insensitive. Nothing in the paper said who that young person was or where she lived, but she knew who she was, and she was mortified by the reports of her case.

5.30 pm

The Government are trying to reflect the fact that even when serious offences are quite properly reported, the press should be far more sensitive to the experience of victims, especially children and adolescents who face a mixture of dilemmas, confusions and difficulties.

Miss Kirkbride: The hon. Gentleman's example would not be covered by the Government's proposals as it is already covered by restrictions on identifying victims of rape. A blanket ban on identifying people under 18 would make no difference. Press coverage would be even more general if it were restricted as the Government propose.

Mr. Dawson: I do not agree. My point is more wide ranging and subtle than that. Opposition Members are being complacent, and they should recognise the problem. Neither in Committee nor today have I heard any Opposition Member recognise insensitive press reporting of children. Children are routinely described as being the root of problems. Children in care—about whom I may feel unusually sensitive—are routinely described either as villains or, in the most saccharine and cloying terms, as victims.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman is obviously concerned about reporting of the cases of young people under the existing law. Does he favour implementing subsection 4(b), and if so, why not now?

Mr. Dawson: The Government are wise to strike a balance and to give the media an opportunity to reflect, as all of us should, on its attitudes towards young people. We should listen more to children and take more account of what they say. If the media could do that, we might resolve some of the problems with which the Bill is intended to deal.

Mr. Llwyd: I regret to say that I found the remarks of the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) rather patronising. He implied that Opposition Members have no regard for the rights of children, and I am sure that I speak for all of us in disagreeing with him. I am vice-chairman of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in Wales, and I have consistently advocated the rights of children since I was elected to Parliament. I shall continue to do so.

My commitment does not undermine my need to examine legislation. If I thought that the Government's proposal would further the interests of children in any way, I would not speak against it, and I should be obliged if the hon. Gentleman would not adopt such a patronising stance. Speaking as a father, I can say that we all respect children.

Mr. Dawson: May I make it clear that I did not intend to be patronising? I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's commitment to children's rights, and am glad to hear him express it.

Mr. Llwyd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that acknowledgement and for putting the record straight.

This part of the Bill will have huge repercussions. Earlier, the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) used the word "draconian"; that might be an understatement. The hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) described the offence that would be created. The only way to avoid the risk of prosecution is for editors to apply to a court to lift the ban when it is in place.

There are other concerns about the procedure. The Home Office suggests that the police will decide when the ban is triggered, and that the police will be the first to apply for a court order in such cases. In relation to free speech, are we happy for the police to acquire even greater influence over what can or cannot be published before legal proceedings? Will there be a risk of public prosecution if editors publish uncontroversial stories that magistrates do not like?

I too have seen disgraceful reports, but they are not the general rule; they are very much the exception. By and large, our regional press are extremely good; they serve the interests of the public and of politicians. They do a darn good job. We should not tar them all with the same brush because of the one or two instances of indefensible behaviour to which reference has rightly been made.

A ridiculous situation is envisaged in the measure: that if a group of youngsters were to be named, it would be possible to ask for permission beforehand. That is rather cumbersome. The veto would further complicate matters; it could be manipulated to avoid publicity—for example, where a parent might be in dispute with a local authority as to the standard of its care of his or her child. Even a technical objection would neither give nor veto consent. The public interest defence to which the hon. Member for Colchester referred is not a catch-all to meet concerns. Day in and day out, editors will no doubt be at risk of committing a criminal offence for routine reporting.

Of course, the type of reporting to which the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre referred should be criminal behaviour. However, such reporting does not occur often, thank heavens. By and large, we have a responsible press. Like all hon. Members, I receive letters from the regional press. I refer especially to the Western Mail and the Daily Post—the daily newspapers that serve Wales. Those papers do a good job, although they do not report enough of my party's doings—I shall not go into that now. [Interruption.] However, to be serious, they do a reasonable job. I have been reading those newspapers for about 30 years and, with hand on heart, I can say that I have never seen a report of the kind referred to by the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre. No doubt, he was talking about a tabloid report.

We must try to put the matter into context. Do we really want editors to be constantly looking over their shoulders, having to second-guess whether a court would decide that a public interest defence will succeed or fail? That is not healthy for any kind of press. It is not healthy for freedom of speech—as was pointed out earlier. The measure is astonishing from a Government who are talking about freedom of information.

Editors would be able to plead public interest or written consent in defence before a magistrates court. However, if the Crown Prosecution Service decided to prosecute for the identification of witnesses, the only defence would be that the editor did not know that the ban had been triggered and that the material published identified the young person concerned. It is a tenuous and unsatisfactory matter. The Government have not proved the need for automatic restrictions—especially on the identification of young witnesses. That is not justified.

It is questionable, at least, whether the Bill conforms with article 10 of the European charter relating to freedom of expression. Apart from the uncertainty about when the ban is triggered, there are problems over the written-consent defence, and the reasons why a public-interest defence application for the ban to be listed for the sake of justice might not well apply to many uncontroversial stories.

Of course, the papers can go to the trouble of finding a magistrate or instructing a lawyer, but that is not really practicable, especially in the case of the regional press. I feel that a rather large sledgehammer is being taken to crack a rather small perceived nut. Let me again refer to the section 39 orders, which apply to the identification of youngsters. Evidence suggests that magistrates will be restricted, and that cannot be good for free speech.

Finally, let me say that the absence of a requirement for the Attorney-General's fiat for prosecutions deprives the media of a safeguard, in the form of consistency in prosecution policy. I consider that to be a public-interest matter, and a very important one.

I have the greatest possible regard for children's rights, and if I thought they were being infringed I would not be speaking in this way. I sincerely believe, however, that this part of the Bill is wrong in principle, and may well lead to a denial of free speech. That cannot be good for any of us.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Let me reassure the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) that I am not implacably opposed to the Bill, or to clause 44. I mention the hon. Gentleman because something that he said underlines my reason for wishing to speak. If I remember correctly, he said that the media did not understand children. My guess is that huge numbers of editors, sub-editors, photographers, reporters et al are parents, and sweeping generalisations are at the heart of my concerns and, I think, those of others. It is very easy to have a knee-jerk reaction.

It is a pleasure to ask this Minister questions, and I know that he will respond to them fully. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the Bill seeks to achieve, and, in principle, I do not oppose the powers that are being sought in clause 44. Of course abuses are taking place, and harm is being done to some young people; but—and it is on the "but" that I think we should focus—censoring the media, for whatever reason, should not be undertaken lightly. However sensible the motive may be, it is still censorship of the media.

Let me make a confession. I am one of those people who, every so often, have an overwhelming desire to censor the media. It usually takes me late at night, when I have stopped thinking too clearly. When, on the following morning, I muse on my thoughts of the night before, a little mature reflection reminds me of the inherent dangers of what I advocated the night before. Even when my motives of the night before were good, I realise the following day that reflection pays. I feel that a little mature reflection this afternoon, and a little mature reflection before these powers are used, is needed now.

I did not serve on the Standing Committee, and I have not heard all that has been said about the Bill; but I understand that, according to the procedures of the House, if a Bill comes to us on Report it means that someone—presumably the Speaker—has decided that an issue has not been debated or has not been debated fully, or that there are other reasons for bringing the Bill back to the House. I submit that there is a good reason for us to debate the Bill this afternoon, and I urge the Minister to explain again why he wants the powers that clause 44 would enable him to exercise. Surely there can be some occasions when publication is in the public interest, and even in the interests of the victims themselves. The Government are seeking significant powers of censorship, so I believe that we are right to debate them this afternoon and to require full explanation and justification of the proposals.

5.45 pm

More significant is the need for a spot of mature reflection before the powers, if they are approved by the House, are used, and that is the purpose of the new clause. It would defend the Government of the day, whatever their political persuasion, from the late-night, snap decision forced through the House when perhaps people like me are not thinking as clearly as we might and a bit of time for consideration would not come amiss.

When I look back on some of my instantaneous judgments, I often realise that my motives, the research that was carried out, the analysis I made of the issues and amount of time I spent consulting other people and listening to them were somewhat lacking. I have a sense that the same would be true of any Government that instantly decided to introduce a ban. Just as I try to test my motives the next day, the Government must provide the opportunity for the public at large, the affected media and the House to test their motives, test their logic, listen to their justifications and ensure that they have consulted and arrived at sensible conclusions.

That is why I support new clause 3: all it does is protect the Home Secretary of the day from getting it wrong by indulging in knee-jerk reactions. It simply requires the Home Secretary, before he uses the powers in clause 44, to give notice that he is going to do so—instead of just instantly doing it, he announces that that is what he intends to do. He is then given the opportunity to consult before using the powers. Consulting and listening never did anyone any harm, and the more serious the powers in question, the greater the need for consultation.

The new clause would also make a provision, currently lacking in the Bill, requiring the Home Secretary to explain exactly what he is doing, and why, to the House of Commons. If any institution in this country is the guardian of the rights of individuals, it is this House, so when the rights of individuals are taken away—censorship does take away rights—there has to be an adequate explanation of which the House approves. I would be perfectly prepared to vote with the Minister if his explanation were adequate, so I do not think that he need be frightened of new clause 3. New clause 3 does not strike at the purpose of the Bill, nor would it remove any powers from the Home Secretary. All it does is improve the decision-making process by allowing time for mature reflection.

Thinking about what reply I might receive, I concluded that I shall be told that I am overly worried, that the Government have no intention of doing what I do late at night, and that, since they are such a sensible Government, they do not need protection from themselves. The reply will be put more politely than I have put it—

Mr. Boateng: It depends on how long he goes on.

Mr. Wilshire: If the hon. Gentleman is not in a good mood, I might go on even longer, and he will have even more to explain. If he is tempted to tell the House that he has absolutely no intention of acting instantaneously, he will take away the only reason that he has for opposing the new clause.

Mr. Viggers: I remind my hon. Friend that the Government have so far not lost a Division, and all that is required is that the Home Secretary snap his fingers, and the terracotta warriors will wander through the Lobbies and the Bill will be passed.

Mr. Wilshire: I am incredibly tempted by that course of action, but I have been trying to be helpful and friendly and not too aggressive to Labour Members, so I shall resist that temptation, although I agree with my hon. Friend.

All I am saying to Ministers is that if they have no intention of acting instantaneously, the new clause will in no way mess up their Bill. If they intend to take a decent amount of time to make proposals, consult, listen and seek our approval, no harm whatsoever will come from accepting the new clause. Knowing the Minister of State to be a kind, reasonable man who wants to be generous on a Thursday afternoon, I am sure that he will support the new clause.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I shall be brief because I know that the Minister is anxious to respond to the many excellent points made by Conservative Members during the debate.

I entirely accept the points made by those who have said that they do not question the Government's motivations. I am sure that the Government did not get up in the morning thinking, "How can we penalise the media?" They are genuinely motivated by a wish to protect children, as are Conservative Members, but we happen to think that the Government are not going about that in a terribly effective way.

Some in the media do, perhaps, question the motivations of a Home Office that, it will be remembered, not too long ago sought an injunction to prevent the publication of a report that turned out to have been leaked by the Home Office. None the less, I shall pass over that point.

I shall concentrate my remarks on comments made to me by Mr. Mike Glover, the editor of the Westmorland Gazette in my constituency. It is a fine newspaper, which is very well dug in with its local community but which none the less has serious concerns about these issues. Mr. Glover's first point is that the problem with any such legislation, whether or not it comes into effect after the Government have made welcome concessions, is that if we prevent the press from publishing accurate information, we do not stop inaccurate information circulating elsewhere. There will still be gossip and people will retail versions of stories in pubs, on street corners and over their neighbour's fence. If we do not publish the accurate information, we may end up damaging children and causing them more difficulty than if we had allowed the press to report the facts straightforwardly and immediately.

Mr. Glover's second point is that the Westmorland Gazette is a fine newspaper and very successful in its area, but it does not have the largest circulation and it is not the best-known publication in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman is doing his best to change that.

Mr. Collins: I am, as the Minister says, doing my best. It follows that that newspaper, like many other regional and local weekly newspapers, does not have at its disposal a large and well-financed legal department that is able to offer the editor a great deal of well-researched legal advice on these very difficult decisions. The restrictions could therefore be particularly onerous for local and regional newspapers—national newspapers probably have large legal departments and do not run the risk of editors being caught out.

I might add that since the debate has so far concentrated on the print media, it is worth noting that we are dealing with measures that will also relate to the broadcast media. A station such as Border Television—the smallest ITV station—in my constituency does not have a large legal department. The pressures on editors that we have described are even more acute for television stations because the time between a story breaking and the time when the broadcast media would expect to put it out could, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said, be a matter of mere minutes. How can stations make accurate decisions on such matters so swiftly?

Mr. Glover's third and final point, which is important, is that the Home Office proposals, which would be aided by new clause 3, would break into the important co-operative relationship between local police forces and local newspapers. A senior police officer, from outside the immediate area covered by a local journalist or a local newspaper, might go to court to seek an injunction to provide a ban, thus souring relationships that had been built up over many years between a local beat journalist and local beat police officers.

If co-operation between the local media and the local police is broken down, the police may run the risk of losing one of their very important assets in the fight against crime. The Government should use the opportunity granted them under new clause 3 for further reflection to think about that, because some local police officers in my constituency do not think that it is necessarily a terribly good idea to put them in an adversarial relationship with their local media.

I now come to my final point, which I do not believe has been made in the debate. In the age of the internet and the ever greater dissemination of information, successive Governments have found that many of their attempts to impose restrictions on the free flow of information are probably doomed to failure. That problem, encountered by the previous Government, is increasing.

When I said that if accurate information was suppressed, inaccurate information would be circulated by other means, I also said that at the moment such information was probably spread by people talking to each another over the garden fence. In future years, increasingly, even local stories will be posted on the internet. One will never, realistically, be able to stop that.

Between 10 and 20 years ago, the "Spycatcher" case showed that it was impossible to stop information being published outside the geographical jurisdiction of a court or a nation. If the Bill passes unamended by new clause 3, there is a risk that such information could be posted on the internet. Even if it is posted simply between Kendal and Ambleside in my constituency, it could go via a server in the United States, be bounced around Australia and then return to the United Kingdom. Legislation of the type that the Bill represents must take account of these things.

My concern is that if one prevents the publication of accurate stories by the practitioners of professional, researched journalism, a bulge of inaccurate information will erupt elsewhere, which may in time come to be more damaging to children and young people than the accurate stories would have been. I hope that the Government will take the opportunity granted them in new clause 3 to think further about these matters.

Mr. Boateng: This has been a good debate, in which we have given this subject the considered and careful reflection that it deserves. To that extent, it mirrors our debates on this and other subjects in Committee.

The new clause provides for the Secretary of State to give notice of his intentions to make an order to activate the provisions of clause 44 in relation to child victims and witnesses; to publish his reasons for reaching his decision so to do; and to consult the media in whichever way he chooses. It then requires the Secretary of State to wait a further six months before making the order even if, in the interim, Parliament has debated the issue in both Houses and has agreed to the order being made.

That is rather unusual. It is an odd and, in our view, unnecessary way of proceeding. I well understand the spirit in which the hon. Member for Ryedale

(Mr. Greenway) moved the new clause, but we need to get real. It has been suggested by the hon. Members for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) and for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) in their careful and considered interventions—later I shall discuss in more detail the arguments made by the hon. Member for Gosport—that the Secretary of State for the Home Department might wake up one morning and, on a whim, bring these provisions into force. That, from two parliamentarians who, with the greatest respect, have been around a bit, demonstrates an ignorance—I believe, a wilful ignorance to enable them to make what they regarded as a good debating point—of the way in which the House works.

Mr. Wilshire: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Boateng: Not at the moment.

The hon. Member for Ryedale knows that one cannot arrange a debate on a draft order in both Houses instantly. The order must be drafted, and then parliamentary time in each House must be arranged—all hon. Members, on both sides of the House, know the difficulties involved in that. Each House must positively resolve in favour of the draft order. Then, and only then, can the order be made. In the event of the procedure being brought into effect by affirmative order, there would be ample opportunity for discussion, for soundings to be taken and for representations to be made.

We value enormously the representations that were made by the media in the course of discussion around the clauses. Representations were made through letters from individual Members responding to quite proper communication with their local editors, through national representative bodies, and by individual editors and the Guild of Editors. I can assure the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell), who brings to our debate a wealth of experience from the front line, that we have taken on board the concerns and the representations made by the provincial media, which play an enormously important part that I do not underestimate in the local dispensation of justice. They have an interest, which needs to be protected, and their views have been taken into account.

I must not give in to the temptation offered by the hon. Member for Ryedale and others to accept the new clause if, by so doing, I would be fettering the discretion of future Ministers by binding them to any particular course of action. That is why I cannot respond as the hon. Members for Ryedale and for Colchester would have me do, by indicating what they described as our long-term intentions.

As we made clear upstairs—I am glad to affirm it on the Floor of the House today—our intentions are to proceed by recognising the potential of self-regulation to address the issue, as has been demonstrated during the discussion of the clauses. The issue is a serious one—the welfare of children.

I listened with close attention to the contributions of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). As a professional solicitor and a social worker working with children, they bring their experience to bear. I hear them both. I do not believe that there is any great gulf between them. It is a question of tactics, rather than objective. The objective that we all have in common is to protect children.

After much deliberation and consultation, to which the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and other child protection organisations made an important contribution, that objective led us to go down the road set out in clause 44. We went down that road because of a number of cases that raised concerns about the impact of publicity on children, whether as victims or witnesses—for example, the difficulty for a child of facing his classmates when he has been publicly identified in the local or national press as the son of a wife-beater or baby-killer; or, if he walks to school, the difficulty of having to pass hoardings that identify him publicly with such a tragedy; or the difficulty of being identified as belonging to a family of thieves or drug dealers, even if the investigation did not lead to any charges. That would certainly merit the editor of a local newspaper taking care to consider the consequences of a careless press report. The hon. Members for Colchester and for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) will recognise that that is already the case in terms of the code of practice laid down by the PCC. We are not giving the Executive powers to ban the publication of particular material; we are making sure that the best standards of self-regulation are applied.

As several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Colchester, have said, the best standards are already being applied by the press and we are ensuring that they will be upheld and become more firmly entrenched in the general approach of the media—the broadcast media, national tabloid and broadsheet newspapers and local media—at all levels. We have to get the balance right, and I do not intend to make a distinction between the tabloids and local newspapers, which is the path down which he tempts me.

It is important to make sure that standards are maintained and developed by all, and I cannot and will not fetter the discretion of future Ministers in that regard. We are debating a requirement under clause 64(3)(a) for the Secretary of State to lay a draft of the order before both Houses. The order cannot be made unless the draft is approved by a resolution of each House. Obviously, the Home Secretary of the day will take into account all the circumstances, not just a cause celebre, before determining so to do. I hope that that satisfies hon. Members. It is important to recognise that those recommendations, which were published in June 1998, came from "Speaking Up for Justice". They have been the subject of considerable consultation.

I want to deal briefly with a number of points that were raised. The hon. Members for Gosport and for Bromsgrove asked why 18 was chosen. I understand their question. Our law—be it the Children Act 1989, the Bill or a range of measures concerning the age of consent, one of which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove—varies enormously for reasons of history, of vulnerability and of consistency within a particular area. It also refers to various ages, for example 16, 17 and 18. We chose 18 because it reflects the current limit in the youth court and the current limit in respect of court reporting restrictions. It would not have made sense to have chosen a lower age.

[Mr. Boateng]

There is a debate to be had about the wider issues and, when hon. Members consider this matter, they need always to have in mind our determination to ensure—

It being four hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Order [this day], put the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 2

RESTRICTION ON REPORTS ABOUT PERSONS ACCUSED OR SUSPECTED OF COMMITTING A SEXUAL OFFENCE

'.—(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), no matter relating to any person accused or suspected of committing a sexual offence shall be included in any publication if it is likely to lead to members of the public identifying him as a person involved in the offence unless and until he is convicted.

(2) A court may direct that a person to whom subsection (1) applies may be identified if identification is necessary to secure the arrest of that person or is otherwise in the interests of justice.

(3) A court making a direction pursuant to subsection (2) may give such ancillary directions as it thinks fit, having regard to the interests of justice and the interests of the accused or suspected person'.—[Mr. Greenway.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Greenway: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Previously, whenever the House debated a criminal justice Bill—certainly once in each Parliament—we debated the death penalty. Those days have gone, but I have an inkling that, in future, whenever we debate criminal justice matters, particularly Bills that refer to sex offences, we are likely to discuss the offence of rape, the structure of that offence and the way in which rape trials are conducted.

Part of the reason for that is the fact that the Bill introduces changes that, as the Minister knows, are controversial. We had several constructive debates about them in Committee. In addition, the Home Office is undertaking a detailed research study into the offence of rape, entitled "Question of evidence?: investigating and prosecuting rape in the 1990s".

Earlier this week, some hon. Members who are in the Chamber attended a seminar that the Minister kindly arranged to discuss some of the review's objectives. I make a suggestion to the Minister: will he consider extending that review so that it considers the anonymity of defendants in sex offence cases, particularly those accused of rape? I make the suggestion for several reasons. The first is that the Bill proposes important changes that are clearly designed to protect victims. Clause 34, in particular, provides for an absolute ban on defendants in rape cases cross-examining rape victims. We appreciate why the Government propose making that provision.

We also know from our debates in Committee, and from representations that all hon. Members have received, that the legal profession is divided on the provision. Some lawyers have said that the Government should go further, whereas others—including the Law Society, in stating the official view—have said that it is entirely the wrong thing to do. I dare say that in this debate we shall discover that divisions on the issue are not between, but within, political parties. Victims' interests are unquestionably being provided for in the Bill. I am happy about that, as the case for such provision has been well made. However, what are the consequences of that provision for the interests of defendants?

Secondly, although the Home Office review will consider all of the issues relating to sex offences, it makes some basic assumptions. I want to deal with one specific assumption, which is that any application of the criminal law must be fair, necessary and proportionate. On the basis of that principle, I want to question whether there is a case for the House again to consider whether, in the interests of fairness and justice, there should be a restoration of defendants' anonymity—particularly in rape cases, but also in cases involving other sexual offences.

The history of the matter is that the Criminal Justice Act 1988 amended the law on anonymity for complainants in rape cases so that anonymity commences when an allegation of rape is made to police and not—as provided in the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976—when a defendant is formally accused. The 1988 Act also removed the anonymity of defendants in rape cases.

Subsequently, in 1994 there was a review of the anonymity provision. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), in answer to a written question, confirmed that he was satisfied "that the present law, which affords anonymity for complainants in sexual offence cases, but offers no special protection for defendants, strikes a proper balance between the principle of open justice on the one hand and the need to ensure that victims of sexual offences are encouraged to come forward on the other."—[Official Report, 18 February 1994; Vol. 237, c. 1029.]

The history of the matter is important to our consideration of the provision for two reasons. First, one of the justifications for the changes in the Bill to the conduct of rape trials is that they will encourage more rape victims to come forward—rather than being discouraged from doing so because of the publicity given to one or two notorious cases in which victims were cross-examined, ruthlessly and without any protection from the court, by the alleged assailant.

However, since my right hon. and learned Friend answered that written question, several incidents have caused concern and they prompted me to table the new clause to give the House an opportunity to consider whether we should restore the anonymity of defendants in the interests of fairness and natural justice and to restore the balance that the Bill is disturbing.

6.30 pm

In April 1995, Mark Jackson, a 21-year-old chef, hanged himself. He had been accused of rape by a former girl friend. The Crown court jury at Exeter acquitted him, but the story had reached his home town of Wigan 250 miles away, where the local newspaper headline screamed:

"Jilted man, 21, raped ex-girlfriend".

Mark was named and identified for all to see. He could not bear the shame and on the morning of Sunday 9 April his mother found him hanging from the staircase.

Before Christmas 1996, a young man of 25, Dennis Proudfoot, gassed himself in his car. He had been charged with rape and was terrified of the effect of the publicity on him and his family. A few days after his death his parents received a letter from the girl admitting that he had not raped her.

Those are just two of a catalogue of tragic cases that have occurred in the past few years—since my right hon. and learned Friend last reviewed the issue as Home Secretary—in which accusations that were malicious or that, even if they had substance, ended in acquittal resulted in a defendant's life being ruined. We have been right to explore giving greater protection to victims, but we should also take this opportunity to give consideration to the innocent defendants of rape allegations whose lives and whose families' lives have been ruined by the glare of publicity. One could take up more time with other cases, but I am conscious of the fact that other hon. Members want to speak and we are time limited.

This is not just about men accused of rape seeking some justice through anonymity unless or until they are convicted. Sadly, there are also cases involving women. I understand that on 7 February 1997 the General Medical Council found a female doctor not guilty of indecently assaulting a woman patient. She was subjected to the glare of publicity and her career and personal life have never recovered. I accept that the procedures of the GMC are different from those of the courts, but the principles are the same. Therefore, I felt it right to bring the issue before the House again.

I have one further important point for the Minister. Clearly, this is an exploratory debate, and we do not intend to press the matter to a vote. However, I want the Minister to consider extending the review of how rape and sex offences are investigated and prosecuted, and I would like the anonymity issue to be brought within the purview of the review.

I wish to refer to the incident that prompted me to propose this as a matter for discussion. We have just discussed the reporting of criminal incidents involving young persons under 18 and I have referred to the case of Adam Dent, a 15-year-old who was accused of rape and identified in the press, but not subsequently charged. That case is one of the reasons why the Opposition have agreed to accept the Government's proposal for further curbs on press reporting of criminal incidents to protect the identity of the defendant.

If it is right to give protection and anonymity to a teenager falsely or maliciously accused of rape—as is proposed in clause 44—what is the case for restricting that prohibition only to young men under 18? An accused person aged 17 would be protected, but someone aged 18 would not. Is that a fair, just, balanced or logical conclusion? I am not sure that it is, as is made clear by the two or three cases that I cited which involved young men—maybe a little older than Adam Dent—in similar circumstances.

I wish to drawn the House's attention to the potential scale of the difficulty. In the preamble to the Home Office research study paper, there is an analysis of the attrition process in rape complaints. Although there has been a marked reduction in the number of rape complaints where the cases were subsequently not recorded as crimes, some 25 per cent. of rape allegations are still not recorded as crimes. The most common reason for that is that the complaint was believed to be false or malicious. In over one third of such cases, the complainant withdrew the allegation.

It is perfectly feasible that, in each of those cases, the identity of the persons accused would have been revealed to the press. There could have been some lurid press coverage, with all the consequences of that for that person and his family. We cannot conclude that this is just a tiny problem. It is a significant difficulty and one to which the House—and the Minister—should give serious consideration.

Mr. Beith: We support the aim of the new clause. On Second Reading I asked the Government to consider the issue of anonymity for those accused of sexual offences. Complainants rightly have anonymity. As the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said, it encourages the continuance of a case in an area where there is considerable fall-off, for the understandable reason that it is an extremely harrowing business to add to the awful experience of rape all the trials and tribulations that attend on pursuing a court case.

The case for anonymity of the accused is strong. There are two main reasons for granting it. First, the anonymity of the victim can be undermined when the defendant is known. It is also extremely common in rape cases for it to be possible to deduce who the victim is from other extraneous circumstances, such as the location. Lack of anonymity for the defendant undermines our ability to protect the complainant.

Secondly, the social stigma of a rape accusation is very great and may long survive an acquittal. Reputations can be ruined and marriages destroyed simply by allegations. In cases where the allegation is false and malicious, the accuser has the protection of anonymity, so it is reasonable that in those circumstances, which are different from those in other cases, the defendant should have the same right. Of course, the anonymity would disappear on conviction.

The hon. Member for Ryedale spoke of people who were so traumatised by the allegation that they took their own life, even though it subsequently emerged that no rape had occurred. It is clear that people in such cases are under extreme pressure.

When the Crime and Disorder Bill was in the Lords, my noble Friend Lord Goodhart tabled an amendment to restore the anonymity of defendants in rape cases, which was part of our law for a considerable time. The then Solicitor–General, Lord Falconer, accepted that there was high social stigma and that other problems existed but did not in the end accept the argument. He relied on the fact that openness is a fundamental principle in our justice system and said that as defendants are generally named, there was no reason why those in rape cases should receive special protection. We do not believe that his arguments counter the strong arguments that I have set out.

I hope that the Government will re-examine the issue carefully. There are good reasons for surrounding rape cases with special provisions, because if we did not it would be impossible for many guilty people to be brought to justice, but we are left with a problem about those who are falsely or maliciously accused. Given all the other protections that exist, it would be appropriate to restore the anonymity that our law once provided for defendants in such cases.

Mr. Boateng: The law as it stands offers anonymity for complainants in sexual offences, but it offers no specific protection for adult defendants. Anonymity for defendants in rape cases was originally introduced in 1976—by a Labour Government, as it happens—and was repealed in 1988—by a Conservative Government, as it happens—following a recommendation by the Criminal Law Revision Committee.

However, this is not a matter for party politics. It is a very difficult and complex issue that goes to the heart of the wider public interest in court proceedings. In an earlier debate, reference was made to the literal meaning of the term "public interest", and to the public interest in having freedom of information about what goes on in court.

6.45 pm

The Criminal Law Revision Committee took the view that people accused of rape should not be singled out for special protection while other defendants could be identified. The Government in 1988 agreed. They were not convinced that rape defendants should be treated differently from defendants against whom a different but equally serious offence is alleged. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 therefore repealed the relevant measure.

I listened with interest to the arguments advanced by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the hon. Member for Ryedale (Greenway). They said that rape carries a special stigma, but people charged with an offence of dishonesty at work or in connection with their business, for example, and who are subsequently acquitted would say that that charge carried both a stigma and a consequence that could threaten their livelihood.

Balancing stigma and post-acquittal consequences involves arguments that are by no means clear-cut. Should people charged with an offence of dishonesty in connection with their business also have protection? The consequences could be just as severe, and the stigma just as great. If they are not to have such protection, why not? Those who propose a return to the law as it was before 1988 must have a convincing response to that dilemma. I am not entirely certain that that has been demonstrated by those who have argued this evening that the 1988 repeal should at least be explored.

Mr. Beith: I remind the Minister that rape differs from other offences in that, in rape cases, anonymity is given to the complainant, which increases the possibility of a false and malicious allegation. The innocent defendant in such a case will ask how it can be right that the person making the allegation can have anonymity, whereas the defendant cannot. In that sense, rape is different from other offences.

Also, I meant to point out that the new clause would allow the court to break anonymity where the interests of justice required it.

Mr. Boateng: I shall come in due course to the powers that the court, by virtue of its inherent jurisdiction, already has in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman maintains that one anonymity should be balanced with another, but the contrary argument has been aired in debates throughout the afternoon, and it is that the public have a right, and an interest, in knowing what goes on in court. That argument must be addressed in determining where the balance of public interest lies.

[Mr. Boateng]

We are satisfied that the present law strikes a proper balance between the principle of open justice, in which the public has the wider interest, and the very important need to ensure that victims of sexual offences are encouraged to report such crimes. We are not convinced that there is a special case for infringing the principle of open justice regarding defendants in sexual offences cases.

I have nothing but sympathy for the relatives of those in the cases offered by the hon. Member for Ryedale who were driven to suicide by their sense of shame and stigma at the allegations to which they were subject. There is genuine concern that defendants will be deeply distressed by being publicly named in connection with a sexual offence. Even if subsequently found not guilty, people may suffer great distress because of publicity given to their case.

Sexual offences cases are particularly heinous, and proceedings inevitably attract much public interest. However, the same can be said of other serious crimes, such as murder, in which defendants may be acquitted. Allegations of indecent assault or gross indecency can carry enormous stigma. Do those who make the case for change suggest that defendants accused of those offences ought to be protected by the cloak of anonymity?

Though the suggestion is well intentioned, to offer anonymity to defendants in sex cases would encourage others facing serious charges to argue—with some legitimacy—that they face embarrassment and distress and should be protected from press and public attention. We must ensure equality of treatment among defendants.

New clause 2 refers to a person neither accused nor suspected of having committed an offence. After acquittal, a person is neither accused nor suspected, and the new clause would not achieve what the hon. Member for Ryedale wants. We are not satisfied that the reform is justified. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the sex offences review might deal with the point, but it falls outside the review's terms of reference, which are to consider the law, not procedural or evidential issues.

The Contempt of Court Act 1981 goes some way to addressing the concerns expressed by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. If there is a need to avoid publicity, the court has the power to act to avoid a substantial risk of prejudice to proceedings. The court may order postponement of publication of any report of proceedings for whatever period it considers necessary. In addition, where a court decides to withhold a name from the public during a trial, it has the power to prohibit publication entirely.

The courts, mindful of the need to preserve the principle of open justice, have held that that power should not be used merely for the comfort or feelings of the defendant or to enable defendants to avoid unwanted publicity. The powers should be used only in limited circumstances, such as protecting the identities of the young, or in cases in which witnesses might later be exposed to violence or blackmail, or where national security might be prejudiced. The Government agree with that approach.

We have been asked why we should protect only victims. Anonymity for complainants in sex offence cases is designed not only to protect them from hurtful publicity for their sake alone, but to encourage other victims of sexual assault to report the offence and to co-operate with the prosecution. Those arguments do not apply to the accused. Throughout our deliberations in Committee, it was pointed out—not least by my hon. Friends the Members for Luton, South (Ms Moran), for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), for South Swindon (Ms Drown) and for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes)—that the current rate of attrition is such that nothing must be done to weaken in any way the capacity and confidence of a complainant to come forward and make her allegation; it is normally "her", but it could equally be "him" in relevant cases. The point was also made by other hon. Friends outside the Committee and in the considerable and weighty representations that I received. The point has been made time and again. The House must confront what the attrition rate in rape cases tells us; the proportion of rape cases recorded by the police and resulting in a conviction fell from 24 per cent. in 1985 to 9 per cent. in 1997. That is a matter of the gravest concern.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire): Is not the lack of balance in the anonymity provisions part of the problem? Since anonymity for the defendant was scrapped, the suggestion has been lurking in the courtroom, in almost every rape case, that a false allegation may have been made under the cloak of anonymity. A man's life may be ruined because of that anonymity. If both parties have anonymity, that suggestion cannot lurk in the background at court. I suggest that that would make a difference.

Mr. Boateng: We hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I want to make it crystal clear why it is so important that the special position of the complainant should be recognised in law. I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. However, if the complainant is in the same position as the defendant, that does not hold up the complainant's special position as deserving the special measure that the complainant should not be subjected to publicity.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: I am not able to give way; the House wants to proceed. The hon. Gentleman can make his own speech.

I have listened carefully to the arguments, but, for the reason that I have just given, we are not able to accept the new clause. I hope that the hon. Member for Ryedale will not press it to a vote.

Mr. Greenway: The Minister's response was predictable. In fairness to him, I do not mean that as a criticism. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) pointed out, whenever the matter has been raised in recent years, Ministers—in Labour or Conservative Governments—have given the same response. However, there is more to the matter than the Minister accepts.

The Minister asks whether the stigma and consequence of an unfounded rape allegation is different from that of any other crime. For two reasons, there is a significant difference. The first reason is that, in a case of rape or serious sexual offence, the victim has complete anonymity. In the case of virtually all other serious crimes, such anonymity does not exist.

If, for example, someone alleges that another person has stolen or embezzled money or property, and if the person concerned is acquitted, a stigma will be attached to the person who made the allegation, because—presumably—that person will have been found not to have told the complete truth. That in itself deters people from making false allegations of criminal offences: those who would make such allegations know that, if the case ends in an acquittal, it is they who will be made to look foolish and dishonest.

Mr. Heald: It is noticeable that, since the scrapping of the anonymity of the defendant, the number of rape cases that have been successfully pursued and have resulted in conviction has fallen dramatically. Might not one reason for that be that the point is not lost on the jury that the person making the complaint is doing so anonymously, and is risking nothing? I am all in favour of that—I think that there should be an anonymity for the victim—but there is an unfairness, in that the defendant, who is not guilty at the time of the trial, has had his reputation ruined for life and, at the end of the day, it may turn out that the allegation is false. That unfairness is in the background of juries' thinking, and it is causing many of the problems.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We all accept that anonymity for the victim is an important prerequisite: it encourages women to report rapes or other sexual or violent offences, and I have no doubt that that is the correct approach. However, anonymity has a number of unfortunate consequences. For instance, as my hon. Friend says, someone who intends to make a malicious complaint has nothing to lose. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed made that point too.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, although the woman's name may not be printed in the press, she has to stand up in open court, facing the person whom she has accused, in front of the jury, the judge and court officials, and make her case?

Mr. Greenway: All that is true, and is taken as read; but it does not explain another fact to which I was about to refer. The research paper that I mentioned earlier gives reasons other than those given by the Minister for the fact that the attrition rate is so high, and the fact that so few rape allegations result in convictions. One reason is that allegations are subsequently withdrawn—a factor that is not a feature of other criminal offences.

The Minister asked us, quite openly, to give a reason for the fact that rape and other sexual offences should be different. I think that we have made our case. The stigma, and the consequences, are different in the case of rape—not just because of the anonymity involved, but because it appears for some reason that an acquittal, or the withdrawal of an allegation, does not result in anything like the prominence in the press that was given to the original allegation. There is always the lingering suspicion that the acquittal was not justified, or that there was some truth in the allegation but not enough evidence to sustain the prosecution.

Mr. Heald: No smoke without fire.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend states the reality that the House must face.

Mr. Heald: I am sorry to exploit my hon. Friend's good will, but I have become interested in the debate. Does he agree that the unbalanced position on anonymity has two bad effects? First, it is bad for the defendant if he is acquitted and people say that there is no smoke without fire. Secondly, it undermines the case of women who have been wronged and treated appallingly, because in court, they are undermined by the ever-present suggestion that they are making their accusation with the benefit of anonymity, while the man's reputation is on the line. That undermines cases that should be pressed home successfully to a conviction.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend tempts me with a road down which I do not wish to go, because I do not want to dispel the spirit that existed within the Committee and encompassed some of the Government Members. However, he makes his own point extremely well.

We shall not have an opportunity to discuss this important issue again for a while, but time is pressing and in an effort to be brief, I missed out a page of my notes. One of the important points on that page is the one made by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed—that in rape cases, the lack of anonymity for the accused, or the defendant, or the alleged perpetrator leads increasingly to the anonymity of the victim being breached and her identity being disclosed.

The fundamental reason for that development is clear in the research: it is that the number of stranger rape cases as a proportion of all rape allegations is falling, but that the number of so-called acquaintance, intimate or date rape cases has increased substantially. Therefore, there is a far greater prospect that, by publishing the identity of the alleged perpetrator, the identity of the victim will be disclosed. It seems logical to conclude that, if the priority is to give protection and anonymity to a victim, any matter that undermines that anonymity should be a matter of concern for the House, and that some adjustment to the law is justified.

When he referred to the Home Office review of sex offences, the Minister said that the anonymity issue was outwith the scope of that review. That surprises me, because the document given to us at the seminar that the Minister kindly and helpfully arranged sets out the terms of reference for the review. They are:

"To review the sex offences in the common and statute law of England and Wales, and make recommendations that will: provide coherent and clear sex offences which protect individuals, especially children and the more vulnerable, from abuse and exploitation".

I accept that the anonymity issue is not covered by that, or by the second requirement—that the recommendations should "enable abusers to be appropriately punished".

However, I suggest that the anonymity issue is covered by the third strand, which is that the recommendations should "be fair and non-discriminatory in accordance with the ECHR and the Human Rights Act."

Even setting aside those cases in which a trial results in acquittal, and concentrating only on those cases in which the allegation is subsequently withdrawn and the woman admits that she was not telling the truth, I put it to the Minister that it is not fair and not non-discriminatory to give anonymity to rape and sex offence victims, but not to people who are, in many cases, maliciously and falsely accused. There is a human rights dimension to the question of anonymity for those who are falsely accused of rape and sexual offences.

It will be clear that I do not seek to press this matter further. Early Thursday evening, when the House is about to adjourn for the week, may be an unfortunate time to have this debate. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) laughs, but although I do not think that we shall have a long Third Reading debate, there was a statement that lasted an hour, and the Government have known for days that it would be made today.

The House ought to return to this issue. The other place will do so. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed for his support, and I ask the Minister to think again about including the issue in the important review of rape that his Department is currently undertaking. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 17

WITNESSES ELIGIBLE FOR ASSISTANCE ON GROUNDS OF FEAR OR DISTRESS ABOUT TESTIFYING

Mr. Boateng: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 13, line 24, leave out 'section' and insert 'subsection'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 5.

Mr. Boateng: The amendments are the direct result of representations made to the Government by my hon. Friends the Members for Luton, South (Ms Moran), for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), for South Swindon (Ms Drown), for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons) and for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes), among others. They are designed to ensure that all sexual offence complainants will be eligible for help unless they say that they do not want to be eligible. Every sexual offence is likely to be distressing and frightening. It represents an assault of the most intimate kind and, if the complainant and defendant know one another, a betrayal of trust. In Committee, I agreed to consider whether complainants in sexual offence cases should have a greater degree of certainty that they will be deemed eligible for assistance. After consideration, I agree that the particular nature of sexual offence cases and the problem of attrition in those cases demand that we give sexual offence complainants greater certainty. They should have the certainty that they cannot be judged ineligible for help unless they do not want help. The debate in Committee was enormously significant. It was enhanced by the representations made by the hon. Members whom I have mentioned, not forgetting the representations made by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), who brought the point home with particular force and has used her considerable influence to bring about this outcome. I hope that in the light of that, hon. Members on both sides of the House will give the amendments a fair wind.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): The amendment gives the complainant the strongest possible presumption that special measures should be adopted unless the witness does not want them. As one of those who have argued for the strengthening of the clause, I welcome the amendment. The amendment allows the strongest possible assumption, but not an absolute automatic right to special measures because the judge could decide that none of the special measures would help the witness. The intention of the clause is that it would be incredibly unusual for someone not to be given at least a screen, but it still allows for no special measures to be applied. A justification for that is the European convention on human rights, which we have now incorporated into British law. Article 6 of that convention says that everyone is entitled to a fair trial.

I am not aware of any authority or previous ruling that has laid down that screens—which we may take to be a minimum protection—breach article 6 by acting as an impediment to effective cross-examination. As my hon. Friend the Minister will be fully aware, the European convention on human rights allows for a margin of appreciation in the interpretation of its provisions by signatory states. Some leading lawyers believe that that margin would allow the Home Secretary to permit screens in court under article 6. Has counsel's opinion been obtained on that issue? If so, what was the advice?

Given that the minimum of a screen as a special measure would not restrict a fair trial of the defendant, I would want the Government to go further even than they have by tabling amendment No. 5. I should like them to say that a screen would be the minimum that they would expect for a witness in a rape trial.

Guidance would need to be given to judges, to say that the minimum of a screen does not prevent other measures—such as clearing the court—from being offered, but that the screen should be regarded as a minimum protection and that, if the witness requests further protections, the court must give the matter serious thought.

The huge advantage of setting the automatic right to at least a screen would be that we could then offer potential witnesses some certainty. They could be told from day 1, when they walk into the police station to report the crime, that if the case went to court, they would not have to face the accused if they did not want to. An automatic right for complainants to be afforded such protection would be better for defendants, too. If in all cases the judge has the ultimate say over whether special measures are appropriate, so that particular measures are allowed only in specific cases, it may be difficult to prevent juries from forming the belief that there is something especially sinister about the defendant in a case where a special measure has been allowed. If there is an automatic right to special measures, juries can be advised that the use of the special measures has nothing to do with any special features of the case or of the defendant.

Undoubtedly, the law needs to give better protection to witnesses. Some victims of rape say that they cannot face even the prospect that they might have to face their attacker again in court, and that they would prefer to let the attacker go free than to risk going through that experience. Amendment No. 5 would obviously help those victims.

Does my hon. Friend the Minister believe that, if amendment No. 5 is passed and if sufficiently strong guidance is given to judges, he will be able to give men and women rape victims the assurance that they need to enable them to report crimes of rape and face going into the witness box?

I should like further clarification. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister confirmed that complainants would not usually attend pre-trial hearings, but that in rare situations, that could happen. I then asked how complainants would be protected at pre-trial hearings in the unlikely, but possible, event that both they and the defendant turned up in the same room. I was very pleased to hear in Committee that a judge would have the power to prevent a witness from having to be in the same room as the defendant in such situations. However, can my hon. Friend assure the House that he will give judges sufficiently strong guidance to ensure that they exercise that power when the witness wishes her or him to do so?

Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the protections that, rightly, he has included in clause 41 to restrict the use of sexual history evidence in trials can also be extended, via the guidance or via further legislation, to apply to pre-trial hearings, too, so that victims know with certainty that they will have all the protections that the Government envisage through all parts of the justice system? One reason why special measures are so necessary is that, sometimes in rape cases and all too often in the past, sexual history evidence has been brought into rape trials. It could have been thought that fewer victims would need special measures if the Bill had outlawed all inappropriate sexual history evidence.

However, many of us now accept that we cannot do everything that we had hoped for in the Bill in terms of limiting sexual history evidence, which makes screens and the strong presumption in favour of screens as proposed in amendment No. 5 even more crucial. The barrier to our making as much progress on the matter now as would be desirable is that the rules on the admissibility of evidence must be framed in the light of the definition of rape contained in the Sexual Offences Act 1956. Understandably, we cannot have two inconsistent laws.

The strong presumption in favour of screens, as proposed in the amendment, will encourage rape victims to come forward. I welcome the moves to limit sexual history evidence, but they can give complainants the complete assurance that they will not be subjected in court to humiliating or intimidating questions about their sexual history. Many women have described the experience of a trial in which they have had to go through their sexual history in intimate detail as a humiliation which made them feel as though they had been raped again.

We must recognise that however much witnesses are protected from unreasonable questioning about their sexual history, it is inevitable that, in many rape cases, witnesses will have to give intimate and detailed sexual evidence. That is bound to be the case when the defence is that intercourse did not take place. We should not forget, therefore, that the experience is bound to be traumatic and intrusive for the complainant. We are discussing ways in which that trauma and intrusion can be reduced, but it cannot be removed entirely. I have discussed with my hon. Friends the many police officers, lawyers and women's refuge workers who told us that if they had been raped, they would not take their case to court. Their testimony is eloquent.

The strong presumption in favour of special measures is relevant. Although the Bill goes some way towards reducing the admissibility of sexual history evidence, particularly in cases where the defence is arguing that the complainant consented, the Bill cannot rule out inappropriate sexual history in all rape trials. That cannot be done because the definition of rape currently on the statute book allows as a defence the argument that the defendant had an honest belief in consent, even if he now admits that the victim did not consent, or worse—that the defendant had an honest, but unreasonable belief in consent. It is incredible that such a defence should be available. We must try to make sensible laws about what constitutes reasonable evidence and appropriate special measures in a rape trial. On discovering the possible defence of an honest, but unreasonable belief that the victim consented, I felt rather like Alice stepping through the looking-glass and moving into a world of make-believe.

However, even for this defence, through the Bill, we have introduced restrictions on sexual history evidence. Those restrictions are that refusing to give such evidence could lead the jury to an unsafe conclusion, that the main purpose of the evidence must not be to undermine the victim's credibility, and that the evidence must relate to specific instances of sexual behaviour of the complainant. That is as far as we can go while such a ridiculous defence is available. That makes this amendment essential.

I should be interested to hear whether my hon. Friend the Minister believes that the Bill introduces further restrictions, in addition to those that I outlined. We wanted to reduce the horrific cases in which inappropriate sexual history is brought out in court and widely reported, which deters other victims from reporting rapes. In Committee, we discussed a case in which it was pointed out in court that in the past, the witness had had sex with an Asiatic, and that the accused happened to be an Asiatic, and another case in which the witness was reminded that she had had sex with a man older than herself who was of the same age as the defendant. It is understandable that complainants would want the court to be cleared if such evidence were presented.

Although such evidence will now be ruled irrelevant, it could be relevant if it related to specific instances of sexual behaviour and the defendant claimed an unreasonable, but honest belief that the complainant had consented. The defendant could argue that he believed stupidly, but honestly that because the complainant had had consensual sex with a similar person, she consented to sex with the defendant on the occasion in question. The Minister said in Committee that offensive and irrelevant questions should not be allowed in our courts, but under the Bill, it will still be possible to present similar evidence. That further emphasises the need for the amendment. The Bill is intended to overrule the Court of Appeal judgment in the case of Viola in 1982, which argued that a complainant's promiscuity was relevant to consent—a ridiculous judgment. The overruling would apply to consent, but not to belief in consent, as a defence. Hon. Members will agree that victims in such situations have a strong right to special measures.

[Ms Julia Drown]

I should be delighted to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister that the Bill precludes specific instances of sexual history being brought out to justify cases such as the three to which I have referred, in which case victims might not have to ask for all the particular special measures that we are making available through the clause. If so, surely we are changing the law of evidence in anticipation of how we want the law to change. That is precisely what my hon. Friend told us in Committee that we cannot do. As long as the defence of unreasonable, but honest belief in consent remains, unreasonable evidence may be admitted, which makes special measures all the more important.

Mr. Llwyd: A defence of that nature—the subjective test—exists in relation to many other offences. It is nothing new, it is not peculiar to this offence and it does not seem to create any injustice in any other context.

Ms Drown: We are particularly concerned about the attrition rate in rape cases and the fact that so many vulnerable people will not come forward because of the sort of evidence that has been brought forward in the past.

I acknowledge that the Government are tackling the larger problem by reviewing the definition of rape. That is desperately needed, because we will not be able to give women victims confidence that the law will always protect them until unreasonable belief in consent is removed as a defence from the law of the land. For that reason, special measures are even more necessary, although in a sense we are putting the cart before the horse by considering special measures and evidence first rather than the offences.

The problem with unreasonable belief in consent is not the only reason why we need those special measures. Even though there are special protections in clause 41, there is still a need for special measures, such as clearing the court or being able to give evidence from behind a screen. Under subsection (3)(b), a person might have to talk about which makes special measures necessary. We need to consider whether that is the best way of protecting witnesses. It has been suggested that we should use special measures rather than look in more detail at sexual history, but we should look in more detail at the root of the issues relating to sexual history and consider whether we are doing all we can to make sure that guilty people are brought to trial. For example, clause 41(3)(b) concerns anything that happened around the time of the event and whether such events are relevant to consent, which is what the Government would argue. All those things could be brought in under rebuttal, which few people have mentioned, or under a restriction that is used in many other countries: sexual behaviour evidence should be limited to that between the defendant and the complainant.

"sexual behaviour . . . at or about the same time as the event",

In Committee, the Minister gave the example that it would be relevant to know that a couple had been seen kissing in a doorway or on a park bench—or, to take another example, that they had had consensual sex—an hour before the alleged incident took place. However, we were not given an example of behaviour with anyone other than the complainant which would be relevant to consent, so should not the Government be considering that as at least an added restriction to subsection (3)(b)? Can they justify subsection (3)(c)(ii), under which any previous, strikingly similar sexual history is relevant to consent?

The Government have rightly and strongly said that, in general, people do not decide to consent to sex with anyone on any occasion. People give consent on separate occasions to a certain person and the law should uphold that. If such examples are still to be brought in, we can see the case for the amendment: victims need those special measures. Subsection (3)(c)(ii) has been justified by some peculiar examples. Baroness Mallalieu has referred to a sexual history involving a "Romeo and Juliet" balcony scene followed by sex. In a trial, that would be considered to be relevant to consent if the rape was alleged to have occurred in similar circumstances. If that is to be allowed, an amendment to clause 17 such as this is definitely necessary.

7.30 pm

We need further scrutiny of these issues. The Government have gone a long way towards limiting sexual history evidence and providing better protection for rape victims. Nevertheless, until we review current sexual offences, we shall not be able to give proper protection to women and men victims of rape. The Government need to ensure that the sexual offences review concludes as soon as possible, and to get rid of the honest, but unreasonable belief in consent defence. Then we need to return to these clauses, and ensure that all irrelevant sexual history is excluded from trial and that victims can be guaranteed special measures protections that they request.

Mr. Bob Russell: The amendments are to be welcomed. If I may, I shall draw the Minister's attention to the fifth sitting of the Committee when I asked:

"Would it not be to the advantage of all concerned if, when the victim requested special measures, they were granted? Otherwise, the victim might well have to go through the equivalent of a pre-trial hearing."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 17 June 1999, c.121.]

In reply the Minister said "No" and explained that answer. Do I now understand that his answer to my request of last month is now yes?

Lorna Fitzsimons: I wish to put on record how important this amendment is and how welcome the Government's new approach has been, in particular that of the Minister and his ministerial team. He has been open to people like myself with no legal background whatever and has helped us understand the problems in other bits of the law that we, as interested parties, face—specifically in the application of special measures. We acknowledge that the Government recognise the special needs of the most vulnerable people, to which special measures he is attending, and realise that we cannot do everything in this Bill.

The achievement of the women on the Committee needs to be put on record. They and the ministerial team have been working round the problems of our awful legal system where witnesses do not count because what matters is what can be proved in a court of law. Ordinary people cannot understand it. We have pushed back the boundaries.

We need to look at the review of sexual offences and other bits of the law, such as the definition of belief. I welcome the Government's approach and believe that it will achieve a lot for the most vulnerable whose voice is not heard at present.

Mr. Boateng: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons) for those kind remarks and echo them in relation to the Bill team who have been responsible for giving us the back-up that they have on these amendments and responding to the points made by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee during the debate.

It has been important, and it has guided our work as a Bill Committee, to determine that the courts should be required to put at the heart of their consideration of the matters before them the needs and views of individual witnesses, taken on board and understood in detail, in terms of the court determining the appropriate response to make sure that witnesses can give of their best evidence. This is all about ensuring that witnesses give of their best evidence because it is when witnesses have been able to present that best evidence to the court and the jury have had an opportunity to understand and appreciate it that the interests of justice are most likely to be served. The interests of justice are best served by our addressing the causes of attrition in a way that is based on research and developing best practice, and ensuring both through primary legislation and guidance to the court how best to give complainants the confidence and reassurance that they so desperately need to go forward with these prosecutions. Hence it is important to ensure that a menu of measures is available to the courts, so that they can consider which one will best meet a particular witness's needs. We intend to proceed down that route, rather than impose an artificial norm to be followed unless a witness protests.

Some rape complainants may find a screen helpful. In other cases, the court may decide that the witness should be kept out of the court altogether so as to be able to give of their best evidence, and that a video or live link would be better. In those cases, rather than a screen, the first thing the court should consider is a video or live link. Having taken into account the needs of the witness in some detail in the context of what is occurring in the court, the judge should be able to put those special measures in place.

The amendments ensure that sex offence complainants have confidence that they will get the understanding of the court to which they are entitled, and we must back that up with guidance. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) that guidance will be forthcoming: it will be clear and focused on the needs of witnesses to enable them to give of their best evidence.

The Government have heard the representations of the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) and those of my hon. Friends in Committee, which is why we have come to this conclusion. We believe that it is important for the courts to retain proper control of how evidence is given at trial, and to strike a balance between the needs of the witnesses and the interests of a fair trial. That is necessary to accord with our European Court of Human Rights obligations. In response to my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon, we are quite satisfied that the measures that we are introducing are entirely in accordance with our ECHR obligations. The court will be able to consider the views of all parties, including the party calling the witness, who may take a different view from that of the witness. Having borne in mind the totality of all the circumstances, it will be able to come to a proper conclusion.

In her wide-ranging speech, my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon raised the wider issues around consent and belief in consent. I hear what she says, and note her vigorous critique of the law of rape as it now stands. There will be varying views in the House about how best to constitute the offence of rape. I am glad to say that the Government are determined to take an inclusive approach by reaching out and giving everyone an opportunity to make representations, hence the importance of the sex offences review. I am delighted that so many hon. Members availed themselves of the opportunity that I gave them earlier this week to attend that seminar, and I am grateful to them for doing so. There will need to be more debate and discussion.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 5, in page 14, line 2, leave out from 'offence' to end of line 5 and insert

'(or to that offence and any other offences), the witness is eligible for assistance in relation to those proceedings by virtue of this subsection unless the witness has informed the court of the witness' wish not to be so eligible by virtue of this subsection.'.—[Mr. Boateng.]

Order for Third Reading read.

7.40 pm

Mr. Straw: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill reflects our belief that the function of the criminal justice system goes far wider than reaching the right decision about a defendant's guilt or innocence and meteing out punishments to the guilty. Every part of that system has a role to play in reducing crime and the fear of crime. At the same time, the way in which the system deals with defendants, victims, witnesses and the wider community can help to foster a sense of a tolerant and just society, where rights and responsibilities are properly balanced.

The purpose of a trial is to reach a just conclusion on the defendant's guilt or innocence. In our jurisdiction, we use an adversarial system to achieve that aim. The Bill does not change that, but we must never forget that that system is a means to an end, not an end in itself. We should always keep open the way in which the forensic part of the system operates, aiming to improve its efficiency and effectiveness and to ensure, so far as humanly possible, not only that no innocent person is convicted, but that the guilty never go free and—it has been a defect in the system in the current century and in a good part of the previous one—that the individual victim and the community, which is always an indirect victim of crime, are given proper dignity and centrality at the heart of the criminal justice system.

Part I further takes forward our pledges to reduce youth offending. As we said in greater detail at the beginning of today's proceedings, we do not believe that the courtroom and the drama that it creates, where the young defendant is often a spectator, is conducive to a full investigation of a young person's offending—once guilt has been admitted or, indeed, determined—or to a full investigation of the crime's underlying causes, which must involve the young person and must bring in his or her parents, the victims and the wider community.

Therefore, as we have discussed at some length, the Bill separates the determination of guilt and the sentencing process in that investigation. Sentencing will be conducted by way of referral to a youth offender panel, where we will aim—the experience of Scotland has well illustrated what can happen—to achieve the investigation of the young person's offending and its underlying causes without the direct involvement of lawyers.

That is not to besmirch the reputation of a fine profession, of which the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and many other hon. Members, including me, are proud to be members. Indeed, on some occasions, I think that membership of the legal profession might be a prior qualification for becoming an hon. Member.

Mr. Beith: There are too many lawyers.

Mr. Straw: There are never too many. I am glad to underline my affection for my profession. That said, there are jobs for which lawyers are well qualified, which are to do with the law and forensic examination of guilt or innocence, and jobs for which they are not particularly qualified and for which their qualifications may not be appropriate. They arise at the point where guilt has been determined and the issue is how to get the young offender to deal with his offending behaviour. It is interesting that, in Scotland, at that point, lawyers are not involved in Scotland's youth offender panels.

Part II of the Bill recognises the fact, which we sometimes forget, that the trial process involves more people than the defendant, and that trials could not proceed without witnesses, not least witnesses for the prosecution. However, for some witnesses the circumstances of the case, their own situation or the nature of their evidence makes the experience of giving evidence so difficult for them that their ability to provide that evidence, or their co-operation with a case, is affected. The intimidation of witnesses is a mounting problem in our society, not only in large and very serious cases, but in cases that the criminal calendar may regard as smaller cases involving relatively minor offences—which, nevertheless, are profoundly important to those who have been affected by them.

The Bill therefore provides practical measures to help such witnesses to come forward and give evidence at trial. Moreover, it implements our manifesto pledges to provide greater protection to victims in rape and sexual offence trials, and to all witnesses, whatever the nature of the trial, who are subject to intimidation. The Bill provides ways of protecting witnesses from some of the more distressing aspects of the trial process, while preserving defendants' rights.

There has been much discussion about the balance of the provisions, particularly on protections in the reporting of cases involving juvenile defendants to age 18. There has also been very considerable discussion—I have no need detain the House—[Interruption.] I am very glad to have that approbation, from whichever quarter it came: I shall ask the Whip to take his or her name.

Mr. Bob Russell: It was the Whip.

Mr. Straw: The Whip is a non-lawyer. There was a time when Whips on the Treasury Bench understood their duty, which was to ensure that Ministers' wishes were complied with and, in return for a healthy salary, to keep quiet at all times.

As my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I have explained, restrictions on child victims and witnesses before trial will be implemented if, after Royal Assent, we continue to be as concerned as we are about children being damaged by the nature of the reporting. However, I have good reason to hope that our concerns may well be allayed. Although we shall continue to keep the matter under review, it will, regardless, be possible to implement the restrictions only after a debate and vote in their favour in both Houses.

I am very grateful for the level of consideration that the Bill has received, both in the other place and in this House. I should also like to express my appreciation for the positive and constructive contribution made by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and his colleagues, the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), and the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and his colleagues.

The Bill has, quite rightly, been subject to argument. However, we have always—certainly since I have been at the Home Office—sought to recognise that, although Ministers make propositions to this House and to the other place, it is rare for proposals to be incapable of improvement. They have been improved by the House and the Committee doing their job, and I am grateful to hon. Members who have contributed to that process.

The Bill is designed to deliver two key manifesto commitments: reduction in youth crime, and greater protection for sex-offence complainants and intimidated witnesses. Taken together with the rest of our crime-reduction programme, the Bill should help to rebuild the confidence that our citizens should have in the criminal justice system, which exists to serve them and exercise justice on their behalf.

7.50 pm

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful for the Home Secretary's remarks about our approach to the Bill. We promised on Second Reading that we would give it constructive scrutiny. I am grateful to the Minister of State for his comment that our contribution has been constructive. I believe that we have also been comprehensive. We have managed to make speedy progress, but we have looked carefully at all aspects of the Bill, even though at times, as now, it has been something of a solo effort on my part.

The Home Secretary has clearly not acquainted himself with all the Committee Hansard reports, because his comments about lawyers are in stark contrast to what the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), said in Committee. When we approached the more contentious and complex issues in part II relating to the conduct of rape trials, he agreed that not being a lawyer was an advantage. There is a reshuffle coming, but I felt that, for the benefit of all of us who are not lawyers, I ought to remind the Home Secretary that we can make a valid and important contribution, as I believe that we have done.

We broadly support the Bill and agree with its objectives but we have some concerns, which have been well rehearsed in Committee and today. There is a lack of flexibility on youth justice, but we shall see how matters progress. We also have concerns about the Bill's impact on the immediate problem of youth offending in our communities. Like the measures in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, the youth justice provisions in the Bill will be subject to extensive piloting. No one is saying that making sure that they get it right is not the way for the Government to proceed, but they must accept that that approach means that there is little immediate relief in prospect for communities throughout Britain blighted by the petty crime, vandalism and rowdy behaviour of youngsters. Even where the plans are piloted, only first-time offenders who plead guilty will be sent to a youth offender panel.

It is clear from other exchanges that we have had—not on this Bill—that there is still scant evidence that the Government's other measures are having much impact on persistent young offenders. I am sure that the Home Secretary expects me to tell him that we shall make sure that when, in the usual fanfare of publicity, the Government announce the pilot areas for the youth offender panel reforms, we shall make sure that the rest of the country is aware that, for all the Government's talk about getting tough on the young thugs who terrorise housing estates and the wider community, the Government's plans are for the very long term and there is very little prospect of immediate relief. If our roles were reversed I am sure that the Home Secretary would be assuring me of the same.

We welcome the provisions on vulnerable and intimidated witnesses and we remain profoundly committed to a criminal justice system that encourages victims and witnesses to report crimes and enables them to give evidence easily and without intimidation. Although we have some questions about whether it was right to remove all discretion from the court on unrepresented defendants, we believe that it is right to protect victims, particularly victims of rape, from cross-examination by the defendant.

On evidence of previous sexual behaviour, we agree that some changes in this area were long overdue, and that questions that were merely designed to embarrass, humiliate or blacken the complainant in the eyes of the jury should not be permitted.

We have residual concerns—as will have been evident from the debate on new clause 2—about the clause 44 reporting restrictions. That is one element of the Bill about which I hope we have heard the last, and we hope that the order never sees the light of day. I still think that the Bill is deficient in that regard, but no matter. There is at least a mechanism within the Bill to give some comfort to the media. I hope that their confidence in that does not turn out to be misplaced.

Mr. Beith: We support the Bill, and we have long campaigned for a fundamental reform of the youth justice system. We think that the Bill is an important step in that direction. Seventy per cent. of adults with a conviction started offending as young offenders. We have to address that problem of young offenders, and the Bill—particularly in its attempts to deal with first offenders among young offenders—is a valuable step in that direction.

We welcome the second part of the Bill, particularly the proposals on complainants and witnesses in sexual offence cases. I strongly welcome the clauses that provide that defendants charged with rape or other sexual offences who choose to conduct their own defence, as is their right, may not cross-examine the alleged victim. Recent cases have made it clear that that provision was necessary, and I strongly welcome its inclusion in the Bill.

The only aspect of the Bill about which we had serious doubts was the third part, dealing with reporting. The Government responded to our concerns and those of others, but they have taken what we considered to be a blunt instrument to be used against responsible sections of the press as well as irresponsible sections and, instead of refining it, have put it in a cupboard. It can be got out when they want it, but it is still a blunt instrument. If the Government attempt to bring in the orders, it will be unsatisfactory, as we will not be able to amend the provisions—it will be take it or leave it. That is the weakest feature of the Bill, and I hope that we will not see those powers brought in. That is one drawback in a Bill that we generally welcome and that we will support.

Caroline Flint: May I say how much I and my colleagues welcome the Bill, which is historic and is about progress?

We welcomed the assurances given in Committee, as well as the further support to be given to victims of domestic violence and adults with learning disabilities—something that has not been discussed this afternoon.

Legislation is only as good as those who implement it. The Bill came about because the provisions that were made the last time the matter was discussed were not being implemented in the spirit in which they were discussed. We have been tackling that, and I was pleased to receive assurances from Ministers on that.

In Committee, we received two assurances. The first was that we must give training to those judges who are in charge of implementing the legislation. The other was that, as soon as this Bill becomes law, there will be effective monitoring and evaluation of the law. We do not want to wait three or four years to call for a review, and we must make sure that the law is monitored and evaluated as it is implemented. In that way, we can make sure that there is good law.

I thank the ministerial team for the way in which they have presented the Bill and worked with Committee members.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

EC PRELIMINARY DRAFT BUDGET FOR 2000

That this House takes note of European Union Documents Nos. COM(99)200, the Preliminary Draft Budget (PDB) of the European Communities for 2000, and SEC(99)600, the Commission's Overview of the PDB; and supports the Government's efforts to maintain budget discipline in the Community; and European Union Document No. 7698/99, Inter-Institutional Agreement (IIA) between the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission of 6th May 1999 on budgetary discipline and improvement of the budgetary procedure; and supports the Government in welcoming the renewal of the IIA as an important contribution to increasing the efficiency of the budgetary procedure and to maintaining budgetary discipline.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That paragraph 2(a) of Standing Order No. 54 (Consideration of estimates) shall not apply at the sitting on Monday 12th July, insofar as any Motion in the name of Margaret Beckett relating to the Eighth Report from the Committee on Standards and Privileges (HC 607) shall stand as first business.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

PETITIONS

Hunting with Dogs

8 pm

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I have great pleasure in presenting a petition signed by 42,500 people from throughout the United Kingdom, including many from my constituency, on the issue of hunting with dogs. The petition is sponsored by the International Fund for Animal Welfare, the League Against Cruel Sports and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

The petition is yet another part of the jigsaw that is being put together that will, we hope, ultimately bring about the end of hunting in this country. Among the signatories are Anne Ruach from London and Dean and Jodi Hancock from Porchester in Hampshire. It gives me great pleasure to present the petition to the House.

The petition

Declares that we believe that hunting with dogs is cruel and unnecessary and has no place in modern Britain.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons calls on the Government to act on the overwhelming mandate it has received from Honourable Members and the public to end hunting by making a clear commitment by the year 2000 to legislate for its abolition.

To lie upon the Table.

Stroke Unit (Hull)

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): The petition of the members of the OK Stroke club and their supporters had 16,000 signatures when they set out from Hull to London and 16,083 by the time that they completed the journey. The petition

Declares that the lack of a specialist stroke unit in Hull and East Yorkshire means that there are avoidable deaths and avoidable disabilities in this area as a result of strokes. Most other parts of the country now have stroke units.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Health to do all in his power to ensure that a specialist stroke unit is provided for the people of Hull and East Yorkshire.

To lie upon the Table.

Rail Regulation (Wales)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

8.2 pm

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I begin by referring to the transport powers that have been transferred to the National Assembly for Wales. I am wary of what Madam Speaker had to say on Wednesday, so I shall be careful about what I say. As I understand it, there is some limited rail investment through strategic development schemes and the Assembly can fund or regulate trunk roads, bus services and integrated transport packages. Local authorities have powers to fund local road construction and maintenance, bus services and some limited rail service development.

Integrated public transport policies are among today's big ideas, and rightly so, but there is a considerable problem in ensuring an integrated, sustainable transport policy for Wales—the glaring absence of any substantial powers under present legislation for the national authority to co-ordinate rail transport with other forms of public transport.

The White Paper on devolution suggested that the Assembly should be able to monitor the performance of the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising. It said:

"The Assembly will also be able to invite evidence from various regulatory bodies including the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising. Government policy therefore appears to be that the National Assembly should be able to monitor the activities of these bodies and make its views known. However, these bodies will remain accountable to Parliament at Westminster."

One way forward for rail services in Wales may be through local authority funding. The Assembly has just taken over the transport powers of the Welsh Office, one of whose functions was to oversee passenger rail services in Wales. The departmental report for 1998 stated that more than £8 million was allocated to local authorities for improvements to the rail infrastructure between Cardiff and the valleys for the period 1996–97 to 1998–99. However, an all-Wales passenger transport authority would be preferable, as it would provide considerably more investment. The establishment of such a body would require primary legislation. At present, only metropolitan counties are passenger transport areas: only they, therefore, qualify for the establishment of passenger transport authorities or executives.

The financial implications of funding and its sources will be an issue. Other matters to be considered will be block grants, the transfer of current Opraf payments, investment funding for railways from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and so on. The addition of the railways to the National Assembly's expenditure portfolio would require a negotiated settlement estimated at between £80 million to £100 million, based on passenger miles within each franchise operating in Wales. That figure would, of course, be reduced in line with the subsidy profile.

Although there is a need to ensure that Wales is perceived as a country that is efficient and easily accessible to road-based inward investors and tourists, there is also a longer-term requirement for a sustainable transport policy that reduces both pollution and congestion. There is no doubt that Wales's road and rail network has been grossly underfunded for the past quarter of a century. To be frank, the picture is a bad one.

[Mr. Elfyn Llwyd]

There is a lot of work to be done, and the Minister more than anyone will realise how important it is to put the right transport infrastructure in place. It is likely that the greening of the road building programme by the previous Government was a Treasury-led, cost-cutting exercise. The Welsh Office has published two documents that are appropriate starting points, but they must be backed by adequate funding if policies are to be turned into actions and are not to become mere platitudes.

The adequacy of the Welsh block grant—now transferred to the Assembly—will impact on road and rail expenditure, but at present no account is taken of any particular transport needs, nor of the current state of infrastructure in urban and rural Wales. Therefore, to overcome past underfunding, considerably higher amounts are required. The National Assembly has no control over expenditure in certain areas, such as major railway infrastructure. It faces the challenge of ensuring that Wales receives its fair share, and its relationship with the Strategic Rail Authority will be crucial.

The consultation process on the SRA began yesterday. I understand that the authority's main purpose will be to provide a clear strategic direction for rail transport in Britain. It will also promote—inside the Government and among the public—passenger and freight transport by rail, and it will foster a climate that encourages private investment in the railways.

The SRA will be the single body, accountable to the Secretary of State, responsible for strategic planning. It will co-ordinate and supervise the activities of the rail industry, as well as the disbursement of public funds. It will also have the clear aim of co-ordinating strategic objectives with the Government and other interested parties, which include passenger operators, consumers, freight operators and Railtrack. The SRA is also tasked to lead and promote a radical improvement in the integration of rail with other transport modes, and to maximise benefits to the rail user as far as possible, acting as an advocate of passengers and freight consumers.

The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions enumerated its concerns and aims in its recent response to the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs. No one could argue with the Department's aims, but Wales is at a gross disadvantage. The National Assembly for Wales has a relative lack of power to oversee the strategic development of rail services in comparison with both the Scottish Parliament and the Greater London Authority. That is a raw deal for our railways. Creating an integrated transport policy will not be easy unless the powers are right.
